MORE PRAISE FOR THE RACKET

"The Racket is an engaging insider's account of how the United States has spent the past 70 years constructing an intricate web of economic control across the globe – enforced by violence as a last resort – which sucks wealth and resources from the poor world to the rich."
Julian Assange, founder and editor-in-chief of WikiLeaks

"Kennard brings home in vivid and illuminating detail the reality of life and struggles of much of the world's population, their defeats and victories, their suffering and vitality and hope."
Noam Chomsky, author of Hegemony or Survival and Failed States

"A crucial exposé of the powerful, of injustice, and of the war against the poor. It should inspire all of us to fight back."
Owen Jones, author of Chavs and The Establishment

"The Racket is tough, angry, relentlessly researched and riveting, in the grand Chomskyan tradition but with the added value of the journalist's mobility and on the spot coverage. Kennard's range is wide, both geographically and topically, but with a single target – the depredations of the US superpower's corporate and political elites on their own home turf and abroad that the lap-dog media rarely touch."
Susan George, author of The Lugano Report: On Preserving Capitalism in the Twenty-first Century

"Like the best work of John Pilger, George Monbiot and Naomi Klein, The Racket is investigative, passionate journalism with a purpose – to defend the powerless against rapacious power. A hugely important tour de force, it will inform and inspire resistance movements for years to come."
Ian Sinclair, Red Pepper

“With this, his second book, Matt Kennard has announced his presence on the scene as the next generation’s John Pilger … Kennard does a brilliant job of tying the strands together and joining the dots between disparate struggles against corporate greed and imperial power around the world.”
Asa Winstanley, Middle East Monitor

“Timely and readable … Kennard ranges widely in his attempt to show the scope and depth of the Racket. From the ‘disaster capitalism’ imposed on an earthquake-traumatized Haiti to the undermining of democracy in Bolivia, Kennard lays bare the mechanics of the scam … This book is a valuable tool for anyone wishing to engage in the worldwide struggle for justice.”
New Internationalist

“Kennard decided to leave his comfortable job at the Financial Times and start to do some real journalism instead. The Racket, his second book, is very much the result of this transformation and it is nothing sort of marvellous. Angry, scornful and yet optimistic about the potential for change … the book makes a good case for Kennard being a true heir to John Pilger and the older generation of muckrakers.”
Morning Star

“The Racket is an exposé of the murky collusions between global high-finance and the militarised US state in the post-war era.”
Olivia Arigho Stiles, Alborada

“Matt Kennard threw away a cushy career with an establishment newspaper just to let you in on a secret: you don’t get the story, you get the cover-up.”
Greg Palast, author of The Best Democracy Money Can Buy and Vultures’ Picnic

“A brilliant atlas of what Kennard calls ‘heavy history’ – the hurricane-like path of global destruction wrought by neoliberalism and wars against the poor.”
Mike Davis, author of Planet of Slums and In Praise of Barbarians: Essays against Empire

“Matt Kennard exposes the failure of US neoliberalism and a major reason why China’s star is rising while American foreign policy is imploding into a black hole.”
John Perkins, author of Confessions of an Economic Hitman

"This firecracker of a book, written by a former insider journalist who realised the true, exploitative agenda of corporate media, unleashes a gonzo journey across the world of US empire. Read this book, be startled and then take action."
Antony Loewenstein, author of Profits of Doom

"I congratulate Matt Kennard for this brutally honest work."
Nawal El Saadawi, author of Woman at Point Zero

"Matt Kennard reveals the criminal and ruthless dynamics of global imperialism. His analysis is richly researched, keenly illustrative, and consistently on target. May this book get the wide readership it deserves."
Michael Parenti, author of The Face of Imperialism

"A masterpiece of engaged journalism."
Walden Bello, member of the House of Representatives of the Philippines

"Matt Kennard puts no deodorant on the reptiles' waste in the imperial barnyard."
Gavin MacFadyen, founder of the Centre for Investigative Journalism

"Includes unusually candid interviews with members of the World Bank and other financial institutions."
Publishers Weekly

"If I was editor of an old-fashioned newspaper, the kind that published and be damned, I'd hire Matt Kennard. The Racket is a front page story."
John Pilger, author of The New Rulers of the World

"In this important book, Kennard explores the direct impacts of militarized, globalized American capitalism on some of the most battered parts of our world. With devastating precision and a formidable sense of urgency, he reports on corporate shock doctors in Haiti, imperialist drug warriors in Honduras, pillaging coal and mining giants in southern Africa and Appalachia — and so much more. Most importantly, he never loses sight of the the growing numbers of resistors holding on to their creativity and self-determination in the face of these forces."
Naomi Klein, author of This Changes Everything and The Shock Doctrine

"Kennard is no conspiracy theorist. Whatever you think about his conclusions, this is a first-class piece of radical investigative journalism."

THE EMPIRE OF DELUSIONS

The public perception of the American empire, at least to those within the United States who have never seen the empire dominate and exploit the "wretched of the earth", is radically different from reality. These manufactured illusions, ones Joseph Conrad wrote so presciently about, posit that the empire is a force for good. The empire, we are told, fosters democracy and liberty. It spreads the benefits of "western civilization". These are deceptions repeated ad nauseum by a compliant media and mouthed by politicians, academics and the powerful. But they are lies, as all of us who have spent years reporting overseas understand.

Matt Kennard in his book The Racket – where he reports from Haiti, Bolivia, Turkey, Palestine, Egypt, Tunisia, Mexico, Colombia and many other places – rips back the veil. He exposes the hidden machinery of empire. He details its brutality, mendacity, cruelty and its dangerous self-delusions.

In the late stage of empire, the image sold to a gullible public begins to entrance the mandarins of empire. They make decisions based not on reality, but on their distorted visions of reality, one colored by their own propaganda. Matt refers to this as "the racket". Blinded by hubris and power they come to believe their deceptions, propeling the empire towards collective suicide. They retreat into a fantasy where hard and unpleasant facts no longer intrude. They replace diplomacy, multilateralism and politics with unilateral threats and the blunt instrument of war. They become the purblind architects of their own destruction.

Matt writes:

> A couple of years after my initiation at the Financial Times a few things started to become clearer. I came to realize a difference between myself and the rest of the people staffing the racket – the United States Agency for International Development (USAID) workers, the economists in the International Monetary Fund (IMF), and > so on. While I was coming to understand how the racket really worked, I started to see them as willing dupes. There was no doubt they seemed to believe in the virtue of the mission; they imbibed all the theories that were meant to dress up global exploitation in the language of "development" and "progress." I saw this with American ambassadors in Bolivia and Haiti, and with countless other functionaries I interviewed. They genuinely believe the myths, and of course are paid handsomely to do so. To help these agents of the racket get up in the morning there also exists, throughout the West, a well-stocked army of intellectuals whose sole purpose is to make theft and brutality acceptable to the general population of the US and its racketeering allies.

The United States carried out one of the greatest strategic blunders in its history, one that sounded the death knell of the empire, when it invaded and occupied for two decades Afghanistan and Iraq. The architects of the war in the George W. Bush White House, and the array of useful idiots in the press and academia who were cheerleaders for it, knew very little about the countries being invaded. They believed their technological superiority made them invincible. They were blindsided by the ferocious blowback and armed resistance that led to their defeat. This was something those of us who knew the Middle East – I was the Middle East Bureau Chief for the New York Times, speak Arabic, and reported from the region for seven years – predicted.

But those intent on war preferred a comforting fantasy. They stated, and probably believed, that Saddam Hussein had weapons of mass destruction, although they had no valid evidence to support this claim. They insisted that democracy would be implanted in Baghdad and spread across the Middle East. They assured the public that US troops would be greeted by grateful Iraqis and Afghans as liberators. They promised that oil revenues would cover the cost of reconstruction. They insisted that the bold and quick military strike – "shock and awe" – would restore American hegemony in the region and dominance in the world. It did the opposite. As Zbigniew Brzezinski noted, this "unilateral war of choice against Iraq precipitated a widespread delegitimation of US foreign policy".[1]

THE WAR STATE

America since the end of World War II has become a stratocracy – government dominated by the military. There is a constant preparation for war. The war machine's massive budgets are sacrosanct. Its billions of dollars in waste and fraud are ignored. Its military fiascos in Southeast Asia, Central Asia and the Middle East disappear into the vast black hole of historical amnesia. This amnesia, which means there is never accountability, licences the war machine to leap from military debacle to debacle while it economically disembowels the country. The militarists win every election. They cannot lose. It is impossible to vote against them. The war state is a Götterdämmerung, as Dwight Macdonald writes, "without the gods".

Since the end of World War II, the federal government has spent more than half its tax dollars on past, current and future military operations. It is the largest single sustaining activity of the government. Military systems are sold before they are produced with guarantees that huge cost overruns will be covered.

Foreign aid is contingent on buying US weapons. Egypt, which receives some $1.3 billion in foreign military financing, is required to devote it to buying and maintaining US weapons systems.[2] Israel, meanwhile, has received $158 billion in bilateral assistance from the US since 1949, almost all of it since 1971 in the form of military aid, with most of it going towards arms purchases from American weapons manufacturers.[3]

The US public funds the research, development and building of weapons systems and then buys these same weapons systems on behalf of foreign governments. It is a circular system of corporate welfare.

In the year to September 2022, the US spent $877 billion on the military.[4] This was more than the next 10 countries – including China, Russia, Germany, France and the United Kingdom – combined. These huge military expenditures, along with the rising costs of a for-profit healthcare system, have driven the US national debt to over $31 trillion, nearly $5 trillion more than the US's entire Gross Domestic Product (GDP).[5]

This imbalance is not sustainable, especially once the dollar is no longer the world's reserve currency. As of January 2023, the US spent a record $213 billion servicing the interest on its national debt.[6]

THE EMPIRE AT HOME

The military machine, by diverting funds and resources to endless war, disembowels and impoverishes the nation at home, as Matt's reporting from Washington, Baltimore and New York illustrates.

The cost to the public – socially, economically, politically and culturally – is catastrophic. Workers are reduced to subsistence level and preyed upon by corporations that have privatized every facet of society from health care and education to the prison-industrial complex. Militarists divert funds from social and infrastructure programs. They pour money into research and development of weapons systems and neglect renewable energy technologies. Bridges, roads, electrical grids and levees collapse. Schools decay. Domestic manufacturing declines. Our public transportation system is a shambles. Militarized police gun down mostly unarmed, poor people of color and fill a system of penitentiaries and jails that hold a staggering 25 percent of the world's prisoners although Americans represent only 5 percent of the global population.[7] Cities, deindustrialized, are in ruins. Opioid addiction, suicide, mass shootings, depression and morbid obesity plague a population that has fallen into profound despair.

Militarized societies are fertile ground for demagogues. Militarists, like demagogues, see other nations and cultures in their own image – threatening and aggressive. They seek only domination. They peddle illusions of a return to a mythical golden age of total power and unlimited prosperity. The deep disillusionment and anger that led to Donald Trump's election – a reaction to the corporate coup d'état and the poverty afflicting at least half of the country – have destroyed the myth of a functioning democracy.

As Matt notes:

> The American elite that has grown fat from looting abroad is also fighting a war at home. From the 1970s onwards, the same white-collar mobsters have been winning a war against the people of the US, in the form of a massive, underhand con. They have slowly but surely managed to sell off much of what the American people used to own under the guise of various fraudulent ideologies such as the "free market." This is the "American way," a giant swindle, a grand hustle. In this sense, the victims of the racket are not just in Port-au-Prince and Baghdad; they are also in Chicago and New York City. The same people that devise the myths about what we do abroad have also built up a similar ideological system that legitimizes theft at home; theft from the poorest, by the richest. The poor and working people of Harlem have more in common with the poor and working people of Haiti than they do with their elites, but this has to be obscured for the racket to work. Many actions taken by the US government, in fact, habitually harm the poorest and most destitute of its citizens. The > North American Free Trade Agreement (NAFTA) is a good example. It came into force in January 1994 and was a fantastic opportunity for US business interests, because markets were opened up for an investment and export bonanza. Simultaneously, thousands of US workers lost their jobs to workers in Mexico where their wages could be beaten down by even poorer people.

SELF-IMMOLATION

The public, bombarded with war propaganda, cheers on their self-immolation. It revels in the despicable beauty of US military prowess. It speaks in the thought-terminating clichés spewed out by mass culture and mass media. It imbibes the illusion of omnipotence and wallows in self-adulation. The mantra of the militarized state is national security. If every discussion begins with a question of national security, every answer includes force or the threat of force. The preoccupation with internal and external threats divides the world into friend and foe, good and evil.

Those such as Julian Assange who expose the crimes and suicidal folly of empire, are ruthlessly persecuted. The truth, a truth Matt uncovers, is bitter and hard.

> “While rising empires are often judicious, even rational in their application of armed force for conquest and control of overseas dominions, fading empires are inclined to ill-considered displays of power, dreaming of bold military masterstrokes that would somehow recoup lost prestige and power,” the historian Alfred McCoy writes.[8] “Often irrational even from an imperial point of view, these micro military operations can yield hemorrhaging expenditures or humiliating defeats that only accelerate the process already under way.”

It is vital we see what lies before us. If we continue to be entranced by the images on the walls of Plato’s cave, images that bombard us on screens day and night, if we fail to understand how empire works and its self-destructiveness we will all, especially with the looming climate crisis, descend into a Hobbesian nightmare where the tools of repression, so familiar on the outer reaches of empire, cement into place terrifying corporate totalitarian states.

PREFACE

THE EMPIRE IS EVERYWHERE

Four years after The Racket was first published, I started my own media outlet with historian and journalist Mark Curtis. It was a departure from what I had focused on before – the consequences of US imperialism around the world – because this new publication, Declassified UK, would cover British foreign policy.

Britain handed the mantle of world domination to the US after World War II and the received history is that it then retired from any kind of imperial role. I found out pretty quickly at Declassified that this was a misunderstanding. The truth is the empire never died. Britain merely became a "junior partner" to the US hegemon. London's adjunct status did not mean it was insignificant, however. The City of London's role as the world's financial capital which spreads neoliberalism around the world, the UK's vast network of military bases, alongside its corporate giants like BP and BAE Systems, showed Britain still served a critical imperial role for its senior partner.

But a more interesting realization for me came when I started to look at the institutions that make up the US empire and their role in Britain. I had spent years looking at what institutions like the CIA, the National Endowment for Democracy, or the US military were doing in the Global South, where their power was exercised against often weak states. A lot of this work is documented in this book. But I saw quickly that the infrastructure of the US empire which had colonized so much of the world had also colonized my home country, the country where I had lived nearly all my life. Britain, in fact, appeared to be more completely under the control of its American ally than any country I'd looked into around the world for this book.

The similarities did not stop there. Like the mainstream media could never mention the term "US empire" or explain its real role in world affairs, those same establishment journalists did not touch US influence in Britain. This was, again, an invisible empire, hiding in plain sight. The work I began doing would have never made it into the Financial Times, like so many truths in this book never could.

SOMETHING DIFFERENT

The colonization by the US empire of Britain became particularly clear when the Labour Party elected Jeremy Corbyn leader in September 2015. A veteran anti-war and anti-imperialist politician and activist, Corbyn was a complete outlier within the British political system. He was dangerous to the rule of the British establishment, but also the ability of the US to retain the UK as a vassal state. The different pressure points that stay hidden in normal times, when the system is running like it should, quickly became exposed. This was made explicit in June 2019, when US Secretary of State Mike Pompeo visited the UK and was recorded saying privately: "It could be that Mr Corbyn manages to run the gauntlet and get elected. It's possible. You should know, we won't wait for him to do those things to begin to push back. We will do our level best. It's too risky and too important and too hard once it's already happened."[1]

Pompeo had served as CIA director from 2017–18 and Corbyn later told me he believed Pompeo's comments were intended as "a quite deliberate message" to him. Corbyn then mentioned the CIA-organised overthrow of Chile's democratically-elected president Salvador Allende in 1973.[2]

Britain's traditional subservience to the US "could have gone a different way at various points in modern history, recently if Jeremy Corbyn hadn't been destroyed by a vicious media campaign," Noam Chomsky has written.[3] But it was not a coincidence. The US was integral to building a British political system that made a "different way" next to impossible. I began looking at how the US state had been interfering in British politics to stop the rise of anti-imperialist leaders. The UK has never had a prime minister that was not signed up to the American imperial project. I started to realize this was not a mistake, but the result of concerted efforts from Washington.

BRITISH-AMERICAN PROJECT

One particularly interesting organization was the British-American Project which describes itself as "a transatlantic fellowship of over 1,200 leaders, rising stars and opinion formers from a broad spectrum of occupations, backgrounds, and political views."[4] Work to create the BAP began, with funding from the US embassy in London, in the early 1980s when Labour was headed by Michael Foot, the first non-Atlanticist Labour leader to emerge since World War II. The BAP's aim was to push British progressives into a pro-American political position at a time when the CIA was worried about the strength of the Labour left and its "anti-American" views.

Many Labour figures who became outspoken critics of Corbyn's leadership from 2015–20 were also involved in the BAP. Corbyn was the first non-Atlanticist Labour leader since Foot resigned in 1983.

Declassified files from the CIA show how concerned the intelligence agency then was by the left turn in Labour. The BBC noted "the deep level of concern inside the CIA about the strength of the Left within Labour in the early 1980s, a political force which the agency regarded as anti-American."[5] The CIA was particularly concerned about Foot winning the 1983 general election, with an internal report stating that "a Labor majority government would represent the greatest threat to US interests." Foot's 1983 election manifesto questioned "the programme for establishing American-controlled Cruise missiles on our soil" and noted that a new European security pact should end with the "phasing out" of NATO.[6]

DEEPLY SUSPICIOUS

The BAP's own official history notes that "the traditional British left-wing remained deeply suspicious of the United States, particularly on foreign policy and security issues" in the period, adding "this was the era of Michael Foot's leadership of a Labour Party committed to unilateral nuclear disarmament."[7]

Historian Stephen Dorril has written that Eugene Rostow, President Reagan's director of the US arms control and disarmament agency, was in 1982 "concerned about the growing unilateralist movement" and "helped initiate a … propaganda exercise in Britain, aimed at neutralizing the efforts of CND."[8] Michael Foot was a founder and strong supporter of the Campaign for Nuclear Disarmament (CND), while Corbyn has been a member of the peace group since he was 15 and was now vice-chair.

The US neutralization campaign, which was leaked to the Washington Post,

5 highlighters

"would take three forms," Dorrill continued: mobilizing public opinion, working within the churches, and a "dirty tricks" operation against the peace groups. William Casey, then head of the CIA, met with the US Information Agency to organize the propaganda campaign in Europe. But in 1985, with Foot defeated and the BAP established, the CIA expressed concern that the Labour Party was still "in the hands of urban leftists given to ideological extremes."[9]

The CIA made its 1980s files about Labour available online in 2017, soon after Corbyn was elected leader. They were extensively covered by the British media and contained two specific references to Corbyn, who was a Labour MP at the time.

One file noted Corbyn's support in 1986 for an El Salvadoran trade union federation, Fenastras, which was linked to Marxist guerrillas during the country's civil war, while the Americans backed the military government.[10] Corbyn was also mentioned in a US diplomatic cable sent from Istanbul in 2002, and published by WikiLeaks, describing a protest in the city against the US push for war in Iraq, which embassy staff apparently monitored. "Union leaders made speeches and the crowd chanted anti-US and anti-war slogans including 'No to Imperialist War,' and 'We Will Not Be American Soldiers'," the cable noted, adding that "speakers included a British Member of Parliament, Jeremy Corbyn from the Labor Party."[11]

THE MEDIA

The BAP and its cultivation of the progressive forces in Britain to a pro-American position reminded me of what I had seen around the world, with the funding of civil society to keep target societies under US control. I started then looking at some of the specific institutions I'd seen enforcing US control in places like Bolivia and Ecuador. One of them – the National Endowment for Democracy (NED) – pops up regularly throughout The Racket. I quickly found that the NED was also working in the UK, funding media groups, something which had picked up around 2015, the year Corbyn was first elected leader of the Labour Party. A nonprofit corporation funded by the US Congress, it had ploughed over £2.6m into seven British independent media groups in the five years up to 2020.[12]

The NED was "created … to do in the open what the Central Intelligence Agency has done surreptitiously for decades," the New York Times reported in 1997.[13] That included spending millions of dollars to "support things like political parties, labor unions, dissident movements and the news media in dozens of countries." Since the end of the Cold War, the NED had grown and been involved in trying to undermine or remove governments independent of Washington, including democratic ones in Bolivia, Ecuador and Venezuela, as I document in this book. Allen Weinstein, the director of the research study that led to creation of the NED in the 1980s, remarked in 1991: "A lot of what we do today was done covertly 25 years ago by the CIA."[14]

The NED traditionally focused on Eastern Europe, Latin America and Asia. But I found the organization had recently funded three British media outlets and four UK press freedom groups. All were seen as on the progressive end of the political spectrum.

INFRASTRUCTURE OF DEMOCRACY

The NED was created in 1983 by President Ronald Reagan, who actually set out the idea in a set-piece speech in Westminster, in front of prime minister Margaret Thatcher. The aim, he said, was "to foster the infrastructure of democracy". This was a time of embarrassing scandals for the CIA. A Washington Post article soon noted: "The old concept of covert action, which has gotten the agency [CIA] into such trouble during the past 40 years, may be obsolete."[15]

The NED was meant to defend against these scandals by putting certain programs out into the open. "The sugar daddy of overt operations has been the National Endowment for Democracy," the Washington Post continued. "Through the late 1980s, it did openly what had once been unspeakably covert." CIA whistleblower Philip Agee, who served in the agency in the 1960s, commented in 1995: "Nowadays, instead of having just the CIA going around behind the scenes and trying to manipulate the process secretly by inserting money here and instructions there and so forth, they have now a sidekick, which is this National Endowment for Democracy."[16]

John Kiriakou, a CIA officer from 1990 to 2004, told me that recent changes in the law have widened the potential targets of US information operations. "In 2011, the US Congress changed the law that forbade the Executive Branch from propagandizing the American people or nationals of the other 'Five Eyes' countries – the UK, Canada, Australia, and New Zealand," he said.

"The National Endowment for Democracy, like Radio Free Europe/Radio Liberty, countless Washington-area 'think tanks', and Radio/TV Martí, are the vehicles for that propaganda," he added, referring to the US broadcaster that transmits to Cuba.

Kiriakou, who served in the agency's core Directorate of Operations, continued: "And what better way to spread that propaganda than to funnel money to 'friendly' outlets in 'friendly countries'? The CIA's propaganda efforts throughout history have been shameless. But now that they're not legally relegated to just Russia and China, the whole world is a target."

FUNDING

One particularly interesting case was Index on Censorship, the UK's foremost free expression group which monitors threats to free speech and publishes censored writers. It received £603,257 from the NED in 2016–21, according to its Charity Commission accounts.[17]

Index's chief executive, the former Labour MP Ruth Smeeth, was appointed in June 2020 – six months after losing her seat in parliament. A US diplomatic cable, published by WikiLeaks in 2010, named Smeeth as a "strictly protect" informant for the US embassy in London.[18] The cable – written in 2009 by US deputy chief of mission in London, Richard LeBaron – noted: "Labour Prospective Parliamentary Candidate for Burton Ruth Smeeth (strictly protect) told us April 20 that [prime minister Gordon] Brown had intended to announce the elections on May 12." The cable continued that "a despondent Smeeth said" Brown had to abandon his election plan after a drop in Labour's poll numbers following a media scandal. LeBaron added: "This information has not been reported in the press." The cable was classified as "confidential" and "not for foreign eyes".

One of the founders of Index in 1972, the poet Stephen Spender, had earlier resigned as editor of Encounter magazine when it was exposed as being funded by the CIA. Spender said he was unaware of the funding arrangements. Spender then founded Index, and quickly solicited a "substantial grant" from the Ford Foundation, which Frances Stonor Saunders states, in her award-winning work The Cultural Cold War, acted as a conduit for CIA funds in the period. Saunders told me it was "widely known at the time the Ford Foundation was a witting partner of the CIA." In her book, Saunders wrote: "The foundation's archives reveal a raft of joint projects."[19]

This is how it works. Not just in the developing world, but, I was learning, in the developed world, too. In fact, the control was even deeper.

THE HIDDEN FIST

I soon understood that the US was not just interfering in the British political process, media and civil society. The hidden fist of the US empire which I'd seen deployed all over the developing world – the massive American military – was also occupying Britain.

I found the US Air Force (USAF) had 9,730 personnel permanently deployed throughout Britain, a number which was increasing rapidly.[20] Britain, in fact, hosted the third highest level of USAF personnel of any country in the world, ahead of historic US military outposts like South Korea and Italy. These American airmen had flown bombing missions to Afghanistan, Iraq and Libya from their bases in Britain. "The USAF presence in Britain isn't just some remnant of the Cold War, it's ongoing and very active," Kate Hudson, chair of the CND, told me. During Ukraine tensions in 2022, huge American B-52 nuclear-capable bombers were seen leaving and arriving at a RAF base in Gloucestershire. "The US says they were on a training exercise to ensure they are 'ready', presumably for war on Ukraine," Hudson added. "Once again we have a situation where war or other military actions can be prosecuted from Britain without parliamentary scrutiny."

Of the 55,223 active-duty US airmen deployed overseas in 2021, 16 percent were hosted in Britain. There were, in fact, more active-duty USAF personnel in Britain than in 40 of the US's own States. This included Maryland, which hosts Joint Base Andrews, home to Air Force One and known as "America's Airfield". US military personnel in Britain are all in England, with access to 11 Royal Air Force (RAF) bases, stretching from Cambridgeshire to Yorkshire. They are known officially as United States Visiting Forces (USVF). Altogether there were 12,147 US military personnel in Britain in March 2022. A further 150 Americans are deployed with NATO, the majority at its intelligence center at RAF Molesworth in Cambridgeshire. The US military also had 100 personnel based in London, including 52 inside the American embassy, and a further 135 people deployed at multiple undisclosed locations across the UK.

THE JEWEL IN THE CROWN

The largest US military presence is at RAF Lakenheath, a 727 hectare site in Suffolk. Despite being called an RAF base, it is leased to the USAF, and its population is overwhelmingly American. There were 5,404 US Department of Defense personnel based there in 2022. A nondescript village with a population of 5,000 people, Lakenheath directly abuts the US base and has a clear American influence. The Turkish barbers proudly displays the Stars and Stripes alongside the Union Jack on its shop front. The Volvo car dealership on the outskirts sells only to US military personnel.

In the Co-Op on the quiet High Street, Klara, 24, is stacking shelves. She followed her boyfriend, an engineer, to Lakenheath a year ago after he found work nearby. “It has been quite weird at times, because obviously there’s a lot of people moving in and out throughout the year,” she told me. “Especially working in the shop, I do see a lot of new faces for such a small village.” She added, “There’s a lot of Americans coming in.” Klara said the US aircraft have become more frequent in recent months. “When I first moved here, they used to fly every three hours, just five or six planes at once, but recently, the past two or three months, they’ve been flying quite a few every few hours, so it’s got more over the months.” She added, “With the planes it does get loud sometimes.” Does she have any security fears about living next to a USAF base?, I asked. “Personally I do think about it. If war does happen, we are kind of like the target aren’t we, with the base right there, so yeah it is a bit scary sometimes, if you actually properly think about it.”

A road sign for cars exiting RAF Lakenheath reminds drivers to “Drive On The Left”. The issue has been on the national agenda since 2019 when 19-year-old Harry Dunn was killed by the wife of a CIA officer driving on the wrong side of the road near RAF Croughton, another US-leased base in Northamptonshire. The US helped the driver, Anne Sacoolas, leave the country soon after and later said she had diplomatic immunity for the alleged crime. As well as being a CIA base, RAF Croughton is a USAF communications station and accounts for 25 percent of all military communications from Europe back to the US.[21]

COMMAND AND CONTROL

The US is spending billions of pounds upgrading air bases in the UK to enable Washington to intercept international communications and launch military strikes from Britain more quickly. Some of the locations are hubs for offensive bombing missions. RAF Fairford in Gloucestershire is the USAF's only bomber Forward Operating Location, or military base, in Europe.[22] The aircraft deployed there "enable US and NATO warfighters to conduct a full spectrum of flying operations". Made available by the British government, it was used by US bombers during the war in Iraq in 2003. Just after I visited, two nuclear-capable American B-52 bombers were spotted leaving RAF Fairford for a "target acquisition" exercise over mainland Europe.[23]

But the UK appears to have very little control over what happens on the USAF-operated bases or the missions that are flown from them. The overarching framework for the stationing of US forces in the UK comes from two pieces of legislation. In 1951, NATO agreed a Status of Forces Agreement to govern hosting arrangements between its member states. The following year, The Visiting Forces Act incorporated the NATO agreement into UK law.[24] But Kate Hudson said that these agreements "ultimately reserve jurisdiction of US personnel to the US." Most of the American bases are called RAF stations and leased by the US. "Because of this, while the physical buildings comprising the bases are usually the property of the UK Ministry of Defence, very little of what happens in them is controlled by the British government," Hudson said. The empire never sleeps. And, despite the mainstream media working to keep it invisible, it's everywhere.

This book has been a decade in the making and involved travel to all corners of the globe. The overwhelming feeling I came away with is that our world – judged by how it treats its human family – is in dire straits. But wherever I've gone I've been filled with hope by seeing the brave and courageous individuals and groups resisting the violence and misery inflicted by the US-led military and economic machine. From Palestine to Honduras, from South Africa to Haiti, I'd like to thank all the people who have filled me with faith against the odds, often in the face of great danger. They have been resolute in the face of an ideological system that endlessly tells them their pain is for their own benefit. Thank you for resisting the power and the lies.

I am a fellow at the Centre for Investigative Journalism, which is a dream place to work. The CIJ is an institution dedicated to furthering adversarial and revelatory journalism in a media setting that increasingly ignores it. In particular its director, Gavin MacFadyen, has been an inspiration for his passion and courage in supporting whistleblowers and journalists working in difficult environments. He is the model of what a journalist should be. Also at the CIJ I've been lucky enough to work closely with a great investigative journalist, Claire Provost. The Bertha Foundation's support, meanwhile, has allowed me to pursue controversial stories and concentrate on doing the journalism I love. Kika Sroka-Miller at Zed Books was brilliant in helping me form the ideas and structure of the book, so a big thank you to her. Also at Zed, Jonathan Maunder and Dan Och made countless invaluable and insightful suggestions to get the book in shape. Janet Law gave the text a rigorous and stringent copy-edit. As has probably been the case for millions of people around the world, Noam Chomsky has been the most influential person in my intellectual and political development. Since I was a student journalist in the middle of my political awakening he has responded consistently and over many years to my enquiries with patience and unfailing insight. Thanks for everything, Professor.

The book is dedicated to Ana, my soulmate and fellow rebel. So much of the reporting in this book has been done with her or because of her. Without her inspiration, help on the ground, and companionship and love, this book would have been impossible. It was in discussion with her that many of the ideas in this book formed. The book is also dedicated to Chelsea Manning, our generation's hero. At great personal cost she singlehandedly changed the course of history and gave us a historic glance at the true mechanics of power as wielded by the most powerful country in the world. History will judge her kindly, but she continues to suffer now. That should stop immediately. Her fellow whistleblowers Edward Snowden, Jesselyn Radack, Thomas Drake, William Binney, John Kiriakou, among many others, have also inspired me by their bravery and example.

My parents, Judy and Peter, gave me the tools for free thinking and supported me through the years of trying to understand the world as witnessed in this book. Without knowing they had my back and believed in what I was doing, it might have been overwhelming. The example they have set in their lives made it much easier to resist the seductions of the corporate world, which I briefly and unhappily glimpsed. My brother has been constantly supportive and believed in me always. Thank you, Dan. A continuous struggle against forces that sometimes appear inevitable can lead to despair, but I have been blessed with friends and family from when I was young (and some newer) who have always made me laugh and kept me energized. Thanks to: Harry, Frankie, Dave, Tom, Billy, Patrick, Jack, Declan, Luke, Jake, Dave C, Ellie, Nick T, Ishmail, Speak, Al D, Ivor, Adam, Lex, Shane, Stuart, Chris, Charlie, Watson, Whybrow, Loz, Dan J, Eugene, Alicia, Lucia, Pati, Nick, Pilar, Suey, my grandma Mary, William, Lucy, Camilla, Hugh and Ralph.

Although this book would have been impossible without the people listed above, none is responsible for what's written in the following pages.

I spent 33 years and four months in active military service and during that period I spent most of my time as a high-class muscle man for Big Business, for Wall Street and the bankers. In short, I was a racketeer, a gangster for capitalism. I helped make Mexico and especially Tampico safe for American oil interests in 1914. I helped make Haiti and Cuba a decent place for the National City Bank boys to collect revenues in. I helped in the raping of half a dozen Central American republics for the benefit of Wall Street. I helped purify Nicaragua for the International Banking House of Brown Brothers in 1902–1912. I brought light to the Dominican Republic for the American sugar interests in 1916. I helped make Honduras right for the American fruit companies in 1903. In China in 1927 I helped see to it that Standard Oil went on its way unmolested. Looking back on it, I might have given Al Capone a few hints. The best he could do was to operate his racket in three districts. I operated on three continents.

Major General Smedley Butler, who died the most decorated US Marine in American history, in a speech given in 1933

INTRODUCTION

I started working as a reporter at the Financial Times soon after the financial crisis began and at the height of the so-called “War on Terror”. I was a young, ambitious reporter assigned to one of the world’s most respected broadsheets, ready to speak the truth. I learnt soon enough that this was not the place to do it. Maybe I should have guessed. In the aftermath of the 9/11 terrorist attacks in New York City and Washington, I had had a partial awakening. As the war drums sounded in 2003, I learnt that the United States and the United Kingdom, despite now pushing for a war with him, had, in the 1980s, been supporting Saddam Hussein. The man we were presenting as the devil incarnate had only years earlier been our buddy. Soon after, I saw that my government thought nothing of rewriting intelligence to trick its own citizens into a totally illegal war. I thought, maybe naively, that working at the FT would allow me to continue learning, and in some senses I was right, though not the lessons they intended. There I was exposed to the other side of this war-industry coin – the world of high finance. These wars were not the vanity project of deluded leaders; they were merely the latest stage in a global elite’s prolonged war on the people of our world with the sole aim of pumping up their bottom line. I saw the real rulers of the world up close now – they were not the politicians but the big-money men behind them, the puppeteers who made everything move. I was stationed at their house organ, so raising the alarm did not, to put it politely, go well.

8 highlighters

Over the following years, I witnessed first-hand how powerful the propaganda system that covers for these racketeers really is. It is almost impossible to go up against it as an individual on the inside (I tried). I was based at the FT in Washington, DC and New York, but I also traveled extensively during this period, reporting from four continents, more than a dozen countries and the same number of cities within the US itself. Everything I saw contradicted what I had been told about how the world works. But as I wrestled with what I was doing, I knew in the back of my mind that, as a journalist, speaking out against this contradiction is a bad idea: doing so will instantly, and adversely, affect your career, which I suppose is why so few do it. If you speak out against the racketeers, well, you are instantly anti-American, you hate freedom, you love terrorists and so on. Ideological "training" of this kind is at its most potent in the racket-supporting media of the western world where I once worked (and it usually works to dispel independent thinking). I was actually taught this eyes-wide-shut philosophy first when I went to do a Masters at Columbia University's Journalism School in New York, apparently the best of its kind in the world, but in thrall to the racket and its lies, like the rest of the American elite. And the attempt to beat these critical thoughts out of my head continued as I progressed further up the hierarchy of the ideological system. On the day I left the Financial Times, for example, my boss told me simply: "Go away and do your 'save the world' stuff and maybe you can come back when you're a bit older." I took his advice, but I won't be back. Instead I present, eyes open still, the report they wouldn't send to press.

THE RACKETEERS

The United States emerged from World War II in a position of peerless global power. Western Europe and the Soviet Union were in ruins after six years of devastating warfare, and the imperial structures that had previously ruled most of the world were falling apart. The Americans meanwhile had made a miraculous recovery from the economic depression that had consumed the nation since the Wall Street Crash of 1929 and its place as No. 1 had been planned for quite consciously throughout the war. When it was realized in 1945, attention switched to extending the American elite's customer base, and so, at the close of World War II, the racket was set in place.

The Harvard evolutionary psychologist Steven Pinker once told me that power itself perverts human notions of morality and justice: "Dominance, fairness, and communality are three very different modes of thinking about social relationships. Someone in power will tend not to think of his relations to his or other peons in terms of fairness," he said. The American elite, its powerful big business players and allied governments (regardless of political party) are motivated by dominance, not fairness. The people in power know this – it is the population that is lied to. Of course, the need to pierce the propaganda bubble is not new. Every emperor, fat cat and superpower from time immemorial has willingly entertained myths about their actions so as to utilize the good-will of their people to pursue their own criminal enterprises. The historian Cornelius

Tacitus said it best at the height of Roman dominion. "The Romans create a desert," he wrote, "and call it peace." These myths that Americans are treated to from a young age – and this ideological training reaches out beyond US borders – still present the US as an impressive discontinuity in the world of power politics. Unlike all previous superpowers, the United States is a "moral" power, driven by principles and values, as opposed to domination and greed. America is "exceptional" we are told – not exceptionally violent, which is the truth, but exceptional to the extent that it has a "higher calling"; it is a "shining city upon a hill". A brief foray into the world with eyes open teaches you quickly that this is the opposite of the truth. But keeping your eyes open will always be harder than seeking solace in your own divine moral superiority and the turpitude of your enemies. And so the myth takes hold. Repeat after me: when the US does it, Terror is Peace-seeking; Domination is Partnership; Fear is Stability. It's easy.

THE BELIEVERS

A couple of years after my initiation at the Financial Times a few things started to become clearer. I came to realize a difference between myself and the rest of the people staffing the racket – the United States Agency for International Development (USAID) workers, the economists in the International Monetary Fund (IMF), and so on. While I was coming to understand how the racket really worked, I started to see them as willing dupes. There was no doubt they seemed to believe in the virtue of the mission; they imbibed all the theories that were meant to dress up global exploitation in the language of "development" and "progress". I saw this with American ambassadors in Bolivia and Haiti, and with countless other functionaries I interviewed. They genuinely believe the myths, and of course are paid handsomely to do so. To help these agents of the racket get up in the morning there also exists, throughout the West, a well-stocked army of intellectuals whose sole purpose is to make theft and brutality acceptable to the general population of the US and its racketeering allies. And this system of indoctrination is so ingrained in the media and university system that it is near impossible to even divine it. I remember writing an article for the Financial Times about former Egyptian dictator Hosni Mubarak, who was backed by over a billion dollars of US aid; the editors got rid of the factual prefix "US-backed" before Mubarak's name without even thinking. When I submitted another article using the prefix "Iranian-backed" for the Lebanese militia Hezbollah, it sailed through. That is how thought control operates and that is how the racket survives with its moral sheen intact.

Power has completely corrupted the minds of these people. When Rafael Correa, president of Ecuador, was closing down Manta, the US military base in his country, he told the Americans that they could keep it as long as they allowed Ecuador to put a military base in Miami. This was preposterous to Washington and its lackeys in the media – for them it is apparently a natural law that the US should be allowed the hundreds of military bases that disfigure sovereign states all around the world. That is the imperial mindset and it infects the entire American elite.

What will become clear as you read this book is that the patterns and modus operandi of the racket are repeated all over the world, over and over again. So, for example, the manner in which I saw American "aid agencies" and the National Endowment for Democracy (NED) subvert groups organizing independently in Bolivia is repeated in Ecuador, Venezuela, Brazil, all over Latin America, and in the rest of the world. The names of the individuals involved in each case are different but the dynamic is similar; the racket's method of control, so clever and hidden, is the same, and the names of the oppressors are interchangeable with any of the racketeers of the "American era". All have served the institutions that work to undermine individual or group sovereignty and increase the racketeers' control, whether the individuals staffing the racket be nice or horrible, good or bad, well-meaning or psychopathic – the institutions they serve continue to extinguish the yearning for independence of people the world over.

There is another, more insidious, part of this global control that will be discussed in the following pages as well. In addition to the dominance of the US elite, the succor given to American corporations by the racket has made the proliferation of US "culture" inevitable, creating a new dimension of so-called soft power. But, as you will see later, the racketeers are genuinely afraid of the creative arts. There exists the potential within our culture, and the arts, not just to expose the racket for what it is, but to help dismantle it. For this reason the racketeers continue to co-opt the arts and culture as much as possible: the CIA was supporting US arts throughout the Cold War, and no doubt continues to do so.

FOR YOUR OWN GOOD

The racket is bigger than the US elite, of course, and by now you may be thinking that it may have something to do with the capitalist system writ large. Yes, institutions like the World Bank represent a broad global capitalist class, but the US is the overwhelming power within these arrangements and the US military is the enforcer of capitalistic forces throughout our world. The mechanics of the racket have actually been pretty constant; the institutional structure erected to maintain a pretense of altruism while practicing savage domination has been replicated across the world for quite some time now. I witnessed not long ago, for example, US support for the military coup in Honduras in 2009, which threw out a democratically elected president so the racketeers could prop up the business community and their political puppets. But like I said before, you can be sure that a similar dynamic was in place when the US helped take out democratically elected presidents Jacobo Arbenz of Guatemala in 1954 and Salvador Allende of Chile in 1973, unleashing decades of hell on the people of those countries. The needs of this rapacious racket remain the needs of every dominant imperial class, communist or capitalist – more markets for their products, and complete subjugation of popular forces in their satellites.

But there is a twist to this story.

The American elite that has grown fat from looting abroad is also fighting a war at home. From the 1970s onwards, the same white-collar mobsters have been winning a war against the people of the US, in the form of a massive, underhand con. They have slowly but surely managed to sell off much of what the American people used to own under the guise of various fraudulent ideologies such as the “free market”. This is the “American way”, a giant swindle, a grand hustle. In this sense, the victims of the racket are not just in Port-au-Prince and Baghdad; they are also in Chicago and New York City. The same people that devise the myths about what we do abroad have also built up a similar ideological system that legitimizes theft at home; theft from the poorest, by the richest. The poor and working people of Harlem have more in common with the poor and working people of Haiti than they do with their elites, but this has to be obscured for the racket to work. Many actions taken by the US government, in fact, habitually harm the poorest and most destitute of its citizens. The North American Free Trade Agreement (NAFTA) is a good example. It came into force in January 1994 and was a fantastic opportunity for US business interests, because markets were opened up for an investment and export bonanza. Simultaneously, thousands of US workers lost their jobs to workers in Mexico where their wages could be beaten down by even poorer people. The inevitable conclusion is that our entire world is at the mercy of an elite business community who run it in secret.

The economic imperatives of this racket trump even the safety of working Americans. During the Iraq conflict in 2003, large parts of the Pentagon and the British "intelligence" community did not want to attack Iraq because they believed it would increase the threat of terrorism. But the ideological zeal within the racket to maintain a grip over a region with immense oil production was a higher priority than decreasing the threat to American lives. The racket, then, is a disaster for those poor countries submissive to it, but also for the majority of Americans. The American elite is not in the business of helping out its fellow citizens.

Perhaps for you the extent of US domination is unknown, or perhaps you half suspect it, in which case the pages that follow will provide indisputable evidence. For those readers who feel they already know the damage done by US foreign policy, the revelation will come from evidence of the damage done at home where the war against poor and ordinary working Americans is just as fierce. A vast ideological edifice has been built which presents brutal violence against the poor at home and abroad as altruism. It must be targeted at its foundations. As Harold Pinter wrote in his Nobel Prize-winning speech in 2005, when it comes to the US "it never happened. Nothing ever happened. Even while it was happening it wasn't happening. It didn't matter. It was of no interest." He continued: "The crimes of the United States have been systematic, constant, vicious, remorseless, but very few people have actually talked about them. You have to hand it to America. It has exercised a quite clinical manipulation of power worldwide while masquerading as a force for universal good. It's a brilliant, even witty, highly successful act of hypnosis."

6 highlighters

The media would have you believe that there is no racket, that it's purely an accident that we live in a world where 85 people, 85 people, own half the world's wealth while more children die of starvation every year than died in the Holocaust.[1] Of course it's not an accident, a mere quirk of history – it is the result of a huge injustice, the policies of a giant mob. To help our species and planet survive it is necessary to shake off the hypnosis and see the racket for what it is.

They know who they are; it's time to blow their cover.

ONE

CREATING A MODERN-DAY SLAVE STATE

PORT-AU-PRINCE, HAITI

I was standing open-mouthed outside the presidential palace in Port-au-Prince 18 months after the earthquake had devastated the city when a man approached selling his paintings. “What do you think of that?” he said, pointing to the collapsed palace behind us. I told him the truth: I was finding it hard to come to terms with the completeness of the destruction. The man, who later told me his name was Charles Renodin, smiled slightly. “Tell the world how we are living,” he requested. “Let them know.” He paused and added, “I live in the camp there,” pointing across the road, where opposite the crumbling presidential palace a vast expanse of tents – emblazoned with the logos of the US, China, Bill Gates, Carlos Slim, all competing shamelessly for brand recognition – spread out as far as the eye could see. “After the earthquake I lost my mum, my dad, one daughter, so I had to move to this camp. I don’t like it, it’s full of corruption, it’s run by gangs, and the little girls have to sell their bodies to eat,” he told me. “Little girls,” he added for emphasis. “Maybe eight or nine years old, getting raped every day. The police don’t do anything about it, the country has no law.” He told me that the Haitian people refer to the palace behind us, which should be a point of pride, as the “Devil’s House”. “It’s full of so much corruption, they don’t care about the people, they just want to make money, when the money comes they take it for themselves.” He was waiting on a house now so he could leave the camp, but he didn’t think it would happen any time soon: “The government has no plan.” In the camps, it was particularly bad news for women: “Because there is no work, women have to sell their bodies just to eat, the only job they have is to have sex for money. Men have to steal stuff – they have no choice.”

Like most in Haiti, Charles had an ambiguous feeling toward the thousands of non-governmental organizations (NGOs) working in his country. “Some come to help, some come to make money, they like us living like this because they make more money.” It is easy to dismiss such sentiments, but the global “rescue” industry really is big business. There is often a direct and positive correlation between American influence over smaller countries and the crises they experience. “After the earthquake they would give us food, water, but now everything has stopped. If you go inside this camp you don’t see water, people have to walk six miles to get water. That’s why crime is up.” He became more agitated. “Everything is crazy right now, we’re living just like animals. There is no everyday life, nobody has a job.” Haiti has arguably had more US intervention in the last hundred years than any other country in the world – that it ended like this is not wholly accidental. As Doctor Maigot poignantly says to Mrs Smith, an American, in Graham Greene’s The Comedians: “In the Western hemisphere, in Haiti and elsewhere, we live under the shadow of your great and prosperous country. Much patience and courage is needed to keep one’s head.”

The following day, I was driving down a long, dusty and typically bumpy road in the middle of Port-au-Prince when I came across some imposing metal gates. Behind them stood the E-Power electricity plant. The site was unlike the rest of the city, which lay in complete ruin, even a year and a half after the earthquake: it had burnished sheet-steel doors and perfectly tarmacked roads. I was on assignment with the Financial Times and being escorted in a 4x4 by the World Bank, which had its own particular kind of tour that seemed to ignore the massive tent cities whizzing past our windows. Here was the optimistic vision, they told me. In a capital city where electricity blackouts were a nightly occurrence, E-Power was the kind of company the international financial institutions (IFIs) running Haiti believed would lead “reform” – by taking power away from the state-run company, and running the business for profit. My World Bank guide was adamant that this was the way out of Haiti’s tragic past and present. I soon found out the company was founded in 2004 by a group of Haitian venture capitalists excited by the departure of social democratic President Jean-Bertrand Aristide. The aim, they said, was to “offer a solution to power generation in Haiti”. Sure enough, some years later, in 2006, the new US-backed President René Préval launched an open bid for a contract to provide electricity to Port-au-Prince. Seven companies took part. E-Power won.

For many in the Haitian business elite, such economic liberalization was to be the model for the new Haiti being built after the devastating 2010 earthquake. "The earthquake created trauma that could have been better exploited," Pierre-Marie Boisson, board director at E-Power, told me as we sat in the upmarket air-conditioned offices at the plant. "Because of the political process that took place after that, it took too much time." He added: "Earthquakes should be an opportunity because it destroyed. Where it is destroyed, we have to build. When we have to build we can create jobs, we can create a lot of changes, we can change a country."

However, Mr Boisson's cynicism about the slow rate of "exploitation" of the "opportunities" provided by the earthquake was not quite accurate. In the aftermath of the earthquake, the opportunity afforded by the destruction wreaked on Haiti was capitalized on immediately. As the dust was still settling in Port-au-Prince, the World Bank, the IMF and their regional analogues, alongside various US agencies – what became the de facto government in the absence of a Haitian alternative – carved up the society's different sectors and doled them out among themselves. The Inter-American Development Bank (IADB) got education and water, the World Bank bagged energy, while the United States Agency for International Development (USAID) – a body that will be examined later in this book – gratefully accepted the planned new industrial parks. Alexandre Abrantes, the World Bank's special envoy to Haiti, told me how it worked: "We basically have agreed that where each of us has the competitive advantage, we then divide … the sectors among ourselves, and add in some sectors which go together."

The mass privatization of state-run assets and the turning of Haiti into a Caribbean sweatshop – via an export-led garment production and cheap labor model that the US and the IFIs had been pushing from the mid-1990s through the 2000s – were now distinct possibilities. This could be enforced with minimal push back from a decimated civil society and a denuded government. All the extra-Haitian bodies, particularly the US government, shared this vision. "There is a lot of agreement, so I would say one of the unusual and very positive aspects about this project is that it is really done in partnership," Jean-Louis Warnholz, a State Department official working on Haiti, told me when I was back in New York. (Mr Warnholz asked not to be named, but Haitians deserve to know the officials who are designing their destruction.) Haiti was to be the next Top Model on the World Bank and IMF catwalk. The "partnership" (in which the Haitian people had no part) believed that rebuilding the capabilities of the Haitian state should play no role in its reconstruction. Instead, the solution to Haiti's problems lay in the creation of a flourishing private sector. "What's really going to change Haiti and make this process different from all the previous ones is the development of the private sector, and I think there's a consensus in that," José Agustín Aguerre, the Haiti manager for the IADB, told me. The bank disbursed $177 million in grant money in 2010 – more than any other multilateral source – to push this agenda.[1] "Private sector is the big difference, it's what will be creating wealth, creating jobs, not the public sector," he added. It seemed there was no alternative.

After the election of President Michel Martelly in May 2011, things remained easy for this private-sector-led "consensus": the IFIs and US not only had their Shock Event, but also their Shock President. Aristide, who was president in 1991, 1993–94, 1994–96 and 2001–04, continues to be the most popular politician in Haiti, but is banned from standing again for the presidency. In Martelly, the US government had found its "Chicago Boy", a more-than-willing partner for their economic program ("Chicago Boys" is a term which refers to the University of Chicago economists who helped dictators impose neoliberal capitalism in its early stages). All the major business groupings and IFIs I spoke to in Port-au-Prince were effusive in their support for the president. Carl-Auguste Boisson, general manager at E-Power, told me: "I am pleased by what I heard Martelly saying about the importance of private investment, especially when he was campaigning he was talking about things like providing private provision of public services." Kenneth Merten, the then US ambassador to Haiti, was similarly excited about the new president's privatization agenda. "A few privatizations of flourmills, but aside from that you haven't had much of anything in past decades," he told me. "That's the element that's been lacking here, you need a government that understand investment and I think Martelly and his folks do." For the US, a pliable figure like Martelly had been a long time coming. Despite many decades of effort, Haiti had not completely succumbed to the plans that its major patron had for it. And such recalcitrance had been causing increasing consternation in Washington.

HISTORY'S LONG SHADOW

In 1990, after the first democratic elections in Haiti's 200-year history, the US became hopeful of breaking up the corrupt state institutions which had been run as the personal fiefdoms of Papa and Baby Doc, the US-backed Duvalier dictators who had ruled Haiti viciously for nearly 40 years. Private capital would then be able to penetrate deeper into the country, and an economic model conducive to the interests of the rich countries could take firm root. But it wasn't going to plan. Instead of the US-orientated "reformer" many in Washington had hoped for, a huge mass movement, named Lavalas ("the flood"), propelled the social democrat priest Jean-Bertrand Aristide to a landslide victory. Over the next 20 years, the democratically elected Aristide would be ousted twice with US support, while the democratic hopes and dreams of Haiti's people would be quashed time and again. Aristide had become a nuisance in the eyes of Washington and so when he was put back in power in 2001 it was under the tacit agreement that he would allow the World Bank, the IMF and the US to institute their plan. It had been 11 years since the democratic elections, and still economic "reform" was slow. Something had to change: democracy was fine, but it had to be of use.

In this period, René Préval, a former ally of Aristide who served as president from 2006 to 2011, seemed to offer some hope for the Americans. "In the context of the developing world, we would most accurately describe him as a neo-liberal, particularly in that he has embraced free markets and foreign investment," notes one of the US embassy's diplomatic cables, released by WikiLeaks, sent from Port-au-Prince in 2007. But the leader the US was really after in that period looked more like Haitian-American businessman Dumas Siméus. A resident of Texas, he assured the US embassy, according to a diplomatic cable sent in 2005, "he would manage Haiti like a business". The same cable added: "Displaying abundant charm and energy, the 65-year-old said he had decided to run for President not only for Haiti's benefit, but also as a gesture of thanks to the United States." He was very clear about how he would do this: "The University of Chicago alum pledged to bring the 'Chicago Boys' to Haiti and establish a road map for change, promising investors would return." It was exactly what the US embassy wanted to hear; Siméus was the candidate they had been searching for. The cable concluded by noting that the millionaire Texan was a "potentially viable candidate" who could, unlike Aristide, "govern responsibly and maybe effectively" – code in this case for "in the US interest". The US deemed Martelly similarly "responsible".

But in many ways, US exasperation at the apparent reluctance of Haiti's leaders to sell off their country's assets and create an economic playground for foreign capital remains hard to understand. From the mid-1990s through the 2000s, the "Chicago Boys" had to all intents and purposes come to Haiti; the process of opening up Haiti's economy to the predations of foreign capital was well under way. The fetish of foreign investment was firmly rooted. In 1996 for example, the Haitian government had already, as one diplomatic cable published by WikiLeaks noted, "established legislation on the modernization of public enterprises, which allows foreign investors to participate in the management and/or ownership of state-owned enterprises." Moreover, a November 2002 law explicitly acknowledged the "crucial role of foreign investment in assuring economic growth and aims to facilitate, liberalize, and stimulate private investment in Haiti". The law gave foreign investors exactly the same rights and protections as Haitians. Months earlier in 2002, the Haitian parliament had voted for a new free trade zone law which provided "zones" with fiscal and customs incentives for foreign enterprises – for example, a 15-year tax exemption. In other words, post-Aristide, the government had "seen the light" and embraced the US-led vision for the post-dictatorship Haiti.

But these steps, it seems, were not enough. Only a "Chicago Boy" would do. Another WikiLeaks cable noted that in 1996 a "modernization commission" was set up to decide whether management contracts, long-term leases or capitalization was the best option for each of the companies to be privatized. The commission would also decide how much the Haitian government would retain of each asset, with a cap at 49 percent – a minority stake, stripping the Haitian people of control over their own industries.

This had an immediate effect. In 1998, two US companies, Seaboard and Continental Grain, purchased 70 percent of the state-owned flourmill. Despite this "progress", a diplomatic cable from 2005 lamented, "Some investments, however, still require government authorization," adding, "Investments in electricity, water and tele-communications require both government concession and approval. Additionally, investments in the public health sector must first receive authorization from the Ministry of Public Health and Population." It sounded like a reasonable demand from a sovereign country, but a sovereign country is exactly what the US didn't want Haiti to be. Two years after Aristide had been spirited out of the country by the Bush administration and the local oligarchs, and just before the victory of the "neoliberal" Préval in 2006, the US embassy noted witheringly: "Since the privatization of the cement factory, privatization has stalled and appears to have been put on hold." It added plaintively: "None of the major infrastructure-related enterprises (the airport, seaport, telephone company or electric company) have been privatized." The document continued: "Although these entities were supposed to have been privatized by 2002, persistent political crises, strong opposition from the former administration, and a general lack of political will have delayed the process indefinitely." The cable then noted a more plausible reason why this massive privatization program had not been enacted quite as smoothly as the US had hoped: "Some opposition to the privatization of state enterprises continues from groups such as employee's unions who have expressed opposition to workforce reductions that privatization might entail." Those pesky Haitians.

By 2008, then, the US embassy was disconsolate at the slow rate of progress and local intransigence. "Despite assurances that privatization is still a priority for the government … we are increasingly skeptical that privatization, in whatever form, will happen," one WikiLeaks cable noted. "Time is running out." The US, however, remained steadfast. "We will continue to advocate strongly on behalf of privatization and/or private management," one cable noted. It further advocated using IFIs such as the World Bank and the IMF to bribe the democratic government of Haiti, one of the staples of the "structural adjustment programs" explored later, although it is rare to see it spelled out in such clear language. "[The US embassy] repeats its recommendation … that privatization be a requirement under future agreements with the IFIs … to be negotiated with the new government," the cable to Washington noted.

THE SHOCK

Bribery might prove an effective strategy toward the poorest country in the western hemisphere, but it would still be messy. There was after all a Haitian parliament, populated with nationalist elements, which could continue to stall or even kill the massive privatization program the US favored. But as the US was honing its strategy for its latest push, on January 12, 2010 a huge earthquake hit Port-au-Prince and surrounding areas, creating one of the worst humanitarian crises in the history of the world. More than 300,000 people were killed, while millions became homeless. The capital city lay in ruins, including the majority of government ministries as well as the presidential palace. What was left of an already strangled civil society and social institutions was destroyed. Haiti was a blank slate.

The US and its allies in the IMF and World Bank did not waste any time – this was their opportunity to push through the radical neoliberal program from the 1990s with little resistance. The opposition to this privatization program – which had ranged from quasi-nationalist politicians to worker-based collectives – had all but disappeared. Without a government in place to agree or disagree with the US and the IFIs, which were soon running the country, Haiti was ready for the "shock doctrine" – the radical economic prescriptions enforced throughout the world and outlined in Naomi Klein's eponymous book. Klein's argument was that these policies were so unpopular among the populations of the target countries that the agents of big capital, such as the IMF and World Bank, would wait until there was a crisis "real or perceived", when people could not organize resistance, to push the reforms through. This is what happened in Haiti.

The first step was to entrench a decision-making system that took all power out of the hands of accountable democratic institutions run by Haitians. The Interim Haiti Recovery Commission (IHRC), which became the country's most powerful decision-making body in the aftermath of the earthquake, was the perfect example of this move. The IHRC was set up ostensibly to coordinate the response and spend donor money in the absence of a Haitian government. It had 26 members, 12 of whom were Haitian, leaving them without a voting majority (just as they were not allowed a majority stake in their industries). To those Haitian members, it was obvious they were window-dressing. In a December 2010 letter of protest to the IHRC chair, former US president Bill Clinton, they complained of being "completely disconnected from the activities of the IHRC", as well as having "time neither to read, nor analyze, nor understand – and much less respond intelligently – to projects submitted". According to one journalist based in Port-au-Prince: "These twelve board members surmised that their only function is to rubber-stamp, as Haitian-approved, decisions already made by the executive committee."

That was exactly the perception that the US and the IFIs were trying to avoid. When officials from the US and international agencies in Haiti were interviewed they were at pains to explain how they were "working for the Haitians" and the phrase of the day was "Haitian-led". It was the same all over the world – the US and its agencies were adept at making their domination be seen as demanded by the victim. In truth, there was, and continued to be, minimal Haitian involvement in the reconstruction (outside the business elite). An article in the Washington Post put it bluntly in January 2011: "There is a dramatic power imbalance between the international community – under US leadership – and Haiti. The former monopolizes economic and political power and calls all the shots." The financial benefits to the American private sector of this set-up were immediately obvious. An Associated Press investigation found that of every $100 of Haiti reconstruction contracts awarded by the American government, $98.40 returned to American companies.[2] The focus was never on building up indigenous capacity; any work was to be outsourced to foreign companies or NGOs by the IHRC. It was about making money for rich Americans. After Michel Martelly was sworn in as president in May 2011, it took months for the former pop star and former member of the savage Tonton Macoute militia (formed by the US-backed dictator 'Papa Doc' Duvalier) to form a government, as his candidates for cabinet positions were repeatedly rejected by parliament. By the time his administration was in place in June 2011, 18 months after the earthquake, the coordinates of the economic reconstruction were already in place. Martelly's hands were tied by the very IFIs which claimed to be subordinate to the Haitians. Though in Martelly's case his hands didn't even need to be tied – he was a willing "shock president".

There were three elements that the US and IFIs wanted to build the "new Haiti" around: high-end tourism; export-processing zones; and a resurgent private sector in control of the previously state-owned assets. It was the racket's standard playbook. The architects of the reconstruction actually had other countries in mind that they believed could serve as a model. One was the Dominican Republic, the country next door to Haiti, which had long been an oasis for private capital in the Caribbean. In Haiti, using the model of its Hispaniola neighbor, the IADB planned to spend $22 million on a high-end tourism resort near the 19th-century citadel at Labadee, a port on Haiti's northern coast. Mr Almeida, Haiti manager for the IADB, told me the bank's money would "provide the means for the private sector to come and invest", adding that "in [the Dominican Republic] everything they have is all private. The airport is private, the roads are private, even the internal roads. So we could do the same thing [in Haiti]." (In the initial carve-up of Haitian society, the IADB was given road infrastructure.)

The other opportunity that had to be taken advantage of was speeding up the privatization process. The World Bank used the example of Teleco, formerly the national telecom operator, which in 2009 the bank's private-sector arm, the International Finance Corporation (IFC), had helped partially privatize. (The IFC was, incidentally, the brainchild of Nelson Rockefeller in 1951.) Mr Naim, the private-sector Haiti manager for the World Bank, told me that Teleco was an example of what the government should do to the ports and the airport. "[They can] really transform these assets that generally the government handles poorly," he said, adding that "It's better for the government to focus on social things" and let these assets be privatized. Teleco itself is now due for complete privatization under the guidance of the IFC. For the poorest country in the western hemisphere, it is hard – possibly even suicidal – to argue with the World Bank. In March 2010, the bank promised $479 million in grants; the IFC put $49 million-worth of direct investment into Haiti's private sector.

With Teleco on its way to privatization, the IADB had its own plans for the national water and sanitation authority (Dinepa), which had come under its domain in the initial carve-up. The bank soon handed over the authority's management duties to the giant Spanish company Aguas de Barcelona, which won a three-year contract to train and assist workers, and for which they received millions of dollars. "Many local companies are taking control of small towns' water systems," Mr Aguerre of the IADB told me excitedly. This essential commodity and basic human right was now being turned into a for-profit venture. "We are seeing good examples of places where no one paid for water services, and little by little they are paying," he added. Experts from Aguas de Barcelona became the leaders of discussions concerning the investment needed in Haiti's water system and the process of opening bids to different contractors for the completion of new pipelines and other systemic improvements.

In education, the IADB's plans were no different. Thanks to decades of neoliberal policies that prioritized the private sector above the Haitian ministries, even before the earthquake 80 percent of educational services were delivered outside the state (primarily by international bodies or the private sector). As a result, only half of school-aged children in Haiti went to school. For the IADB, this did not prove the folly of their enterprise. Contrariwise, they concluded that it meant they had not gone far enough. "It's too ambitious to think you can turn it around," Mr Aguerre said. The IADB settled on a voucher program that will allow the government to retain some "quality control", but means that education will be completely privately run. To ensure full access, the plan creates a publicly funded but privately run education system. The small print is that this public subsidy will cost the Haitian government about $700 million a year, seven times what it spends now on education. With no new revenue streams evident (in fact, as we shall see, the government's tax base was being all but destroyed), the obvious implication was that full access was not an aim (or even a hope). When the IADB's promised $500 million over three years runs dry, more than half of Haiti's children will still be locked out of the school system. The IADB rationalized this arrangement by arguing that the private sector would pick up the slack – explicitly holding Haiti's kids ransom to Hollywood film stars. "There are many private actors willing to put money in," added Mr Aguerre. "Half of Hollywood is interested. Everyone wants their Susan Sarandon School of Arts." Incidentally, Martelly has been approving of both vouchers and subsidizing private schools as methods to rebuild the Haitian education system.

With the complete privatization of telecoms, water and education, the final piece in the jigsaw for the IFIs and the US became the new "industrial parks" or "integrated economic zones". These, so the propaganda went, would ensure the economic growth that could put Haiti and its people back on their feet. But two years after the quake, more than 500,000 Haitians still lived in ad hoc camps around Port-au-Prince and 8 million still lived without electricity. The throngs of jobless who lined the capital's streets are a reminder of the 70 percent unemployment rate. "We need to be realistic and understand that it's still five years after Katrina and New Orleans is still being rebuilt, it's 10 years after September 11th and that site isn't rebuilt complete, the process takes time," Kenneth Merten, then US ambassador to Haiti, told me, adding, "One of the things Haitians can really do themselves is to move quickly on making a business-friendly climate."

It might perhaps be hard for the hundreds of thousands of Haitians living in ad hoc campsites to do that. In Haiti, I went to the La Piste camp, a barren enclosure with rows of one-bedroom "houses" on steeples. The owner of one, a middle-aged woman, spoke to me slowly via an interpreter. She was a single mother with three children with no means of income. She was living off money the Red Cross had given her, alongside selling some trinkets, although customers are few and far between. "It's much better here than the last camp," she told me. In the last place she and her children lived, like most others, in a tent, which meant they were subject to the rain and animals who decided to look in. "This is a house, it's safer," she said, but added that the fence of the camp should be higher, or be turned into a security fence because of the burglaries. She also said the lack of lighting puts them in danger: it is pitch black at night and easy for people to break in. You realize walking around La Piste that these people are completely at the mercy of nature – be that the elements, or their fellow man or woman. There is no security, there is no rule of law, and there is no place to go with grievances; there is merely the hope that someone is looking out for you. Hope cannot thrive in such an environment. “I would like to have hope,” she told me, her face blank, refusing any emotion at all. “I just don’t know who is going to make anything happen.” It seemed rude to ask how she planned to make a business-friendly climate for foreign investors in Haiti.

THERAPY

The 30-minute drive to Codevi industrial park from the airport in Cap-Haïtien, northern Haiti, is the smoothest in the country. In a place famed for its poor infrastructure, particularly its undulating roads, the park and the surrounding area are something of an oasis. Beyond the small bridge and metal gates which divide Codevi from the town outside, there’s everything that the average Haitian doesn’t have: paved roads, a functioning health service, employment and even a (small) trade union – the only one in the country. The 2 million square foot Codevi Park was originally built by a Dominican textile company, Grupo M, on the Dominican side of the border, but operations were expanded to Haiti in 2003 (with the help of a large investment by the World Bank).

“It was created as a vision of expansion that Grupo M had to look for as the Dominican Republic became more complicated competitiveness-wise,” Joseph Blumberg, vice-president of sales for the company, told me as we sat in his air-conditioned office inside the park. “Haiti offered us the competitive edge that we needed in this region to maintain ourselves with the US market.” He added: “It had a labor cost which was the lowest in the region.” The minimum wage in Haiti now is 150 gourdes ($3.70) per day, which is nearly half that in the Dominican Republic. This “competitive edge” – in a layperson’s terms “slave wages” – combined with favorable trading terms with the US had caught the eye of the IFIs in the aftermath of the earthquake. The aim was to rebuild Haiti as a Caribbean sweatshop that could enjoy the full fruits of the Haitian Hemispheric Opportunity for Partnership Encouragement (HOPE) Act, which was passed by the US Congress in 2006, granting tariff-free access for Haitian textile exporters to the US market. This was followed by increasingly favorable terms through HOPE II, in 2008, and the Help Act after the 2010 earthquake.

Parks like that at Codevi are known in the IFIs' literature as integrated economic zones (IEZs): places where infrastructure, welfare services and other services are provided for the lucky few behind imposing metal gates. The literature justifying their existence argues that prospective foreign investors put off by the decrepit or non-existent roads, electricity-grid and water system throughout Haiti would here have access to a ready-made mini-city. There was already a huge industrial park of this kind near the airport in Port-au-Prince called Sonapi, which is fully owned by the Haitian government and had, at one point, nearly 40 companies based there. But the new IEZs would be under the sole control of its initial investors – mainly USAID and the IADB. This raises the question of what will happen outside these so-called "poles" of economic activity. What would the incentive be for the central government to develop infrastructure and social services throughout the country if they are being built on this micro-scale? And where would the money come from? Alexandre Abrantes, the World Bank's special envoy to Haiti, admits this is a problem; he told me that industrial parks "may not be sustainable if you were to do it as a policy everywhere".

Codevi is essentially an "export-processing zone" (increasingly common in the "developing" world) where exports pay no tax to the central government and there is no customs duty on imported materials. "You're in an extra-territorial concept so that your goods come in and out very quickly without much paperwork," said Armando Heilbron, a senior private-sector development specialist at the World Bank working on the IEZs in Haiti. Therefore, Haiti's reconstruction will take place in isolated small "poles", primarily in the northern part of the country, while the rest of the country's infrastructure and welfare services will fall further into disrepair.

Perhaps the biggest problem with the industrial parks is the unscrupulous nature of the companies that populate them. The public relations tour of Codevi, with its stops at the local doctor and training facilities, is a relief after experiencing the destruction that has been wrought in the rest of the country. But the tour does not include many of the most important episodes in its establishment. Codevi was originally built on farmers' land against their will – a process that destroyed the region's agricultural infrastructure to create sweatshops. It was a parable for the economic reconstruction that occurred after the earthquake. The diplomatic cables recount that there had been a "long-standing labor dispute between Dominican manufacturer Grupo M and workers in Ouanaminthe", a community in north-east Haiti. One said: "According to Yannick Etienne, a labor representative, the fight has its origins in the closed-door negotiations that established the Free Trade Zone (FTZ). The farmers were left out of the negotiating process until the day of the FTZ ground breaking ceremony in 2002, when they were told their land was being expropriated. Grupo M eventually published a social compensation plan in 2003, however, it came too late for the farmers whose land was already gone, and whose suspicions of the Dominicans were already aroused."

Grupo M and its patrons at the World Bank do not, of course, tire of outlining the countless benefits that accrue to the local population because of Codevi. Every program of exploitation has an ideology bolted on to legitimate it to the world – but also to those benefitting: very few people want to look in the mirror and see a monster staring back. When I asked to speak to workers, two were dutifully brought out to give monosyllabic positive comments about their jobs, perhaps wary of the manager sitting next to them. Neither was a member of the union, I soon found out. In fact, Grupo M claims it has no conception of how many workers are in the union. "Very little," is all Mr Blumberg would tell me. "It's not part of their priority. They're happy and when the workforce is happy they don't mind if anybody is doing anything for them or not." However, according to the diplomatic cables released by WikiLeaks, the soothing words of Mr Blumberg do not reveal the whole story. "Dominican unions allege [Grupo M] discriminates against labor organizers, fires their members, and has created a fraudulent 'scab union' in order to circumvent the legitimate one," one cable notes.

It is clear that something similar has happened in Haiti. Grupo M did have a stronger union once – before it was busted after trying to exercise its rights. Just months after Codevi opened, the workers began complaining of "exploitation and mistreatment" by the management of Grupo M. Rounds of strikes and violence by union members were followed by a "series of employee terminations by the company throughout that summer".

Mr Blumberg explained it thus: "When we had the first union, there was a lot of growing pain. They didn't have the right groups guiding them, there were a lot of radicals, a lot of leftists." But, he added: "In the end, everything was straightened out and we're in peace and we're fine with the union." The union had been co-opted. Workers' rights would not be a high priority for the economic model that would design the new Haiti. In fact, the plan was predicated on the lack of rights for workers. In an internal IFC document that was presented to the Haitian government, the administration was implored to amend the labor code in order to “lift restrictions on 24/7 multi-labor shifts” while “streamlining” the process by which night-time salary supplements could be done away with. The plan was also predicated on a lack of tax revenue. Another incentive for the foreign companies was the so-called “economic free zones” (EFZs), which offer companies tax and duty-free rights if they set up operations in Haiti. In reality, these zones do not exist in physical space but rather constitute the whole country. In other words, Haiti would now be tax-free for foreign investors – further disabling the Haitian government’s ability to rebuild any public institutions. In 2011, the Haitian government brought in an estimated $1 billion of revenue, much less than the per-capita rate in sub-Saharan Africa.

The answer to this dilemma for the IADB was the “multiplier effect” whereby companies supplying services to the population would in turn have more income and therefore pay more tax to the government (at some time in the distant future). “It’s on that side that we see the benefits of anchoring in the zones and having these companies come, even if under the current regime they do not pay taxes for a while,” said Mr Almeida, IADB country director for Haiti. The idea essentially is that around the industrial estates other smaller Haitian businesses, such as travel agents and grocery stores, will pick up the slack of lost tax revenue. The problem for the IFIs was that even with slave wages and lax labor regulation it was proving hard to attract foreign investment. In the face of such reticence from investors around the world, Haiti should have focused on building indigenous capacity, perhaps through a massive public works initiative and the construction of state-owned facilities, like Sonapi. Haitians were instead again put at the mercy of international capital and its “race to the bottom”. For the US embassy, the only thing going for Haiti was that its people were made to work for peanuts. “Haiti has the lowest wages in the western hemisphere,” boasted one US embassy cable. To Haitians it was nothing to boast about. Camille Chalmers, a local economist, told the Financial Times that the wages paid in the textile sector, Haiti’s biggest industry, were a “veritable scandal”.

Amid manifold reservations from both international investors and labor-rights groups, the IADB and USAID finished the construction of the flagship project in the economic reconstruction of Haiti: the Caracol industrial park (CIP), just 40 miles down the well-paved road back toward the northern capital of Cap-Haïtien. The CIP was inspired by the perceived success of Codevi, with those designing Haiti’s new-look economy trying to attract investment with the benefits that drew Grupo M into the economy: cheap labor and geographical closeness to the US, the world's largest market, where its exports are duty-free. It is one of five planned. The US poured millions of dollars into the CIP, but only Sae-A Trading, a South Korean textile company, has been enticed to set up shop in the park (and according to people involved in the deal, Sae-A was promised a rent holiday of four years). Sweatshop-based development had, in fact, never provided more than 100,000 jobs even in the 1980s.

The fact that the US taxpayer is building industrial parks for the benefit of South Korean companies also raised eyebrows. The US may be the most active foreign country involved in the reconstruction, but even its companies are still keeping their distance. "We are professional beggars," Mr Aguerre, the Haiti manager for the IADB in Washington, told me. The Haitian people would become beggars, too. For example, an internal IFC document on proposed IEZs argues that the reconstruction should be "propelled by private-sector-led development" even though the same document admits that "the existing Haitian Free Zone, Industrial Park and Investment Code policy and regulatory regimes have not been effective in attracting investments that are needed to create jobs".

"To say that the private sector is rushing into Haiti right now would not be exactly what's happening," Pamela Cox, the World Bank's vice-president for Latin America and the Caribbean, told me when I met her in Washington. So why were these institutions focusing so much on a foreign-investment-led reconstruction, rather than building up domestic and public Haitian capacity? Was the fact that this would not make any westerners rich merely a coincidence?

There are still further complications; namely, that offering generous inducements to foreign companies will adversely impact businesses already in Haiti. Grupo M, for example, is fearful of what the incentives offered for the CIP and other IEZs being planned might mean for it. "[New foreign companies] have to train their workforces, they have to prepare themselves for what is coming," said Mr Blumberg, vice-president of sales at Grupo M. "We want a level playing field if you will. We understand that [foreign companies] are getting a lot of things via grants and via sponsorships from different sources." But if investment is not forthcoming or indigenous industries are stifled, as many predict, Haiti will suffer stagnation and destitution for another generation.

Enthusiasm from donors for aid and other forms of sovereign investment is now dwindling as the international community loses interest and the financial crisis continues to bite. The Haiti Reconstruction Fund (HRF), which aggregates funds from countries and NGOs to fill gaps in investment, has raised $352 million so far, but, “We’ve reached a plateau,” Mr Leitman, head of the HRF, told me. “I think the donors have been cautious and reluctant to contribute new money.” In March 2010, at a major pledging conference held in New York City, $4.6 billion was promised for the first two years of reconstruction. Only $1.9 billion of that ever materialized. “If you look at estimates made about rebuilding Haiti after the earthquake, they were huge, you know $15 billion, even more than that,” Mark Weisbrot, co-director of the Center for Economic and Policy Research (CEPR) in Washington, DC, told me. “They haven’t come up with anything like that, even a fraction of that. It’s a small country but it’s still 10 million people and so if you don’t clear the rubble, you don’t have roads, you don’t have housing, you don’t have water, you don’t have sanitation, what kind of economy are you going to get out of that? That’s the real problem.”

The real fear back home in Washington, however, especially among politicians, is migration and drugs. “They feared Aristide was a Castro want-to-be,” Larry Birns, an analyst in Washington, told me. “US policy has never been concerned with building a viable economy. The policies they followed destroyed Haiti’s economy.” On assuming power, Ronald Reagan proposed the Caribbean Basin Initiative to try, in a familiar story, to bring foreign investment to the region. It was a method of regaining control of the region, which seemed to be going on an independent path. Reagan even invaded Grenada on spurious grounds in 1983 to push that effort. The initiative was a failure, bringing little to no investment, but control was exerted. In that respect it was like John F. Kennedy’s Alliance for Progress in Latin America, which sought to bring the region away from Soviet influence, under the guise of “development” and “investment”. The prevailing spirit now in Washington is that Haiti is messy, and people will openly tell you (off the record) that Haiti is beyond the capacity to be reformed, a “loser situation”. They favor what they call “keeping it on life support” so that the US doesn’t get too many people coming in (Haitian refugees dying on the beaches of Florida caused havoc for Southern politicians in the 1980s). But what the US never seems to understand about Haiti and elsewhere is that you cannot have a society operate like clockwork when you have for years persistently undermined all credible efforts for that society to function in an effective way. Haiti is now actually well below its per capita income of 1960, the only country in the hemisphere to have made no progress in that period. Ironically, the economy grew from 1960 to 1980 under the Duvalier dictatorships because, despite their brutality, they actually had a development strategy. It wasn't great but it did move the country forward. This is true for a lot of the region where many countries had more growth under dictatorships because they had more control over policy than they did in a more democratic era when, in the subsequent neoliberal phase, the World Bank and the IMF controlled policy, and nobody allowed them to have a development strategy. From 1991 to 1994 and from 2000 to 2004, in fact, there was a deliberate strategy to destroy the economy, and that's how they got rid of President Aristide both times. "This is more about power. It's hard for people to believe this, but the US really does care who runs the government," said Mr Weisbrot. "They've overthrown the government twice, the US, Canada, France, and their allies. 1991 was more covert but it did come out that the CIA paid the people who did the coup, and they also financed death squads in the period after."

The story of one Haitian I met while in the country, Robinson Deese, shows the human side of this brutality. "After the earthquake everything turned terrible," he told me, as we sat in his bedroom. He lost his home and moved with his four children and wife to Golf, one of the biggest camps in Port-au-Prince on the capital's only golf course. But he was given a lifeline. The Red Cross – one of the most influential and powerful NGOs working in Haiti – offered him a rent subsidy to move his family into permanent accommodation. The charity gave him 4,000 Haitian dollars toward the yearly rent of 6,000 Haitian dollars. (Prices have ballooned since the earthquake because of the squeeze on supply.) Now he lives in one small and sweltering room with six other people, including his wife, children and brother. Formerly a tailor, his working life was destroyed when he lost all his sewing machines in the earthquake. "We have to manage with this because we have no means to rent a bigger place right now, I have to work for other people now," he said. "I preferred to take the subsidy because I didn't have a piece of land where I could build a shelter. I decided the best option would be to start a small business for myself while I tried to save money, maybe get a piece of land." He was also awarded a us$500 Livelihood Grant to start a business, which he said was not going well so far. In these conditions, saving is hard for a family like this, as he has to stump up money for tuition for his kids' schooling as well as for books and uniforms. The Red Cross has helped countless people this way – it is one of three options they offer to some of the 500,000 Haitians still living in tent cities around Port-au-Prince. The other two are building a T-shelter on a greenfield site, or finding someone who will let them do it. But the program is a parable of the short-termism that has overtaken the reconstruction of Haiti. Mr Deese only qualifies for this subsidy for a year. After that, he and his family are back at square one unless he finds a job, which with 80 percent unemployment seems unlikely. “I can’t say I will have enough to cover next year’s rent,” he admitted. “It doesn’t stress me out right now, I know that I can work, I have two hands to work with.”

NO ROOM FOR AN ALTERNATIVE

Haiti is a notoriously difficult country to operate in: its institutions are frail, weakened by years of underinvestment, and the system is riven with corruption. For the economic managers post-earthquake, this was the default reasoning for their reliance on the private sector and “export-led” reconstruction. But there was nothing inevitable about such a program. There were plenty of reconstruction plans that could, most likely would, have created a fairer and more sustainable future for Haitians. The problem was and remains that these plans go against an ideology purveyed by the IMF, the World Bank and the US. For example, the Haitian government could have rebuilt the country’s crumbling infrastructure with a modern-day equivalent of the Marshall Plan from donors, which would have created public-sector jobs for Haitians to construct roads, ports and energy infrastructure which has either been non-existent or in disrepair. Everyone, after all, puts infrastructure as among the top problems for making Haiti work. Some 10,000 jobs could have been created just clearing the rubble. The Red Cross has, for example, created hundreds of jobs for Haitians reusing the rubble to build bricks and other building materials, clearing the city and creating employment. “We’re the only ones doing it,” the co-coordinator of the program in Port-au-Prince told me. “At the moment, now, all the rest goes down the dump, even though the cost of processing it is about the same as taking it down to the dump.”

Perhaps most importantly, Haiti could have focused on creating a new agrarian economy, a sector which had been thriving before President Clinton dumped tonnes of US rice in the country in the 1990s, destroying Haitian agriculture by completely distorting trading terms, something that will be explored in a moment. About 40 percent of the Haitian population, or 4 million people, live in rural areas. Promoting community-owned agricultural land would have instantly depopulated the overcrowded capital and provided a sustainable way of feeding its people (with any leftovers ready for export). It was never even discussed.

“Agriculture is still missing,” Mr Naim at the IFC told me. The IFC is yet to make one loan to an agricultural small or medium-sized enterprise (SME), instead training its focus on agribusiness rather than the smallholders that Haiti needs. Likewise, the World Bank has admitted that not enough priority is being given to agriculture. It has put $55 million into a new agricultural program (in the grand scale of things in Haiti, peanuts). “This is our first true agricultural project,” Mr Abrantes acknowledged. The US government claims it is not ignoring agriculture. The ambassador to Haiti told me the US has invested $200 million in the sector already; but, once again, the focus remains on produce for export as opposed to providing for the Haitian population, large portions of which are starving. The IADB, on the other hand, contends that infrastructure is important but “there are other needs” (such as “investing in the private sector” in order to import seeds). The bank has a plan to get a private company to buy the mangoes, centralize them, distribute them and then send them to the exporters. “We’re changing the dynamics of how we can do agriculture in Haiti,” said Mr Almeida at the IADB. This new dynamic is straight out of the neoliberal guidebook: providing vouchers to small producers so they can buy seeds through imports. With no public or community-held land, such ventures have to date not got very far. “It’s not a big number of jobs,” Mr Almeida admitted.

The internal Haitian market continues to be ignored by all parties, a travesty considering that 90 percent of eggs and poultry consumed in Haiti come from the Dominican Republic, while 80 percent of rice is imported. Changing that state of affairs through publicly funded subsistence farming is not an option. “When I say agriculture I say agribusiness,” said Mr Almeida. The alternative, which is unthinkable in the world of these institutions, is that money is provided to subsidize domestic small-scale rice production.

An emblematic project of this “new dynamic” was brokered by the IADB: an initiative with Coca-Cola which has created a new soda called “Mango-Tango” that will be supplied with mangoes from newly developed producers. A similar deal with Starbucks coffee seeks to transform individual micro-farmers into co-operatives and then supply coffee to Starbucks and market it as Haitian coffee. Critical analysts call this the “sweatshops and mangoes” development model. “They need roads, they need irrigation in the countryside, but that’s the one thing these guys won’t do,” said Mark Weisbrot, the analyst at the CEPR. But the Martelly administration's agriculture policy has so far followed the export-orientated agribusiness model of the Bretton Woods institutions to the letter. "What I hear from [the Haitian government] is that they want to go into the export mode, including the agriculture," said Mr Abrantes. In fact, Martelly had pushed the IFIs to go even further. "We were preparing traditional agriculture projects for Haiti which were basically focused on poverty alleviation, on the small farmers," added Mr Abrantes. "When the Martelly administration came in, they looked at the project and said, 'We would like it to have a different slant. We would like to have significant components on stimulating agribusiness', which is quite a different thing from what we had anticipated, and so I think the overall view is, even in agriculture, to encourage parts of the agricultural sector to move into export-production." Haiti remains a majority agrarian country; it needs an agrarian-based development model that distributes land among its homeless people for community-based subsistence cultivation. The economic managers of the country are not interested. The long-held dream of a Caribbean sweatshop is being born instead. Out of one of history's worst human catastrophes we have Mango-Tango. The racket's victory was Haiti's defeat, but this was no accident.

THE RACKET

A VERY BRIEF EXPLANATION OF WHAT REALLY HAPPENED AFTER WORLD WAR II

In a world based on the exchange of goods and services, the most effective way of controlling people – or nations – is to put them in your debt. This the US government understood clearly, and so at the end of the World War II American planners set about designing an international monetary system that would put the rest of humanity under the crack of their whip. But doing such a thing, while maintaining the customary public posture of spreading democracy and economic justice, would be no easy task. The US managed it mainly through the construction of a series of global institutions that would, from then on, decide how the world's poorest managed their economies. The ideology driving these institutions would be a US-backed form of capitalism that brooked no dissent from its precepts. The official, old world empires (whose decline picked up pace after 1945) were to be replaced by something more insidious, more hidden, something that to this day is still not recognized for what is: debt slavery. Debt would be used to strangle and crush any peoples that tried to free themselves from the shackles of the order being imposed.

The first of the new enforcers was the International Monetary Fund (IMF), which billed itself as the savior of countries in dire need of money to shore up unraveling economies. It would soon become a star player, one of the real big boys. Alongside it another body would be used to promote the racket's interests across the world: initially called the International Bank for Reconstruction and Development (IBRD), it would later become known as the World Bank. These institutions, which still oversee the world economy in the interests of the fattest of cats, were created in inauspicious surroundings: a hotel next to a railway station called Bretton Woods in New Hampshire. The stories and propaganda regarding the genesis of these institutions are almost completely false, but continue to be told to the present day. The World Bank, in official history, was meant to "facilitate private sector investment and reconstruction in Europe". Alongside that crucial calling, with Europe in ruins after the war, it was meant to deal more generally with "development" – a term that refers to the economic progress of countries that have been kept underdeveloped by the policies of the same people overseeing their "development". This second role would later become its chief purpose, as the World Bank became one of the main avenues through which poor countries would be lent money.

Two men dominated the process of designing the new global order. Harry Dexter White, a US diplomat, was there to make sure everything was set down with US interests in mind. He was up against a more honest and respected economist from Britain, John Maynard Keynes, whose ideas did not win out – the resulting arrangements prioritized American interests. White, after all, had considerable leverage, thanks to the United States' economic supremacy at the time. He followed the course laid down by Franklin D. Roosevelt's Secretary of State Cordell Hull, who said early in the World War II: "Leadership toward a new system of international affairs in trade and other economic affairs will devolve very largely upon the United States because of our great economic strength. We should assume this leadership, and the responsibility that goes with it, primarily for reasons of pure self-interest."[1] And so it was. This self-interest is obvious when the Keynes' proposal is compared with that of White. It shows clearly that US interests were the priority all along, preventing any equitable solution. Essentially, the US saw the IMF and World Bank as tools in its goal to create new markets in which American exports could be sold and developed, further enhancing its already growing economy and helping to secure its position as the global superpower. But Keynes believed that trade relations between countries could not be changed without both the creditor and the debtor country making a commitment to their alteration. The powerful and the powerless in this sense both had responsibilities. Keynes had, for this reason, proposed an International Clearing Union (ICU) with its own independent currency called "the bancor". The bancor would be a universal unit of accounting that countries across the globe could use that would track trade deficits and surpluses. An "objective" unit would ensure that equal pressure fell on both the creditor and the debtor to balance their trade. But such a body would constrain the powerful creditor nations like the US, which were using their loans and export capacity as a method of control. For this reason, the ICU never happened; White opposed it. Instead, he wanted an International Stabilization Fund and the IBRD. The purpose of the Stabilization Fund would be to reduce foreign exchange controls, maintain steady exchange rates and lend money to nations in deficit. The bank would provide the capital that was desperately needed by faltering countries to rebuild after the war. And this was the formulation that was eventually agreed upon. It completely took the burden off the creditor nations (like the US) in terms of balance of trade. Put simply, there was now no restriction on the amount of surplus a successful exporting nation could enjoy. As a country borrowed more and more, interest rates just rose and rose. This formula was perfect for accelerating the racket's dominance. Foreign countries became markets for American goods and started to rely, heavily, on US capital. As the levels of debt grew, so did the racket's ideological and economic stranglehold.

Despite constant US propaganda to the contrary, such self-interest, or naked imperialism, was the main motivation – to sculpt a world in its image, to create a global population working for elite US interests, while at the same time thinking they were working for their own.

This is not ancient history – the same is happening today. I remember asking historian Walter LaFeber, one of the most esteemed voices on US foreign policy, about this, and he was more honest than most: "No government has ever proposed a plan unless it believed there was something in it for that government," he told me, adding that the "post-World War II economic system was developed, not created, by the US officials to help their nation's economic clout and survival." His contention is, in fact, a common one: that the Bretton Woods institutions, as the IMF and World Bank soon became known, had originally had an "idealistic thread". From there, the story goes, these same institutions were perverted by the US, as its power to maintain control over other countries diminished with decolonization, to re-establish its power – or what the planners and elite journalists like to call "stability".

In 1945, of course, the system was conceived with the developing world's subservience pretty much guaranteed. But as various nations and peoples around the world gained independence, they had to be reintegrated into the racket so that it would remain as profitable as its predecessor. No problem. Since its original formulation, the Bretton Woods system has been an elaborate system of control. The Bretton Woods institutions are heavily biased in their voting capacities: votes are proportional to your contribution to the funds, and because the US contributes the most as the world's largest economy it has de facto control. For example, if the US did not want to lend to the Sandinista government in Nicaragua, which overthrew a US-backed tyrant in 1979, then the Bretton Woods institutions would follow their lead. Functioning without this credit line is extremely difficult. Alongside this, the dollar gives the US more power because it is the global "reserve currency", which means that it is the most popular foreign exchange currency held by governments across the world. The interest rates set by the Federal Reserve in Washington, DC thus give the US significant power to manipulate the global economy. Some countries even surrender their economic sovereignty to the US completely by adopting the greenback as their currency. For example, El Salvador, a poor country in Central America that was the victim of a vicious civil war sustained by the US from 1980 to 1992, adopted the dollar in 2001, giving up its control over monetary policy in toto. Needless to say, the "right guys" won that war and the rewards for the US inevitably followed.

For LaFeber, the "real question is whether the Bretton Woods arrangements have helped solve problems for all the involved parties, and done so equitably". Initially, they may have, depending on your measuring stick. Economists and governments measure economic growth as the increase in economic activity within a country by the metric Gross Domestic Product (GDP). It is a futile metric because it tells you nothing about how that wealth is being distributed within a given country or if the new economic activity is in areas that are socially useful. But, still, most governments in the world chase GDP growth as the ultimate goal.

In the 30 years after the establishment of the Bretton Woods institutions, global growth was indeed good – showing marked improvements on the pre-war period. But this does not alter the fact that these institutions were initially created to enshrine US control of the global economy. If there was any doubt about what the intended plan was, all one needs to do is look at what happened from the mid-1970s onwards. In 1971, President Richard Nixon removed the US from the gold standard, where currency in circulation had to correspond to a specific amount of gold. This move unleashed a large amount of what is known as "footloose capital". The Bretton Woods system as initially conceived at this point "broke down" – but the institutions that composed it would soon become the bodies through which the rest of the world was made pliable to this new capital. The populations of poor countries from Africa to Latin America were put in service of getting profit on this money. Whole societies were transformed; power was taken away from democratic institutions and placed in the hands of private bodies, the racket's new silent rulers. And while all this was going on, the world entered one of its periodic depressions. In what is known as the "business cycle", economies inevitably rise and fall as the irrationality of the market creates "bubbles" and troughs from which the poor have to pull themselves out and from which the rich can profit: buying at the bottom is the best way to make a fortune. Imperialism had changed its face, or in fact hidden its face. No longer would there be garrisons full of foreign troops ensuring countries were made to service their rich patrons; this was an invisible imperialism, and for that reason much stronger and more durable. This was the signature strategy of the racket – don't let your subjects know they are subjects; don't let your functionaries in the field know they are imposing a brutal form of imperialism. Let them think they are free citizens of a free world, of which the US is merely the neutral arbiter. Meanwhile, suck out the money.

NOW YOU ARE INDEBTED

In the early 1980s a recession was imposed on the world by the Reagan administration carrying out a deflationary policy which put huge pressure on developing world countries with debts. It was the first worldwide economic recession since World War II, and countries that had borrowed heavily found themselves in dire straits: with deflation they had trouble meeting payments and some fell into default which meant they came under IMF control. Mob rules: as soon as they can't afford to pay back a debt, you own them. The IMF could now impose specific conditions, instructing: "We won't make any more loans unless you carry out certain programs." These programs, officially called "structural adjustment programs", were precisely attuned to what growing transnational corporations wanted from these developing world countries. Under IMF control they had to privatize. They had to cut back on public expenditure for things that would help ordinary citizens, such as public health and education, and they had to orientate their whole program not just to paying their debt, but they also had to welcome transnational corporations into the country on the nicest possible terms. It was a set of conditions serviceable only to the racket and incredibly damaging to ordinary people. It is like asking a friend if you can borrow $20, and them responding: "I'll lend it to you if you let me wear all your clothes, use your computer whenever I want, sleep in your bed, and you pay me 10 cents extra every week until you pay it all back." It is worth remembering, as an aside, that in many places the crippling debt that countries had incurred during the long boom after World War II was stacked up by dictators and tyrants backed by the US and their allies, for example General Suharto, the genocidal Indonesian dictator. The people who would have to pay back these loans with the destruction of their social provisions had had no say in the loans themselves, which often went on ingratiating the leaders that were oppressing them. Such debts are known as "odious debt" and many believe them to be not just wrong, but illegal. Still, they are used to control much of the world. Some nice examples for you: Indonesia has a massive $80 billion-worth of debts, but it is estimated that 50 individuals own 95 percent of these debts. After the West had bankrolled Suharto to power, they then loaned him huge amounts of money that did nothing to benefit his subjects (particularly the 200,000 East Timorese people who were murdered under his watch). But these debts were instantly socialized so that future generations like today's young Indonesians have to pay the debts for the lavish lifestyle of Suharto and his friends. And it is not only "useless" countries like Indonesia that get themselves into heavy debt. What is often ignored is the fact that Britain, France and Italy all defaulted on US debts in the 1930s.

During the so-called "debt crisis" in Latin America in the 1980s, commercial banks would no longer lend to governments or companies in the region, so their reliance on the Bretton Woods institutions became even more acute. What these arbiters of economic control embarked on was the destruction of an economic model that had helped build Latin America into one of the economic powerhouses of the world, a model which had seen other great successes. Known as "import substitution industrialization", it was a system that sought to build up domestic industries by enacting protectionist policies to keep out foreign capital and products. It was, understandably, not a popular system for the racketeers seeking new markets in which to invest and export, so they brought it down. And so "export-orientated industrialization" – an economy oriented to producing exports for foreign countries using supplies often made elsewhere – was introduced. It was part of one of the oldest tricks in the racket's playbook to keep a poor country poor and "underdeveloped": allow a foreign company to extract minerals in the "developing" country, paying little in tax or royalties, then take that raw material out of the country, build the product back in their own rich country, creating jobs and industry, and then sell it back to the people in the original country at a huge mark-up. The economies of these "underdeveloped" countries were put at the mercy of the vagaries of the global economy, where demand and supply would create interminable instability; in essence, it meant that independent development was impossible. Again: not an accident.

The destruction of public control over industry – which is one of the staples of these programs – ignored the fact that the state has an important role to play in creating a flourishing domestic industry. The US should know; after all, it has been one of the most protectionist countries in the world. Protecting nascent industries by putting up barriers to foreign investment and products is vital when these industries are in their infancy. The structural adjustment programs are adamantly opposed to this erection of barriers. The idea is that structural adjustment makes weaker economies “more like the West”, but it does nothing of the sort because the poorer countries have none of the economic base of their masters. Instead, it creates dependencies that rely completely on their western “sponsors” – it creates a situation where it is impossible for these countries to pursue their own path. And when nations start electing leaders that put the interests of their people ahead of those of western multinationals, you can bet that the Bretton Woods henchmen will be brought in to squeeze them into submission.

For Latin America, export-orientated industrialization was a prolonged disaster – huge amounts of capital flowed out of the continent, which helped depreciate its currencies (its currencies became less sought-after so their price fell), and in order to bring down inflation governments were instructed to raise interests rates – which in turn helped slow economies even further as it became harder to borrow money. The continent’s economy contracted by 9 percent in the five years to 1985. It was the same period of ascendancy for Bretton Woods, and this was no coincidence. The economic managers used “structural adjustment programs” and levered the debt the IMF and World Bank were owed to transform economies. “Rescue” packages and loan “deals” were struck with poor nations, on the proviso that they did certain things to their economy. Their economies would be rebuilt with the interests of western capital at the forefront; the new economies would be “precisely attuned to what transnational corporations wanted”. One specialist puts the program like this: “privatization of the means of production, deregulation of all economic activity, encouragement of competition … and [integration] into the wider world capitalist economic system.”[2] The needs of the people – from healthcare to education – were thrown to the wind, as public institutions were forcibly privatized. Basic human rights were taken away as the poor were absorbed into the “global market” where fewer and fewer obstacles faced the holders of large amounts of capital. The penetration of the captured economy would be made much easier, as poor countries were bought up by western capital. The rich – centered in the capital of this economic system, the US – were growing richer, capital was draining from the poor world, and the destitute of humanity were crushed under the boot of adjustment programs. The racket was growing, as an aggressive form of capitalism, “neoliberalism”, destroyed any institutions that represented those without capital.

Two professors from New York explain the result: “Half the people and two-thirds of the countries in the world lack full control over their own economic policy. Expatriate ‘experts’ managed by industrial country nationals and based in Washington DC regulate their macroeconomics, investment projects and social spending.” To add insult to injury: “The principles guiding these instructions from afar are even known as a ‘Washington Consensus’.”[3] This consensus, in fact, stretches no further than the richest people on earth, the members of the racket. Of course, it is extremely hard to escape the lock that Bretton Woods puts on your country. One example of a leader and movement trying to do that was Luiz Inácio Lula da Silva, the former president of Brazil, who realized early on he would have a hard time borrowing money if he embarked on his more radical ideas to combat inequality in his country – the credit lines would be pulled. There is now a near-absolute rule in global politics that social democratic leaders become sell-outs. And why? Because the forces of capital and its enforcer the US are too powerful. Lula wrote a letter to his people at the start of his tenure explaining how far his hands were tied by foreign capitalists. Brazil, in other words, was far from a sovereign country. And that was no accident. “Either right before they take power, or right after they take power because the system has become so powerful, the constraints on the democratic leaders are so powerful that they really have a very limited range of choice, they have to work within very narrow bounds,” Edward S. Herman, an economist at the University of Pennsylvania, told me, adding that “the system is a beautifully integrated whole”, which makes it very hard for the victims to see the wood for the trees amidst the barrage of propaganda.

Another Latin American country, Argentina, actually became one of the poster boys for the failures of neoliberal policies when in 2001 its economy crashed. It should never have been an example of an economy in tatters, being at one stage among the most prosperous economies in the world. By the early 2000s it had become a basket case, thanks to its patrons in Washington and their local satraps. The crash came at the end of a long period in which the country had followed the prescripts of the Bretton Woods institutions, restructuring its economy in the interests of foreign capital. It wasn't meant to be like this. In the 1990s, the usual glorification by the media of the Bretton Woods precepts was ascendant. Argentina, we were told, was the "model pupil" in the neoliberal university being erected around the world. It was, we were told further, an "economic miracle" thanks to the liberalization of the economy that began in earnest under President Carlos Menem who came to power in 1989, when the economy was admittedly in bad shape. At the time inflation – which measures the decreasing value of currency – was sky-high, hitting 200 percent at the time. Menem had actually won power by promising Argentinians a return to the "good life" – one with increasing living standards, improved services, the full gamut of the usual election-speak. But this idealism crashed on to the rocks of the Bretton Woods institutions when he entered the Pink Palace in Buenos Aires. He became a neoliberal; maybe he had been one all along but had had to hide it because such policies are rarely popular with the majority of the people.

Menem's first move was to allow private capital to profit from Argentina's public institutions. "We are pragmatists," he said, "state enterprises will be privatized to the extent that such action meets the government's interests." This was supplemented by other measures out of the IMF's playbook: the Argentine government would remove all tariffs and other barriers to the free movement of capital. Now US companies would have no responsibilities if the economy went belly up – they could invest and disinvest freely. The peso was pegged to the dollar, giving the US even more tacit control over Argentina – the interest rates set by the Federal Reserve in the US would now have a considerable impact on Argentina's economy. Social programs were eviscerated and fiscal controls lifted, creating a human crisis. A World Bank study lauded the new moves in 1993: "Provinces now have most responsibility for such social services as education, health, security, and housing. Improving efficiency of the delivery of these provincial social services could be one of the most effective ways to improve the standard of living in Argentina" (for "provincial responsibility" read "privatization"). The "Shock" Menem used to push through these unpopular reforms putting his country's economy at the mercy of foreign capitalists was the hyperinflation that he had inherited. In fact, it continued even after his reforms. Money poured into Argentina initially as, in 1991, the US slumped into a recession and capital looked for new flesh to dig its teeth into. With its deregulation, Argentina was a common choice. In the one-year period 1991–92, foreign investment in Argentina nearly quadrupled from $3.2 billion to $11 billion. By 1997, the Economist thought wise to gush that the country's prosperity "reminds some of a golden era, a century ago, when the pampas supplied imperial Britain with wheat, beef and wool, and Argentina was one of the ten richest countries".[4]

But it was all a lie, a building constructed without girders. It soon came crashing down. Wall Street – the Holy Grail of global capitalism where many of the world's biggest banks are based and do their dirty – suffered another downturn. It was called the popping of the "tech bubble", which had mirrored Argentina's foreign investment bubble. When Wall Street crashed, the footloose capital which had been treated so kindly by the people of Argentina felt no loyalty and flew out of the country as quickly as it had gone in. Menem had discarded the controls that had been in place to prevent such a grand flight, so the people had no way to stop it. Economic historian Robert Brenner said that towards the end of the 1990s the US absorbed "all the world's mobile capital. In this situation, countries that had staked everything on attracting investment were up against the wall."[5] He added that the same period marked "the death knell for those peripheral economies that had tied their currencies to the dollar". Argentina had staked everything on attracting investment and had tied its currency to the dollar. In the resulting downturn, the Argentinian government imposed harsh austerity measures. The IMF offered a $40 billion loan but at this stage withdrawals from bank deposits had reached $1 billion a day. The relatively new President Fernando de la Rua declared, "I will never devalue", but this proved an empty promise, and eventually devaluation happened and the historic debt default followed. In 2001 popular protests erupted on the streets of Argentinian cities during which 27 demonstrators died. The final straw was the IMF's refusal to lend any more money because de la Rua had failed to meet its conditions on public-spending costs. He resigned but left a country in ruins. Public services had been systematically dismantled, fiscal controls had been eroded and foreign corporations had no responsibility to stay put, leaving the government and banks bankrupt. The Bretton Woods institutions had done their job.

YOU BETTER WORK

A class war is being fought and the poor are losing. The racket based in the West has the money and power to extend itself globally, and so workers are fighting each other for work across borders. The countervailing powers, such as strong organized labor groups, that previously had some check on business power have been eroded and fractured. Business can now, like never before, write laws, weaken and destroy labor rights and the environment, and control the media without the public service option. And it feeds itself – as business takes over there is less space for people with a dissenting view; it has a magnificent self-reinforcing quality. It is true that more trade unions and workers' movements are needed, but the head wind is strong. The power of profit-seeking money has managed to create a world in its own image, largely through the Bretton Woods institutions. By globalizing capital and its production, the racket is doing something very clever and advantageous (for itself). They are pitting workers against each other rather than highlighting the gap between themselves and the peons that make their profits. The pressure valve has been released on the anger, which should be sky-high, against executive bonuses, irresponsible speculation and the insane repackaging of debt; it is now firmly trained on workers from other countries, who have been equally exploited by the same business hounds. This tactic is well known to the business community and the prevalence of "free trade" areas over the last decades is the embodiment of this thought-process. In the case of the North American Free Trade Agreement (NAFTA), the US pushed for a "free trade" integrated area covering itself, Canada and Mexico, which would allow its businesses to go into Mexico's economy and produce at a much lower cost, because environmental regulations were looser and labor laws laxer. Consequently, working Americans were done out of work because they could be undercut by Mexican workers. Also, heavily subsidized American goods could be sold at cheaper prices than indigenous Mexican produce, so agriculture was destroyed in Mexico. The only NAFTA winner at the end of the day was the business community, and instead of solidarity with Mexican workers, often the American unions turned to jingoism. This whole dynamic is called in academe the "race to the bottom" and operates over the globalized economic system, where multinationals search for the least regulated country in which it can produce its goods cheapest. It describes a perfect world for foreign investors. It means that the workers who can pitch themselves most cheaply to oversized capital are the most "successful" in getting work. In the absence of any new International where workers can coordinate on a level that might counterpoise the "race to the bottom", the result is that they often turn on each other.

Like all imperial strategies, the racket find voices of support in the local intelligentsia, whose job it is to rationalize brutal power and make it acceptable to the minds of the population. In the US, one such bright spark is Thomas Friedman, who calls the system outlined a "Golden Straitjacket" – i.e. the poor countries have no choice but to accept it, but it is beneficial for them. His evidence is that in 1975 only 8 percent of countries worldwide had liberal, free-market regimes; at that time, foreign direct investment (FDI) totaled $23 billion. But by 1997, by which time the Bretton Woods institutions had done their most ardent work, this figure had soared to $644 billion.[6] For Friedman, the increasing gap between the rich and poor was irrelevant, the human reality behind these figures did not penetrate his thinking, and he was not alone. Fetishizing investment is a widespread malady. But investment, and even growth itself, has no correlation with the improvement of life for the majority of the population in developing countries. It enriches a local elite, Friedman's friends, his colleagues in the media and finance and the rest of the racketeers. But the people see none of it, and never have. In fact, the US knowingly pushed this strategy because, far from providing benefits to the debtors, it benefitted US multinationals. As governments in developing countries have been made to privatize and open up their economies at the behest of the IMF and other bodies, they have had to solicit investment. The most successful countries have become those that create the optimum conditions for transnational corporations – led by the US. These conditions, unsurprisingly, are lax labor and environmental laws and low corporate tax regimes. Transnational corporations have spent the past 25 years running this race, looking for the poorest country with the least social infrastructure in which they can produce most cheaply, turning the globe, or its poorest parts, into a wasteland of broken people and destroyed landscapes. This is all called "globalization" by the racket's intelligentsia. Referring to this, Martin Khor, director of the Third World Network, has said: "Globalization is what we in the Third World have for several centuries called colonization."[7] No one is arguing that more interconnectedness is bad, it's "investor-rights" globalization that is opposed, merely because it is an updated form of imperialism that neutralizes the agency of billions of people. The so-called Washington Consensus removes freedom of choice from poor countries. They can no longer choose any development model that puts the needs of their own citizens ahead of the needs of international capital.

This "race to the bottom" also means that FDI has been uneven in developing countries. While Friedman may laud the increase in FDI, he fails to mention that there is a stark discrepancy between the few developing countries that have ridden on the crest of the “neoliberal”, US-led wave – “higher-tier developing countries” – and the rest who haven’t been so lucky. It is also quite clear that the real success stories of the period in question actually were the countries of East Asia who took a very different economic position than the neoliberalism that was rampant in Latin America and Africa. The state took on a heavy role in places like South Korea and Taiwan, and there were countless state programs to help the poor, bucking the neoliberal religion. South Korea is an anomaly – it doesn’t fit the usual model, it’s not a pure free-market economy at all – it’s a highly controlled economy with the government giving a lot of direction. Its success was due in good part to the fact it wasn’t following the structural adjustment rules. The same is true of countries like Taiwan – another controlled economy that didn’t move toward the radical free enterprise system according to structural adjustment rules. The former neoliberal colonies, like Bolivia and Venezuela, which are now renegotiating unfair contracts with western companies, are inevitably denounced but, according to Joseph Stiglitz, the Nobel Prize-winning economist who was formerly chief economist at the World Bank but turned against it, what they are doing “makes a lot of sense”. The previous contracts had given next to nothing to the people of either country – that’s what we call investment and they call imperialism. “The notion that you would want to invest more in education and health also makes a lot of sense,” adds Stiglitz. “What we don’t yet know is the extent to which they will be able to succeed in doing what the previous governments failed, which was to provide a broad basis for development. You need education and health, but some things take longer, and we don’t know the answer to that yet.” But if you take that course, as Hugo Chávez, the former president of Venezuela, did, you inevitably step on the toes of the racketeers. So it will try to take you out, as the US tried with tacit support for a 2002 coup attempt in Venezuela. Or in the case of another desperately poor country, Haiti, the US and its allies in Bretton Woods will wait until a crisis leaves you helpless to take full advantage.

As capitalism has taken on new – what philosopher Zygmunt Bauman calls “liquid” forms – it has been harder for people across the world to fight back. An asymmetry has emerged whereby those who own the capital, who own the means of production, are not in any way dependent on the workers who make their profits. If a worker raises a finger, tries to fight for better conditions for himself or his co-workers, then the bosses can just move operations to somewhere where they can pay even less, where the grass is greener for capital. Workers on the other hand are stuck in their place – most have responsibilities like family, children and unpaid debts. The idea of the free movement of workers is a sham; many people are in fact stuck to the ground for prosaic reasons of everyday life. So the rich increase their life chances and prospects – the poor stay rooted in a bleak existence with no way out. It creates two parallel existences, two discrete classes. "When one side is fixed to the ground and has no mobility then the concept of liquid modern life is of very little use for them," Bauman told me. "That situation differentiates very considerably the life situation, life prospects, life chances, of different kinds of pleasure – it is polarizing."

When I interviewed Stiglitz, he told me that the Washington Consensus actually comprised a long list of policies, some of which were apparently "appropriate" at some times. In Stiglitz's opinion, the problem was that this neoliberal ideology had become, in a sense, a religion, a set of extreme ideas that were seen to be a one-size-fits-all panacea for all the economic problems of the developing world. In layman's terms, this was "free-market fundamentalism". Stiglitz maintains that the Bretton Woods institutions have come to realize that their policies have been a failure, yet in his book, The $3 Trillion War, he looks at the economic system now imposed on Iraq after the war and occupation. "I think one of the last attempts to impose neoliberal doctrines was in Iraq," he told me. "After the World Bank had abandoned these ideas, the Bush administration was pushing it in Iraq: instant liberalization, instant privatization, even if it was against international law we tried to push it. It's played a role in the difficulty of recovery." The Bush administration had attempted to oversee the privatization of all the natural resources in the Iraqi economy, through the constitution itself. When I was at the FT, a senior executive at Japanese investment bank Nomura said to me in an off-the-record interview: "Well, we all know we went into Iraq to secure 3,000 barrels of oil a day." He thought it was funny that I had thought any different. This is how the racketeers talk behind closed doors. "I think one of the big, big worries is that the privatizations [in Iraq] will not have legitimacy and without legitimacy they may be reversed," Stiglitz told me. "And if there is worry about them being reversed it will undermine investment, it will make it more likely that the privatizations will not have the beneficial effect that was hoped, and there will be asset stripping rather than wealth creation, so I think it was a very foolish thing to do." Stiglitz was right that it would prove a disaster. He was wrong, though, to think that the World Bank and the IMF had learnt the error of their ways. They have not, because the logic of the system they oversee makes it impossible. These ideas remain popular, despite their failure, because they make the rich richer. And there are plenty more of these mad, bad ideas where this came from.

THREE

RIGGING THE SYSTEM

THE WHOLE TRUTH: FREE TRADE

"Almost every concern of the world, from the risks and safety of GMOs to climate change and biodiversity, from the protection of indigenous knowledge and resources to the reform of undemocratic and authoritarian global institutions like the WTO and IMF to global justice and fair trade, is reduced by the US to a question of 'free trade'."[1]

The fiction of "free trade" is one of the most potent weapons in the armor of the US in prizing concessions out of weaker countries and consigning them to an eternity of underdevelopment. More accurately, "free trade" refers to the freedom of America to do as it pleases in its trading relationships, while everyone else is forced to create economies conducive to being flooded by American goods. From the creation, as part of the Bretton Woods package, of the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade (GATT), later to become the World Trade Organization (WTO), the United States has preached the virtues of "free and fair trade". In reality it has practiced nothing of the sort. A particularly infamous example is the June 1930 Smoot–Hawley Tariff Act that raised US tariffs to historically high levels in order to keep out foreign products. In this case, extreme American protectionism backfired and the Smoot–Hawley tariff is now widely seen as a contributor to the crippling depression that enveloped the US in that period. The official story is that the Smoot–Hawley tariff was the "high-water mark of US protectionism in the twentieth century" and that in the aftermath of that "mistake" the US learnt the error of its ways and henceforth "generally assumed the mantle of champion of freer international trade" (quoted from the official State Department history). In fact, this is the opposite of the truth. Free trade has always been, rather, an ideal the US government supported when it served its purpose and spurned when it did not. In 1947 the GATT was signed with the ostensible purpose of economic liberalization, the obliteration of tariffs for import and exports, and the creation of stronger international cooperation. But as the historian John Bellamy Foster points out, the US put forward the GATT "with the intention of consolidating the economic control exercised by the center states, and the United States in particular, over the periphery and hence the entire world market".[2] A pattern begins to emerge.

In essence, the GATT became a forum for trade negotiations, with numerous rounds of talks. The most notable of these was the partially successful Kennedy Round of 1962–67 where real reductions were made in the trade barriers put up among the involved nations. This changed a decade after the Kennedy Round when the GATT assumed its role as a vehicle for US interests. Anthony Gamble, the economist, says that at this point the "US began to turn to a dual-track strategy with regard to trade liberalization". Gamble was pointing out a certain tendency that the US had developed: the US puts pressure within the GATT to pursue a multilateral approach (this eventually led to the Uruguay Round in 1986 which gave birth to the WTO), while at the same time pursuing a course of explicit national self-interest outside. This was achieved through various new forms of protectionism and the initiation of bilateral trade liberalization with strategic partners such as Canada and Israel. One academic notes further how the US actually "formally remained outside the GATT regime": the US Senate never ratified the GATT. But, he adds, the Senate "allowed the GATT system to work in a legal sense, by and large". This precarious relationship with the GATT was consciously created because it allowed the US to be largely unconstrained by agreements which could have damaging economic consequences, while taking advantage of markets that could be prized open through the organization. The US was also upset that some countries were refusing to become part of the racket's trade regime en masse. William E. Brock, the US trade representative in 1985 under President Ronald Reagan, is open about the workings. "The reasoning behind these efforts," he said in reference to bilateral agreements outside the GATT, "is that additional trade-creating, GATT-consistent liberalization measures should not be postponed while some of the more inward-looking contemplate their own economic malaise."[3] Reagan himself was maybe the West's most zealous preacher of laissez-faire and free trade but, according to Foreign Affairs, "presided over the greatest swing toward the protectionism since the 1930s".[4]

This led to the most notable bilateral agreement, the US–Canada free trade agreement, which was signed in 1989. It showed that the US was serious about forming arrangements outside the GATT and made economic sense for American business: Canada was the main single trading partner of the US. It imported $79 billion of US exports in 1989, nearly 22 percent of its total and almost double that taken by Japan. Liberalization across the US's other border, in Mexico, had seen US exports rise from $12.4 billion in 1986 to $25 billion in 1989. The supposed symbiotic trading relationship between these countries – the US, Canada and Mexico – eventually led to the North American Free Trade Agreement (NAFTA) which was signed in 1992 and put into force on January 1, 1994 (not without opposition as will be explored in a later chapter). Its selling point was the potential to bring together 360 million people and enjoin a collective GDP of approximately $6,239 billion. But this agreement followed the paradigm started in the 1970s. The economic model pushed by NAFTA and other bilateral arrangements with countries in Latin America was one of forced structural adjustment that reflected "the triumph of economic liberalism, of faith in export-led growth and of belief in the centrality of the private sector to the development process". This meant that any country wanting to trade with the US – a vital prerequisite for a developing nation to maintain a successful economy – had to adhere to this economic agenda. The US thus achieved its goal of making the rest of the hemisphere in its own image. The George Bush I administration, according to Anthony Payne, "conceived of NAFTA in wholly national interest terms, as devices by which to create an increasingly integrated hemispheric economy which the US could then use as the base from which to export ever more competitively to other, more distant, markets, preferably within the ambit of an extended GATT."[5] This thesis is supported by a comment made by Peter Hakim, staff director of the Inter-American Dialogue, who told Congress in March 1991: "Of every dollar Latin America spends on imports, 50 cents comes to the United States. There is nowhere else in the world where we enjoy that kind of advantage." Another of the major myths promoted by the US and its agents is that "trade liberalization" – which is code for getting rid of obstructions to US products – is a vital prerequisite for development. The truth is very different. The East Asian economies that have developed impressively in the second half of the 20th century are market economies, but South Korea, for example, is far from a free-market economy. It is, in fact, highly controlled and has bucked the structural adjustment rules. Taiwan is the same: it refused to abandon the economic tools it had in place to protect indigenous industry. Economic success followed.

I spoke to Bernie Sanders, US senator for Vermont, self-described socialist, and opponent of the free trade agreements. According to him, such agreements are emblematic of what's wrong with the global economy. “What happens to local agriculture, to farmers who are doing subsistence farming, feeding their families?” he said. “They may get driven off of the land because there'll be some export crops available, whether it's coffee, or something else.” This is exactly what I had seen in Haiti, where subsistence farmers were pushed off their land by rice dumped by the US in the 1990s; then they were told that with foreign investment subsistence farming was no longer viable and “export-orientated” production was the order of the day. The impact on domestic workers is also disastrous. Sanders continued: “My own view is that, especially for this country, the evidence is overwhelming that the function of these so-called free trade agreements is not to open up foreign markets for American products made in America, but to give corporations the opportunity to shut down here, and move abroad, and take advantage of cheap labor.” The effect for working Americans, and the economies of the weaker countries is clear.

Sanders continued: “What astounds me about this whole debate is I think the evidence is just crystal clear that China has cost us millions of jobs, NAFTA has cost us millions of jobs, and why people want to continue to go forward in a policy which just does not work for American workers, it really does speak, getting back to money, to the power of corporate America. You look at the polls out there; Republicans were saying, no, we don't think free trade has done well for America, and yet, you've got Republicans and many Democrats who are defying the popular will, and defying all of the evidence, and that just speaks to the power of money.” The corporations benefit from free trade, which is why it is maintained. A major part of all free trade agreements is the entrenchment of a legal regime that enshrines “investor rights”, which means that domestic constituencies are often overruled in favor of foreign interests. It is part of further integrating countries into a global economy run in the interests of international capital rather than people. “Free trade agreements” actually often have nothing to do with trade – in the sense of a mutual lowering of tariffs. They are used, instead, to entrench corporate ownership of society through changes to the law in favor of investors. The free trade agreements, and associated bilateral investment treaties (BITs), often include a mechanism called “investor–state dispute settlement” (ISDS) which allows multinationals to sue a state, in international venues, that regulates or acts in a way the company doesn't like. Power is drained from nominally sovereign governments and consequently their populations. Through this vast web of treaties and "agreements" criss-crossing the globe, our world's real rulers take control.

AND NOTHING BUT THE TRUTH: AID AND INVESTMENT

But "free trade" is not a lone star. Aid, and with it the obsession with "foreign investment", are the others jewels in the crown. The Marshall Plan – or the European Recovery Act – which was the $13.3 billion aid package ($1.5 billion in loans) given to 16 Western European nations by the US in 1947 is a good place to start. One Harvard historian describes the Marshall Plan as "the high-water mark of official unrequited transfers to foreign governments". Dexter Perkins, writing in 1948, said: "The feeling that security and the preservation of free institutions are at stake provided the motive-power behind the Secretary's program." The former US president George W. Bush called it "a moral victory that resulted in better lives for individual human beings". The tendency for this "gift" to be absorbed into the ideological framework of American beneficence is easy to understand. On the surface it appears to be motivated by the undoubtedly selfless goal of rejuvenating Europe's economies on the back of a demanding war. But on closer inspection things look somewhat different. According to the historian Melvyn Leffler, the Marshall Plan was devised to, quite simply, "benefit the American economy". When I went to the World Bank archives in Washington, DC, I found a document written in the aftermath of its establishment which outlined openly how "foreign aid" was being used to bolster the US economy after World War II. "In large part, the outflow of goods after the war was financed by the United States Government grants and loans, through the Marshall Plan and other programs", it read. "In broad terms, it can be said that the Foreign Aid programs of the [US] Government have financed over $30 billion of exports from 1946 to 1952, or about one-third of total exports for this period." The document pointed out that it wasn't just foreign aid; war was also good for business: "An added stimulus to the outward flow of goods was provided by the Korean war and the Western rearmament policy". The primary motive of the Marshall Plan, and to some extent the whole Bretton Woods package, was the rectification of what these documents called "the dollar gap". Before World War II there was a triangular economic arrangement, in which the US bought raw materials from colonies "owned" by Europe's powers and, in turn, the US could count on its exports being bought in Europe. It was extremely important for US interests that this symbiotic trade pattern be restored in the wake of the war. European (and Japanese) access to developing world markets thus became a very important strategic consideration. The best way for Marshall and his cronies to secure such a trade relationship was to introduce large-scale aid to Europe, so that it had enough economic clout to keep buying US goods. This is spelled out clearly and brazenly in internal planning documents from that period. Undersecretary of State Dean Acheson, in his call for economic aid to Europe in May 1947, talks at length about the "physical destruction" and "economic dislocation" across Europe; fair enough, but he frames his elegies to a lost European dominance with his desire for American supremacy. After listing the devastation in Europe, he laments: "the accumulation of these grim developments has produced a disparity between production in the United States and production in the rest of the world that is staggering in proportions."[6] This is the aforementioned "dollar gap". He then says: "Your Congress and your Government is carrying out a policy of relief and reconstruction today chiefly as a matter of national self-interest."[7] Simple as that.

With the far right defeated and discredited in Germany, Italy and Japan, however, the initial allure of Soviet-style communism was considerable. The disbanded resistance movements all over Europe had a large communist element and they were a real and present danger to the "class" interests of the US, especially in the face of the Soviet superpower. According to one historian, the Marshall Plan was used "to force Europe to soft-pedal welfare programs, limit wages, control inflation, and create an environment conducive for capital investment – part of it financed out of labor's pocket".[8] The US was aware that making Europe dependent and reliant on dollars would provide a fatal blow to the attempts of the Soviets to push their sphere of influence westward. Commenting on the rebuilding of Germany by the US, Leffler writes: "Whereas the Americans hoped that German power would be co-opted, controlled, and modulated, the Soviets naturally feared, as did many Western Europeans, that the steps to rebuild German power might in the long term have unfortunate consequences."[9] The scale of the Soviet apprehension about the intentions of the US in its "state-building" is revealed by their refusal to allow the Eastern European countries under their de facto control to participate in the Marshall Plan. Their hostility to American aid is understandable and was not misplaced. Internal planning documents that anticipated the Marshall Plan stipulated that a major purpose of US foreign aid would be "To reduce or to prevent the growth or advancement of national or international power which constitutes a substantial threat to US security and well-being and to oppose programs of coercion and infiltration, especially when effected by the use of armed minorities and to oppose the spread of chaos and extremism." The catch-all phraseology is undoubtedly aimed at the Soviet Union and its partisans of whom there was a burgeoning number post-1945. After the Cold War, and during, this actually meant using foreign aid to keep on a leash smaller powers that looked to be moving towards independent nationalism or any form of meaningful sovereignty. The western intelligentsia garnered the good-will of their citizens by harping on foreign aid – i.e. "free" money going to the developing world to help ameliorate health problems and poverty. Aid is, in fact, "often deployed to supplement private trade and financing"; it is a method of control, as we will see when we investigate USAID later in the book. Far from being the long-awaited break with a paradigm that has seen the West exploit and pillage the Global South for centuries, the "debt relief " and "aid packages" offered by the rich nations are a continuation of the same shameful modalities. Behind all the glistening propaganda about a "new era for Africa", and "the birth of western altruism", lay a dull and familiar blueprint for the export of the so-called "neoliberal" economic model, better represented as neo-imperialism. During one G-8 summit in the 2000s, the finance minister's statement stipulated that to qualify for debt relief developing countries must "boost private sector development" and "eliminate impediments to private investment, both domestic and foreign". These are the sine qua non for the entrenchment of the neoliberal economic model. It further transpired, when the self-congratulation had eased only slightly, that much of the money donated to the 18 Heavily Indebted Poor Countries was actually coming out of their aid payments. This meant that the increase in funding was negligible at best, and non-existent at worst. All those except the heavily myopic saw through the G-8 leaders' attempts to sublimate the spread of neoliberalism (and the easing of aid payments) into debt relief. As we see, after a little inspection of the small print, debt relief, as most people understand it – the effacing of all debts with no catches – is not, in fact, supported by any leader in the racket.

ANOTHER WAY OF DOING THINGS

Despite the fact that the racket has remained unchallenged for decades, this does not mean that the racketeers are paranoia free. Nowhere is the decline of US power and influence felt more than with the US's political and economic relationship with Latin America. US planners used to refer to Latin America as "our backyard". These days the new players in Latin America are, primarily, Asian. "What you have is a process of structural change in the trade patterns in Latin America, that is very significant and likely to continue to go in that direction," Augusto de la Torre, chief economist for Latin America and the Caribbean at the World Bank, told me in his office in Washington. "The region is becoming highly differentiated, with countries, mainly in South America, diversifying their export-destination markets significantly," he added. A decade ago, Asia accounted for roughly 5 percent of the region's trade, but this has ballooned to 20 percent. Much of the growth is down to the region's commodity riches, particularly iron ore, being sucked in by a booming China. The US's most important trading bloc, the North American Free Trade Agreement (NAFTA), is nearly two decades old and is starting to look its age. The share of trade between the three signatories – the US, Mexico and Canada – has fallen by nearly 10 percent in a decade: from 55 percent of the countries' global exports in 1999 to 46 percent in 2009. President Barack Obama even campaigned for the presidency on his opposition to the NAFTA agreement in its current form and complained about former president George W. Bush's attitude that "any trade agreement is a good trade agreement" and lamented the fact that NAFTA "did not have enforceable labor agreements and environmental agreements", which was disgraceful and true. In power, Obama reneged on his promise to renegotiate the deal, like he did on so many things. Later, he even approved a trade agreement with Colombia, one that had been zealously backed by Republicans and business groups in Washington. Pressure from labor groups and unions had briefly given Mr Obama pause, but he eventually signed on the dotted line. The US–Panama accord, meanwhile, which was signed by Panama in 2007, had still not been ratified, with business groups using the common propaganda argument that delays have "allowed US rivals to capitalize".

A move to regional trading blocs in Latin America has also begun to chip away at the racket's control. The most significant of the groupings has been Mercosur, which was founded in 1985 and includes all South America's main economies as full or associate members. But its progress has not been steady and, since the early 1990s, it has been stuck over the removal of barriers, witnessing in some cases reversals and new obstructions. Although a serious grouping, Mercosur accounts for only 11 percent of Brazilian trade, for example. The US has been happy with this, as it means more reliance on the empire upstairs. But Latin American governments could now choose who they deal with, which lowered the importance of appeasing US interests. The more recent grouping, the Bolivarian Alliance for the Peoples of Our America (ALBA), was more scary to the Americans because it was largely set up as a political, rather than an economic, bloc, as an explicit way of avoiding the US dominating the people of the region. One place the US still had direct control over was Colombia, which was the jewel in the crown of the racket in the region, the Israel of Latin America.

Stationed in the FT office in Washington, DC in 2011, I was asked to watch the passage of a free trade agreement that was being furiously debated in Congress. As we have seen, such agreements are intended to give preferential trade terms to producers in the respective countries, in this case the US in Colombia and vice-versa. At least that's the theory. What actually happens is that jobs leave the richer nation and go to the country where workers are paid a pittance, while goods from the richer country flood the poorer, pushing out indigenous production. The winners, once again, are transnational corporations who spread their tentacles further into foreign lands, with less regulation and increased freedom to pollute and destroy. In this case, the tariffs Colombia had in place on American goods would be eliminated. Tariffs are government taxes that are imposed on foreign products in an effort to protect indigenous industries that have to compete with (sometimes) cheaper goods. In eliminating these, the Colombian government was potentially destroying its own manufacturers. It is no surprise that Republicans – the chief representatives of the racket – were pressing President Obama hard to push through a deal. In Washington, I called a Republican congressman, Kevin Brady, who told me of his fears that China, the new kid on the block, was invading the US's traditional backyard: Latin America. The free trade agreement would help the US to stave off China's rise, which had recently become even scarier for imperial managers when it was revealed that China was planning to build an alternative "dry canal" across the Panama isthmus. The US had traditionally had complete control of the Panama isthmus through the Panama Canal, which remains the only sea path through the western hemisphere – from Canada to the bottom of Argentina. The US had signed a treaty with Panama in the early 20th century for control of the canal after its own US Army Corps of Engineers built it. Panama itself had been created with the help of the US when it seceded from Colombia in 1903.

Brady, who represented Texas's 8th congressional district, was a member of the committee overseeing the passage of the free trade agreement. "This shows how aggressively China and other US competitors are establishing markets in our backyard," he told me. "China is taking smart advantage of America's inexcusable delay of nearly five years in approving its free trade agreement with Colombia." Barack Obama, no real friend of working people, had been cautious to sign it because it would lose him support among the Democratic base and the unions who were ardently opposing the deal. The reasons were simple: the deal would destroy American jobs, as even more production was "off-shored" to other countries. Free trade agreements often only benefit labor (not wages) in the poorer country, while locking in an "investor-rights" economic climate. (And when I say "benefit" I should add that the type of work it locks poor countries into is often sweatshop labor, as subsistence or small-scale agriculture is destroyed by subsidized products from the US or Europe coming in without tariffs. The people have to leave the countryside and become part of this new "economic miracle" of working in sweatshops for slave wages six days a week.) Unions also pointed out the Colombian government's horrendous record with labor and human rights. The country ranks as the most dangerous in the world to be a trade unionist, as far-right paramilitaries, allied in many cases with the government, terrorize civil society. In the end Obama saw what he wanted to see and accepted the cosmetic changes that the Colombian premier, Juan Manuel Santos, promised. It is a familiar story: little to no real change.

For over 40 years there has been a civil war raging in Colombia between government forces and left-wing guerrilla groups, in which the US has been heavily involved. The ongoing battle for control over strategic areas has resulted in many civilians being caught in the crossfire. An estimated 70,000 people have been killed in the past 20 years. Of these, over 2,700 have been trade union leaders, the overwhelming majority of whom were targeted by government-sponsored paramilitary groups in an attempt to stamp out worker mobilization. According to the human rights organization Global Exchange, since the US began sending aircraft and on-the-ground training to Colombia in 2000, politically motivated killings have risen from 14 to 20 per day, and the number of kidnappings and disappearances has doubled. In 2004, Bush asked Congress to prolong the generous aid package to Colombia for the years to come, adding to the $3 billion donated over the previous five years (it was started under Bill Clinton's "Plan Colombia"). One in ten Colombians has been uprooted because of the violence. It is estimated that there are over 3.5 million internally displaced persons (IDPs) in the country, the second highest number in the world after Syria. Within this panorama of internal violence and forced acquisition of land, women have been adversely affected: around 65 percent of the displaced population are women (the effects of US imperialism are inevitably worse for women). This gender imbalance is a result of the common breakdown of families following the stresses of displacement, which in many cases causes the men to leave; or when the men are killed their wives and partners are forced to escape alone with their families. The experience of 17-year-old Yessika Hoyos is, sadly, not unusual. During her first month of law school in Bogotá – the capital of Colombia – her uncle showed up to fetch her from class. He told her that she was needed at the hospital. Yessika and her uncle made the hour-long car journey to the family's local hospital in the town of Fusagasugá. There, Yessika saw her mother and her siblings huddled together. Her 14-year-old sister had found their father lying in a pool of blood outside his friend's house. As she ran to attempt to resuscitate him, she found that he was riddled with bullets. Shot seven times in the head, he had died instantly.

"My father's name was Jorge Darios Hoyos Franco, he was a trade union leader and on the 3rd of March 2001 he was assassinated," Yessika, aged 25 when we met her, with a tone of self-assuredness that belies the horrors of the personal tragedy she was recollecting, told me and my colleague Ana Arendar. "Initially, like with all the trade unionists that have been assassinated in Colombia, the police claimed that it had been a murder of passion … We knew this not to be true as my father had been receiving death threats for months due to his trade union activity … so we had to really fight and struggle for the truth to come out." Yessika and her mother began to petition for her father's killers to be brought to justice. They gave interviews in the local media and worked with a national center for human rights to collect evidence. "Then my mother started receiving calls telling her that we had to keep our mouths shut or we would end up like my father," said Yessika. "People started coming to our house and threatening us, we were followed in the street, that's why two weeks later we were forced to leave our house and we became displaced. We went to Bogotá. In one year we moved house at least five times, because every time we moved they would find us and threaten us so we would have to move again."

This was also the case for Haydee Moreno, whose husband was assassinated by paramilitary factions in 1994. She was left widowed with a five-year-old son while four months pregnant. “We had to abandon everything we owned, all our belongings, our house and our land, and move,” she said. “It is the women who are most vulnerable in a situation of displacement. We have to think about how we are going to find food for our children, how we are going to make sure they get an education, while also worrying about how we are going to stay safe and provide for the family.”

A report by the non-governmental organization Refugees International highlighted sustained government failure in dealing with IDPs or developing adequate responses to the needs of specific groups such as women and children. The report identified the gender dimensions of displacement which have been largely ignored, these include: lack of access to healthcare – especially access to obstetric care; high levels of domestic abuse triggered by the increased stresses brought on the family; the psychological trauma suffered by women who have lost loved ones; the high number of women who have turned to prostitution as a means of supporting their families; and the high incidences of rape and sexual violence which have been continually used as an act of war by both sides of the conflict. This devastating injustice impelled the Constitutional Court in Colombia to rule that the government is failing in its duty to provide humanitarian assistance to the country’s displaced women. “The government now appear to be doing something but their efforts aren’t proving effective,” explained Isabel Ortiz Perez, president of Mujer y Futuro, a Colombian foundation that works to defend women’s rights. “There is no coordination between the programs they offer. For example they have been attempting to create housing for displaced women but they won’t create any education facilities. As a result displaced children aren’t able to go to school and mothers aren’t able to work as they have to look after their children during the day.”

Isabel thinks that the government should be focusing its efforts on the provision of childcare and helping women find employment within the formal sector. “At the moment the majority of displaced women are employed in the informal sector, selling sweets on the streets or working in the domestic sector. This is all work in the informal economy which means that these women are left without social services or healthcare.”

Yessika finished her law degree and now works for the José Alvear Restrepo legal collective (CAJAR), a human rights firm which is handling her father’s assassination case. Despite the arrest of the men who shot her father, those who ordered the killing remain free. Yet Yessika considers herself to have been one of the lucky ones. When her family was displaced, her mother was able to keep her job as a schoolteacher and they had friends who helped them move to Bogotá. “My mum was able to continue with her work, if she hadn’t I wouldn’t be here now, neither would I have been able to complete my law degree,” she said. “But most of the displaced women who arrive in Bogotá are peasants whose lives and customs revolve around cultivating the land. They often arrive in the city illiterate with no education and no possessions, what hope do they have?”

US support for this kind of barbarism might even be futile now, as China steps into the fold. “We’re in a new era,” Larry Birns, director of the Council on Hemispheric Affairs, told me when I interviewed him in Washington. “It’s an era where strategy is defined more in terms of access to food and commodities, rather than naval bases and alliance policy. The Chinese are leading the way. US primacy was largely due to the fact it had no competitors, now it only has competitors,” he added. Other countries are weary of the US style of imperialism, and see China as a way of escaping the investor-rights straitjacket imposed by the US. Brazil, the source of much of China’s iron ore, which produces steel, is a good example. (The US helped overthrow the country’s democratic government in 1964, installing a brutal security state which ruled for decades.) The move to a global economy revolving round commodities has also upset the traditional dominance of the US (and the EU). The US which used to rule the roost in trade discussions, through the WTO, is now being bypassed; any number of countries are becoming emergent countries, and they are benefitting even more because they are not consumer economies. The advantages that used to accrue automatically to the US have, to some extent, now slipped to the other side, to the poor nations, because they have agricultural commodities and oil. But the US-enforced system of corporate mining and resource extraction, a particularly vicious arm of the global racket, which gets these commodities out of the ground for a healthy profit, still causes untold suffering around the world.

CURSING YOUR RICHES

KILLING FOR TREASURE

One of the oldest money-making schemes of the racket is the pursuit of the natural minerals under the ground of another country. The mining industry is a multi-billion-dollar enterprise, which sees transnational corporations shift natural resources around the world. The annual turnover of many of these corporations is bigger than that of the countries from which they are extracting. The US is at the forefront of keeping economies in the Global South open to western mining companies – often by getting rid of governments that want to do things differently. The corporations are from all over the rich world, and they often destroy the environment of the local areas. The people on the ground, those who fight back, are never viewed kindly – and mining companies often, with the help of local proxies, will take them out. When I was covering mining at the Financial Times, I went through a period where, to put it simply, people kept being killed. Perhaps unsurprisingly, none of my contacts in the mining world would talk to me about it, but I'd see repeat newswire stories of people being gunned down on the streets by no-one-knew-whom. In a six-day period over Christmas 2010, for example, while I was working for the FT in London, two prominent anti-mining activists in El Salvador were shot dead in broad daylight. First, Ramiro Rivera Gómez, vice-president of the Cabañas Environment Committee (CEC), which was campaigning to stop Canadian mining company Pacific Rim from opening a gold mine in the area, was killed while walking with his 14-year-old daughter. Six days later, Dora "Alicia" Recinos Sorto was shot returning from washing laundry in a nearby lake. She was eight months pregnant and another prominent member of the CEC. Amnesty International called on the Salvadoran authorities to investigate the killings, but nothing happened.

So I decided to call the company. “This has nothing to do with Pacific Rim. It’s a local family feud,” Tom Shrake, chief executive of the company, told me, sounding agitated. I guessed FT journalists didn’t ask these sorts of things very often. He continued: “There are radical elements out there that would like people to believe it’s about mining, but it’s not true.” But stories of violence and disruption at mining sites around the developing world are common and consistent. In Mexico, also in that December, the authorities temporarily closed down a barite mine operated by another Canadian company, Blackfire Exploration, after indigenous leader and activist Mariano Abarca Roblero was shot in the head and killed by a passing motorcyclist. Abarca Roblero had been a leader of the Mexican Network of People Affected by Mining, and was involved in the resistance to an open pit extraction mine in Chiapas. I soon realized that similar deaths were happening all the time, everywhere. These incidents were indicative of a program of intimidation and murder for anyone who opposed the opening up of their land to foreign mining companies.

These stories brought back bad memories for an industry that had spent decades lavishing considerable amounts of money and time on trying to clean up its image – not because it cared about the people being displaced, but because it was starting to hurt the bottom line. In a 2007 article in the Multinational Business Review, Hevina Dashwood explained that mining companies “were caught in the mid-1990s with a significant gap between societal expectations and their institutionalized practices … For the industry as a whole, the gap had widened so much that companies experienced a legitimacy crisis.” The industry-wide obsession with “sustainability” and corporate social responsibility (CSR) started around the turn of the millennium as mining companies started to feel the effects of their reputation in their ability to operate around the world and make money. This crisis was averted by a slew of new organizations dedicated to promoting CSR and improving the image of the industry. In 1999, nine of the biggest mining companies joined forces to create the Global Mining Initiative, intended to provide ideas and strategies for “sustainability in mining”. In 2001, the representative body for the mining industry was transformed into the International Council on Mining and Metals (ICMM), which dedicated itself to 10 principles – from education to the environment – to which the industry pledged to hold itself. The field of CSR was so popular in the mining industry during this period that the University of Queensland in Australia founded its own Sustainable Minerals Institute in 2001 to promote the practice. It was, the school said, established "in response to growing interest in and debate about the role of the mining and minerals industry in contemporary society".[1]

But in reality, despite cosmetic changes, nothing fundamental changed. The dynamic of capitalism meant it never could: the mining companies didn't go to these poor countries for charity; they wanted to take their minerals and make a profit on them. Paying workers well, or paying to clear up after themselves, hurt the bottom line and shareholders, which was what these institutions, by definition, cared about. "The recent murders of mining organizers in Mexico and Guatemala, and horrendous toxic waste spills such as at Barrick Gold's North Mara mine in Tanzania, make it very hard for the mining companies to convince us that their conduct has improved," Alexis Stoumbelis, executive director of the Committee in Solidarity with the People of El Salvador, which had spoken out about the assassinations in the country, told me. "What has changed is the mining companies' attention to and investment in projecting an image of themselves as socially and environmentally responsible." She was right.

But agents of the racket don't just come in the form of chief executives. These places employ people to improve their image – the black world of public relations. Tim Purcell, a director of the public relations firm CO_3, predictably disagreed: "The larger players have now had to tackle ICMM issues," he said. "Some [issues] are old as the hills, from indigenous tribal issues, to political insensitivity, to profound health and safety issues. But the industry does take these issues seriously, and it shares the concern and strategies about dealing with these things … About 10 years ago major mining companies had big reputational issues," he continued. "The criticisms … were starting to affect business. Companies weren't getting licenses to operate – things like that." When business was hurt, things had to change. Or at least the image of things had to change. In truth, the people in the countries, behind the paeans to foreign investment and new jobs, were slaves to an old and well-established form of imperialism that had consigned them to underdevelopment for centuries.

At that time, I also spoke to Kenmare Resources, a company that owns and operates a titanium mine in Mozambique which was one of the "success stories" of this trend for corporate concern about reputation in the mining industry. It won a Corporate Social Responsibility Award in 2009 from the Chamber of Commerce of Ireland for its Kenmare Moma Development Association (KMAD), which was founded in 2004. The company also won the Nedbank Socio-Economic Award for the same project. "Basically, right at the outset of the project, we knew that in order for this to be a long-term success, we had to make sure that people saw it as an economic good for them – not for the country, but for them directly," said Kenmare's managing director, Michael Carvill, parroting the official lies. "In order to achieve this, we set up a not-for-profit development organization with the objective of ensuring that the local communities benefit from mines." In the mining industry, making sure that local people actually have some benefit from their resources warrants copious prizes.

Carvill told me all the wonderful things KMAD provides to the local communities in Mozambique, from jobs to healthcare to agricultural training. "We even started a wildlife fund joint-venture, which provided agriculture technicians to tutor people in how to grow stuff that might be sold to the mine, and we lean on the mine so they buy," Carvill said. "It has given people who were in absolute poverty some money, and it has allowed for a better trickle-down effect. We've also built a couple of schools." The truth of Kenmare's venture for the people of Mozambique is in the fine print. The Moma mine operates in an industrial free zone (IFZ), which makes the processing plant exempt from corporate taxes, import duties, export duties and VAT, with a 1 percent turnover after six years of production. It is estimated that Moma could have annual revenues of $85 million over a 20-year period. This "arrangement" comes straight out the racket's playbook: you pay no taxes or royalties on the people's minerals and then act like Jesus Christ come to save the natives with schools and hospitals. No matter that these are of poor quality and cost well below the millions of dollars you've saved in taxes. PR job complete.

This kind of deal is often cut between governments and foreign companies, especially when capital costs will be high, and it's one of the main gripes of civil society groups in developing countries, which argue that while jobs and benefits may flow to the communities near the site, the rest of the country is left empty-handed, save for those elements of infrastructure needed to connect the site to the rest of the country. The argument from mining companies is that they have the capital and expertise that developing countries don't, which might be true. But the answer in that case is for developing countries to build up their indigenous expertise by building an engineering university. Of course, mining companies don't want to hear this because it would make them obsolete, so the trend continues: the developing countries stay underdeveloped and reliant on foreign capital – until they get a leader with the people's interests at heart, rather than the interests of foreign capitalists, as in Bolivia, which we'll look at later.

"When I first engaged in this industry, over 30 years ago, with very few exceptions it was rough-handed and red-necked," said John Elkington, founder of SustainAbility, a strategy consultancy and think-tank. "These people were real bruisers. In the same way it's said that you can't make omelets without breaking eggs, they argued that you couldn't dig mines without destroying the environment. They had no time for environmentalists." Now though, he said, things are different. "I genuinely believe that the ICMM process helped catalyze real progress – and some industry leaders have had some sort of crisis of conscience over the past decade or so."

It was all lies. Nothing has changed apart from appearances. Some in the mining industry admitted they didn't even know what "sustainability" actually means, even while they sing its praises. "I wouldn't actually know how to define it; it's very ill-defined and got such a broad spectrum," Dr Bernard Olivier, executive director of miner TanzaniteOne, told me in South Africa. "We care about making sure the local community is bought into the process, but I don't know if that's the definition of 'sustainability'." Chief executives of mining companies talk about the need for a "social license" – or a lack of community backlash – to work in foreign countries. The new paradigm was meant to make this easier. The mining meet-up I went to in Cape Town, South Africa, lasted only four days, but half of the schedule was given over to discussions of CSR. Despite this preoccupation, many leading mining companies also cannot provide definitive figures on how much they spend on CSR. I asked the five biggest companies – BHP Billiton, Rio Tinto, Vedanta, Anglo American and Xstrata – to tell me what they spent. Only Vedanta provided a figure for CSR at the group level and the company could only provide two years of data. The other four said they don't account for CSR spending – under which fall local community projects and environmental awareness – as a discrete category. Anglo American, which said it could not provide any figures at all, commented: "For Anglo American, corporate social investment and responsible business practices are absolutely embedded in the way we operate." The figures from the other four show that spending in the categories which they pointed to as closest to CSR have risen significantly since 2004, but year-on-year increases have been patchy and inconsistent. Rio Tinto said the nearest it comes to accounting for CSR is its "external costs" accounting section. Xstrata provided figures for corporate social involvement (CSI), which only includes investment to initiatives or projects that benefit the broader community where it works, not the "significant expenditure" on day-to-day operational expenses. However, its CSI spending rose precipitously from £10.5 million to £102 million but fell by nearly half to £58.5 million in 2008.

KILLING FOR PROFIT

Despite CSR and CSI spending, despite all the PR, the human story was not getting any better, as became apparent when I started looking into contemporary legal battles. One of the most high-profile cases involving local resistance to a new mining project involved the company Vedanta. A tribal people in India called the Dongria Kondh are engaged in a civil disobedience campaign to stop the company from developing an open-pit bauxite mine in the Niyamgiri hills, in the state of Orissa, in eastern India. The Dongria worship Niyamgiri's peak as the seat of their god. Vedanta already has a bauxite mine at the base of the hills. A British government agency, the UK National Contact Point (NCP), which oversees the enforcement of Organisation for Economic Cooperation and Development (OECD) guidelines on business conduct, released a statement critical of Vedanta. It concluded: "Vedanta failed to engage the Dongria Kondh in adequate and timely consultations about the construction of the mine, or to use other mechanisms to assess the implications of its activities on the community, such as an indigenous or human rights impact assessment." And yet, since January 2009, after the financial crisis when the Vedanta share price was as low as 584p, the stock has quintupled to 2,106p. During this period the company received reams of bad press; the Church of England and the Joseph Rowntree Charitable Trust sold their stock; and the company was condemned by the NCP. But only four days after the Rowntree announcement, Vedanta's share price jumped 72p in one day to £26.26. In August 2006, a proposed coal operation in Phulbari, Bangladesh, became the center of a protest that badly impacted the share price of GCM Resources which owned the asset. Local resistance had been building and eventually a crowd of 50,000 people marched to the offices of GCM. In this case, the police fired live rounds on the peaceful protest and killed three people and injured many more. "While the market should pay more than lip service to CSR, the reality is that it only cares if social unrest on the ground starts to impact a mine's operational performance," Joe Lunn, mining analyst at finnCap, told me. "Generally speaking, the assets of large mining companies are more diversified with enhanced geographical spread so are less affected than a small company with a single project." In the same month as the NCP ruling, the English High Court froze £5 million of assets belonging to another British mining company, Monterrico Metals, after 27 men and women were allegedly detained for three days at its Rio Blanco mine in northern Peru. The 27 were protesting the mine's development. In development circles the term "resource curse" has been invented to describe the tendency for these great sources of wealth to turn into destitution and violence for the citizens sitting on top of the deposits, while profits are sent abroad. It is, of course, not an accident that it ends like this.

When I was in South Africa in 2012, the mining honchos talked endless hot air about the wonderful safety standards upheld by the mining companies, as happy workers beamed out from glossy brochures. But at the same time the leading mining companies on the London Stock Exchange had failed to bring down the number of fatalities at their operations, despite constant rhetoric to the contrary. I surveyed four leading UK-listed mining groups – Rio Tinto, Vedanta, Xstrata and BHP Billiton – and found the number of fatalities had more than doubled since 2005. The companies recorded 23 deaths in 2005, while in 2008 the figure was 54. The FT published the story – derision ensued.[2] "It's a difficult one because, I think, individually companies are seeing results," said Carel Labuschagne, chief executive of the International Register of Certificated Auditors, a risk management group advising companies on safety issues. "The problem is the cultural change coming down from management is a process." Rio Tinto asserted: "Safety is in everything we do. Our figures should be looked at in terms of an expanding workforce. But of course, any fatality is too many and we strive to keep it to an absolute minimum." There are no binding regulations on mining safety although there are international "standards" – as with everything else in the industry, when it comes to social concerns the law constraining companies is merely a gentlemen's agreement.

One mining executive I spoke to summed up the real reasons for the change in image, and also the reason why even the smallest improvements are, at root, undertaken for profit. "I'd love to say our projects were entirely altruistic," said Brad Sampson, executive director of Discovery Metals, a copper mining company operating in Botswana, "but the last decade or so, mining companies have realized that unless you bring along the local community, you can't operate. If you don't, you will not get a social license to operate. I'm not talking about paper – but that local communities can stop projects from developing. You have to get them on side. What you are doing with a mining project in a faraway part of the world, you are imposing a degree of change, which is difficult. I think there's no question that the mining industry came with a messy reputation. Whether that is deserved you can debate."

Over the last decade, the global mining industry has awakened to the need to address sustainability issues. But for this to be fully realized and its services utilized over the next decade, many within the industry believe that a binding international regulatory framework is the vital next step. "Voluntarism only takes you so far," said Elkington of SustainAbility. "It helps promote experimental approaches and a degree of competitive behavior, but there will always be those companies that prefer not to follow the corporate-citizenship line. They have to be brought under control via appropriate governance – regulatory and legal mechanisms." That hasn't happened.

OUR LITHIUM

Evo Morales, the president of Bolivia, is at the forefront of a change in the attitude among developing-world leaders toward foreign – or, more specifically, western – mining companies. His country owns half the world's deposits of lithium, which could be hugely lucrative if developed. But his government is reluctant to let western companies in. Mining minister Luis Alberto Echazu has said: "We will not repeat the historical experience since the 15th century: raw materials exported for the industrialization of the West, which has left us poor." Instead, Bolivia has bucked conventional developmental economics – which outsources development and production to foreign companies expert in the field and with reserves of capital – and has endeavored to develop its deposits with state-owned companies, rebuffing the overtures of countless western companies. Morales needs to raise $800 million to construct the mines and processing plants needed for this approach. In an industry report, Bolivian mining was reported to have grown 13 percent in 2009.

In 2012, I went to see the Bolivian ambassador to the UK to find out what was behind this new way of doing things. She told me she doesn't get many requests for media interviews. When financial news outlets in the West write about Latin America, it's inevitably an article lauding the "economic miracle" ' of its Brazilian neighbor or a scaremongering editorial about the Red Menace of Venezuela. But a look at the media elsewhere – specifically emerging markets in East Asia – and the story isn't so monochrome. In fact, China's state news agency, Xinhua, covers pretty much every statement made by Bolivian President Evo Morales. Why?

It's quite simple: a soft, silver-white metal called lithium. This landlocked country of 9 million people, which is the poorest in South America, has the world's largest reserves of a mineral that could become one of the most sought-after of the century. It's needed to make the batteries that will power the electric car revolution that many are waiting for, particularly in China.

But the Movimiento al Socialismo (MAS) has been in government since 2005 and it is pioneering a new development model, which, if successful, could become the norm across the developing world. What may worry multinational mining companies and their backers is that it takes no heed of the International Monetary Fund (IMF) and World Bank orthodoxy, which has traditionally advocated minimal regulation on foreign direct investment. "I know that they are in some discussions with France, Korea and Japan about working in Bolivia to develop lithium, but we don't want to be only raw material exporters. We want to create added value in the country," said Ambassador Maria Beatriz Souviron, as she sat in the Bolivian embassy in Eaton Square. By "added value" Ms Souviron means building factories in Bolivia to manufacture the batteries within the country, rather than sending the metals abroad once they are out of the ground. It's an idea that has an increasing number of proponents all over the world of emerging markets. In an interview in 2011, Nigeria's State Commissioner for Agriculture and Natural Resources, Akin Akinnigbagbe, said of his country's cocoa exports: "We are equally embarking on what I will call value addition to the business of cocoa. This will take the form of processing it at home before selling into the international market. This will equally assist the farmers to get higher profit unlike in the past, when cocoa beans are exported directly to the international market; with the farmers having no control on the price."[3] It could mean a harder time for western companies. "The policy of my government is to retain sovereignty over the investments made in the country," said Souviron. "So if the people that want to invest in my country and follow that rule of value-added, then it's fine. If not we'll do it ourselves." And the challenge to orthodox development models has so far been a success. The Bolivian government has managed to run a current account surplus of 12.1 percent of GDP in 2007, 11.6 percent in 2008, and 3.4 percent in 2009 as the government spent to keep the country from recession. Along with Venezuela and Argentina, Bolivia was the only country in the whole of Latin America and the Caribbean to be forecast a current account surplus by the IMF in 2010. So far the Morales administration has "inked" a Memorandum of Understanding with the South Koreans to develop the lithium after the president was happy with Korea's "efforts to use clean technology" and its willingness to abide by the new endogenous growth model Bolivia is seeking.

The advent of the Chinese is also changing how business is done. The miner Bellzone, for example, agreed a deal with China for investment in its iron ore project in Guinea that stipulated funding infrastructure in return for mineral supplies. The iron ore project at Kalia in the West African country is substantial. It has a defined resource of 2.4 billion tonnes and the company is aiming for 50 million tonnes of production a year. With an eye on its insatiable appetite for steel, the China International Fund (CIF) agreed to spend about $3 billion on building the infrastructure needed for the project. Chinese companies are increasingly offering to build transport and energy infrastructure for mining companies in return for deals to buy the minerals produced, or off-take agreements. "It's a new form of pragmatism," Tim Williams, analyst at Ernst & Young, told me. "They don't want to bother with outright control, so they won't buy a majority stake, but will plough money into infrastructure." He added: "You've got companies with good assets but no money and no project finance. Most of the equity markets are still weak, so they have to look at something else." The Bolivians have gone into projects with the Chinese, reporting that they treat them like equals, in a way the Americans never have done.

In recent years, the owners of the mining industry have invented a curious language. When a country decides that its own people, instead of a foreign company, should profit from the minerals under their own ground at a fair price, foreign companies call this "resource nationalism", a pejorative term. I spoke to African Consolidated Resource (ACR) – a miner working in Zimbabwe – which had its mining license in the country's Marange diamond fields finally cancelled by the mining secretary, Thankful Musukutwa, after months of a protracted legal process. "We actually won in the High Court, which said our license was good in September," Roy Tucker, chief financial officer at ACR, told me. "But the government appealed to the Supreme Court, who have said nothing should be mined." The government invoked the Mine and Minerals Act which stipulates that certain lands are reserved against prospecting. "It's unconnected to the court case," said Mr Tucker. "They've proposed new grounds for cancellation, they suddenly discovered the ground where the license is, which was reserved against prospecting, apparently. The obvious suspicion is that something has been changed in the records." ACR and other companies operating in Zimbabwe were also up against a new law proposed by Robert Mugabe and his Zanu-PF party which will give the country a majority stake in any foreign company operating assets in Zimbabwe. For the foreign capitalists this was too much; they wanted it to be like Haiti where they had won and Haitians were forced into a minority stake in their industries – by law. “By some date in April companies are asked to submit plans so that 51 percent of the company is held in indigenous hands within five years, so we have to submit a plan,” said Mr Tucker, seriously agitated.

In South Africa, parts of the ruling African National Congress (ANC) government have been making statements about the nationalization of the mining industry since the end of apartheid, as was promised in the ANC’s famous and noble Freedom Charter. When I was in South Africa, Julius Malema, then president of the ANC Youth League, was saying that nationalization of the mining industry was now a strong priority, and it should be. Unfortunately, economic apartheid was never taken on in South Africa. “We are aware that there are efforts to topple and replace liberation movements with puppet governments … who exploit the minerals of Africa,” he said.

At the 2010 Mining Indaba – the most important resources conference in Africa – the mining minister, Susan Shabangu, felt compelled to tell the gathered mining industry – rich white men in suits – in no uncertain terms “there will be no nationalization of the mines in my lifetime”. The people who had so much to gain from this imperialism trotted out the usual arguments. “Nationalization of mines has never worked anywhere in the world and there is no evidence for it to work in South Africa,” David Nel, chief executive of Strategic Natural Resources, a coal miner working in South Africa, told me. “The South African GDP is significantly dependent on revenue earned from mining and the foreign investment this brings to South Africa; the disinvestment in South Africa would be catastrophic.” But what if they nationalized the mines and put them under South African control? What if the profits were repatriated not to London and New York but were invested in the schools of Soweto and Johannesburg? Impossible, they said. Even talk of imposing fairer royalty and tax agreements sparked the ire of the foreign companies. Most of the real action took place outside the convention center, where access to talks and company exhibits cost a cool $1,500. Decadent parties were thrown in bars and mansions around Cape Town by PR companies, investment banks and brokerages, all seeking new clients and trying to upstage each other as to who could put on the most spectacular show. Against this backdrop, the mining industry tried to manipulate political forces.

One of the conference's biggest themes, for example, was investor security in Africa. All the big African economies sent ministerial delegations to give talks and assuage investor fears, telling them how wonderfully they would be treated. They were trying to avoid things like the Nigerian government's 2012 Petroleum Industry Bill, which attempts to reform the lucrative oil sector by allowing the government to bring down the profits of foreign companies and impose more stringent taxes and royalties. The usual suspects were apoplectic in that case: independence and sovereignty for poor countries is incompatible with how the racket functions. However, if somehow they "lose" a country to independence, the racket turns to the enforcement stage, which is a central part of the criminal enterprise they oversee.

YOUR FRIENDLY, LOCAL TYPES

In 1945 there was a genuine desire among the victors of World War II to devise an international political system that would ensure there would be no third world war. As the Nuremberg Trials drew to a close, a host of international laws were drawn up with this purpose in mind. The Geneva Conventions and the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, among others, were designed to give “rules of play” to war and enshrine certain inalienable rights for the whole of humanity. At the time many looked ruefully at the League of Nations which had been so ineffective in arbitrating Great Power conflict in the inter-war period, between 1918 and 1939. Memories of the gratuitously harsh Treaty of Versailles in 1919, which many still maintain led indirectly to the rise of Nazi Germany, played on the minds of planners. The need to get the postwar institutional structure right was paramount. The most important political and diplomatic institution set up at this point to rectify the mistakes of the past was the United Nations. There was lofty rhetoric about a “new paradigm” of cordial relations between the hitherto hostile powers. Some intellectuals of the time, such as Dexter Perkins, believed the UN was an example of noble “self-abnegation on the part of a great power”, because it “bound the United States to accept decisions that might run counter to the judgment of Washington”. For Perkins, this was proof that the United States had gone far to demonstrate its willingness to “submit its own policies to the collective opinion of states inferior to itself from the point of view of physical power”. But scrutiny of the composition of the nascent United Nations reveals the lengths that the great powers, led by the US, had gone to in their effort to consolidate their grip on power, not truncate it.

The UN was created as three separate legislative bodies, and the format devised in 1945 exists today without significant reform. The General Assembly is a forum to discuss issues related to international law and those pertaining to the functioning of the UN. Compared to the International Monetary Fund (IMF) and the World Bank, its democratic credentials are luminous: it runs on a one-country, one-vote basis and needs two-thirds of the house to support a motion for it to be passed. Its sister institution, the Economic and Social Council, assists the General Assembly with economic and social dealings. It has 54 members, all chosen by the General Assembly. The most important body in the UN (and incidentally the most susceptible to corruption and manipulation) is the Security Council where all the most pressing international issues relating to "war and peace" are discussed and voted on. It was created in 1945 with five permanent members: the US, Britain, France, Russia and China. It has another 10 rotating members who serve two-year terms. The power of the Security Council derives from the fact that it can make member states enforce the UN Charter (which incidentally is broken by the US on a near daily basis with threats against foreign countries).

The crucial qualification was, and still is, that any of the permanent members of the UN Security Council have the power to unilaterally veto a prospective resolution. In 1945 this gave executive power to three western imperial powers – the United States, Britain and France – alongside another eastern imperial power, Soviet Russia. Archconservative Republican senator Arthur Vandenberg wrote in his diary in 1945 about the newly formed UN: "The striking thing about it is that it is so conservative from a nationalist standpoint. It is based virtually on a four-power alliance … This is anything but a wild-eyed internationalist dream of a world State … I am deeply impressed (and surprised) to find [Cordell] Hull so carefully guarding our American veto in his scheme of things."[1] The historian Ellen Meiskins Wood goes further, stating that the UN's "very existence" was geared toward "discouraging forms of international organization less congenial to the dominant powers".[2] The undemocratic nature of the Security Council would seem to support Wood's thesis, even though some historians argue that at the end of World War II the necessity of a rapprochement between the Great Powers was greater than any idealistic commitment to democracy.

Regardless of the historical contingencies and the original intent of the US planners, the treatment of the UN over the next 50 years certainly indicates that the institutional framework laid down in 1945 was consciously left open to manipulation. From its inception, the UN has enabled the US to enforce its own foreign policy objectives with a veneer of international support. Because of its legitimacy in the eyes of the international community, the UN is a part of the US effort to legitimate foreign wars in the eyes of its citizens (and its allies). When I spoke to the then British Foreign Secretary Jack Straw, he was keen to repeatedly point to the pretext of UN resolutions when discussing the 2003 US/UK war in Iraq. “Look, we went into Iraq on the basis of United Nations resolutions,” he told me at the Foreign Office on Whitehall in London. “Now, you can argue about whether we needed another resolution but there were about 15 resolutions already there. And they were very special circumstances. And Iraq would not have been caught up in all this trouble if it had not had a nuclear weapons program, a chemical weapons program, and a biological weapons program.”

The US was held in check somewhat by the Soviet Union which had similar objectives throughout the Cold War. With the decline of the Soviet Union and the move to a unipolar international arrangement, American domination lost all inhibitions. There was also a marked change in the 1960s and 1970s when decolonization put many developing countries outside the sphere of influence of the US. This change is spelled out by former member of the Reagan–Bush State Department and now historian, Francis Fukuyama. He states quite openly and without sorrow that the UN has become “perfectly serviceable as an instrument of American unilateralism and indeed may be the primary mechanism through which unilateralism will be exercised in the future”.[3] The UN also wrestles with the fact that the US has always been a large financial donor to the institution and so its very survival relies on it. The US was donating $2.4 billion by the end of the 20th century, which comprised 25 percent of the whole UN budget. When I asked the historian Michael Mann whether he thought the UN had become a rubber stamp for US policies he alluded to this fundamental flaw with the UN structure, saying that while there was “some negotiations” it was inevitably “around American leadership and that is how American politicians would see it, both moderate Republicans and Democrats. After all, what can Europe do? If you want some kind of action somewhere in the world, a Rwanda or Sudan, what can Europe do? It can’t point a thousand troops in any single direction. The only power that can is the US, especially if logistical capacity is needed.”

The method used for maintaining primacy over the United Nations has primarily been the use of foreign aid. Available statistics demonstrate the corollary between US aid and votes at the United Nations – basically the US grants aid money when certain countries guarantee to vote in line with the US at the UN (and other multilateral bodies). For example, the airport in Haiti’s capital Port-au-Prince was built by the US in exchange for the dictator of the time supporting the US in opposing Cuba's entry into the Organization of American States. J. Brian Atwood, the administrator of the US Agency for International Development (USAID), told Congress in March 1998: "In many respects, [the foreign aid budget] is a bare-boned and balanced approach to development and humanitarian programs that will significantly contribute to achieving the administration's foreign policy objectives." If votes can't be bought, the US will veto. It has, by far, the highest veto record of any power on the Security Council in the period since the 1960s. It has consistently blocked resolutions calling on states to observe international law. Behind the US is Britain, with France and Russia far behind. Even when it does not block resolutions it will water them down or keep matters off the agenda entirely. The 1999 war in Kosovo did not pass through the UN at all, for example. But the US and its satrap, the UK, as mentioned, use the UN to legitimate their imperialism to this day. "Do you think the British or American troops being in Iraq is exacerbating the situation?" I asked Mr Straw in 2006 when he was Foreign Secretary. "No," he replied. "We're there now under a United Nations mandate and we're there on a time limited basis. The mandate will run out at the end of this year unless renewed. More particularly, we're only there as long as the Iraqi government – elected – says we should be there. And what we and the Americans and the other coalition partners are seeking to do is to build up the Iraqi forces so that we can then draw down our forces on a province by province basis." That was standard racket-speech: of course, we were only there at the request of a government. The fine print is important, though: we happened to install this government.

If all these methods fail, then the next step is to try to discredit the UN and accuse it of anti-Americanism and being anachronistic and out-of-touch. So when the US attacked Grenada in 1983, despite the disapproval of the UN, President Ronald Reagan said: "One hundred nations in the UN have not agreed with us on just about everything that's come before them, where we're involved, and it didn't upset my breakfast at all."[4] When I spoke to the hawkish historian Andrew Roberts and asked him about the UN's conduct during the "Iraq crisis" in early 2003, he parroted the American president and poured scorn on the UN. "What astonished me," he said, "was the way in which many in America and the British Isles seemed to assume that no war could be legitimate unless it had the sanction of the United Nations Security Council. When one looks at the United Nations Security Council – countries like [rotating member] Cameroon sitting on there. The idea that we should have our freedom of action circumvented by a bunch of kleptocracies in Africa is an absolute absurdity. Of course they are going to vote against the extension of democracy – that's not in their interests. We fortunately, back in 1982 when the Falklands were invaded, didn't give a toss what the UN thought – as it turned out the UN were on our side. But we would have still gone ahead with the action come what may." Such disdain for the UN is common among the racketeers (when it does not vote their way). But most of the time, the UN and similar multilateral institutions act as a neo-imperialist system in which you do not have colonies but you have client states; these are tied to the US by military interchanges and loans made with the IMF or World Bank. Poor countries are tied into a system of loose dependency.

LET US HELP YOU

Without fail, aid programs are defined as altruistic. The so-called Truman Doctrine, coming as a response to perceived aggression from the Soviet Union in the Middle East, is exemplary. Attitudes towards the Soviet Union had been mixed in 1945. Eric Johnston, president of the US Chamber of Commerce, went so far as to say: "Russia will be our, if not our biggest, at least our most eager consumer." There was a hope on the part of what Walter LaFeber calls "The Big Three" – Russia, the US and Britain – that they could put together a world order that relied heavily on them. The hope was short-lived as the US became more and more suspicious of the Soviet Union and the perceived advances it was making into Western Europe. President Harry Truman said privately in 1945, "Our agreements with the Soviet Union [have been] a one-way street", and concluded somewhat undiplomatically that the Soviet Union "could go to hell".[5] Eventually, a political program, christened "containment" by the influential State Department official George F. Kennan, was put in place. Its main function was to stop the march of communist forces that had achieved varying success in Turkey and Greece and various Arab countries. According to Kennan, whose sentiments were exposed in a "top secret" telegram sent to Washington from Moscow in February 1946, "Nothing short of complete disarmament, delivery of our air and naval forces to Russia and resigning of powers to American Communists" would placate Josef Stalin's "baleful misgivings".[6] Truman delivered his seminal address to a joint session of both houses of the Congress on March 12, 1947. "It must be the policy of the United States," he said, "to support free peoples who are resisting attempted subjugation by armed minorities or by outside pressures.” Those “outside pressures” were strongly spelled out in the National Security Council’s Report 68 from 1950, which read: “The Soviet Union, unlike previous aspirants to hegemony, is animated by a new fanatic faith, antithetical to our own, and seeks to impose its absolute authority over the rest of the world … The issues that face us are momentous, involving the fulfillment or destruction not only of this Republic but of civilization itself.” Truman’s doctrine allowed for military and economic help to any regime deemed to be defending “civilization” against the “fanatic faith”. It also, more quietly, legitimated giving succor to any resistant element in foreign countries that had shown themselves to be intent on the “destruction … of civilization itself ”; ergo, any country with a planned economic model not conducive to American corporate interests. This ideology became the pretext for many of the battles America fought for the next 50 years. The conservative historian Samuel P. Huntington wrote: “You have to sell [intervention or other military action] in such a way as to create the misimpression that it is the Soviet Union that you are fighting. That is what the United States has done ever since the Truman Doctrine.”[7]

The Middle East itself before 1945 was largely under the remit of the British empire, alongside other imperial powers such as France. As the empires of Western Europe gradually crumbled after World War II, the United States took up the mantle and borrowed many of the techniques of imperial control pioneered by the British – divide and rule being its favored tactic. This area of the world was of particular importance to US planners because it had the biggest reserves of natural oil in the world. The State Department in 1945 explicitly called Saudi Arabia – with overtones for the whole region – “a stupendous source of strategic power, and one of the greatest material prizes in world history”.[8] The Americans picked up where the British left off. Strategic alliances were made with compliant states that became virtual vassals of the American superpower. Any state deemed to be taking the line of “independent nationalism” – a term applied to any regime whose leaders did not cede to all the dictates of US economic policy – was the target of subversion (political and economic). When he was Mayor of London, I spoke to Ken Livingstone, who by then had been strolling through the corridors of power for 30 years. He told me: “You’ve had 80 years of Britain and America and France intervening in Arab and Muslim countries – always around the issue of control of oil.”

The overthrow of President Mohammad Mosaddeq in Iran in 1953 is an illuminating case because it shows very clearly the priorities of American political policy in the region, as well as marking the unofficial handover of power in the Middle East from the UK to the US. Mosaddeq himself was the head of a parliamentary democracy that, according to the prevailing ideology, should have made him a "friend" of America. He was also a "fervent nationalist" who had renationalized the country's oil that had hitherto been under the control of the British-run Anglo-Iranian Oil Company (originally the Anglo-Persian Oil company). The coup that overthrew Mosaddeq was a joint US–British machination, which demonstrates the overlap of the two imperial strategies. Up until Mosaddeq's attempts to divert the oil resources of his country back to his people, the Anglo-Iranian Oil Company had allowed Iran only about 20 percent of the profits from its own oil. When Mosaddeq threatened the economic interests of the US and Britain, he put his own survival in jeopardy. On top of the economic interest, the threat of communist Russia "was palpable". The Russians had actually occupied parts of northern Iran at the conclusion of World War II and procured an oil concession in the area. There was concern among US planners that Mosaddeq was becoming "dangerously dependent" on Iran's communist party, the Tudeh. With the twin threats of "economic independence" and "Soviet Russia" on the horizon, the CIA, along with its British counterparts, arranged a coup. CIA agents solicited support on the streets of Iran, concentrating specifically on the military, and bribed a large portion of the establishment into acquiescence. After massive street demonstrations that threw the city into chaos, Mosaddeq was arrested and the Shah was put back on his throne. Owing to the vital role played by the CIA in bringing down Mosaddeq, the British now gave them a percentage of the oil revenue from Iran. Parroting the ideological pieties derived from the Truman Doctrine, John Foster Dulles, the Secretary of State in President Eisenhower's administration, exulted in a victory over a "Communist-dominated regime". A version closer to the truth is explicated by one historian who wrote that, knowing "almost nothing about Iran", they installed a Shah who "would always seem beholden to the United States".[9]

America has been careful and brutal in its choice of allies from the end of World War II. Many alliances have been short-lived and based on a realpolitik geopolitical relationship – Saddam Hussein in the 1970s and 80s, for example – but the alliances with a number of other countries have been more durable. I am going to discuss here the "special relationships" with Britain and Israel because they have had the most political importance within the "international community". Since 1945 it has been said that Britain has a "special relationship" with the US. Jack Straw, the then UK Foreign Secretary, told me that he preferred the term "close relationship": "I've always thought – I mean, clearly people talk about 'special relationship' – I always think 'special relationship' sounds rather exclusive. Plenty of countries have a close relationship with the United States. It's a different relationship from that that we have with other countries but so is our relationship with France or Germany. The crucial thing about the US is that, first of all, there's this very strong historic tie. There's the fact that we have depended on them for victory in two world wars. That the world is, no question, safer if we're working together than if we're working against each other. And the fact that they account for a quarter of the world's economic activity and, rather more than that, of the world's scientific innovation. So you'd have to be nuts not to try and develop a close relationship with the United States."

But Straw's perception is not entirely accurate because nearly every British prime minister since World War II has been seduced by this idea of a "special relationship". On only one occasion since 1945 has a British prime minister refused to support the United States in its forays abroad. This was during the Vietnam War in the 1960s when the Labour premier Harold Wilson refused to send even a token dispatch of troops. On this occasion the uproar among American policy-makers was indicative of the role they saw Britain providing for US foreign policy. "Be British!" exclaimed one American official when the foreign secretary George Brown went to Washington in January 1968. "How can you betray us?" Clare Short MP, erstwhile member of the British cabinet, told me: "Every single post-war prime minister of both parties – apart from Edward Heath – has been obsessed with the special relationship as the centerpiece of British foreign policy. And I think this is a pathetic, 'lost after empire we never found a role' way of thinking. If the PM of Britain can pick up the phone – for example, Harold Macmillan would talk to President Kennedy during the Cuban Missile Crisis and give him a bit of advice and then he thought he was an actor in this world drama. And it's pathetic but it's core thinking about Britain's role in the world. I mean, out of the Iraq crisis the country needs to stop that. Not that we fall out with the US but that we are not a lapdog, that we try to build a new multilateral order and use all our relationship to construct what is needed in these times. It's really interesting that Heath was fixated on getting the support of the unions so he didn't do it." The relationship is of particular import for the Americans because Britain has also played the “mediating role between the US and Europe”. In international organizations and political dogfights – which have been frequent between the US and other Western European countries – the UK has always supported and backed the United States. Because Britain has a permanent seat on the UN Security Council, this unflinching support has proved important to successive administrations. There is also an army of British intellectuals and journalists who set the ideological ground for the US to maraud around the world with its British poodle in the background. But it is unclear what the British get out of this relationship, apart from places for its soldiers to die. Other allies of the US at least get weapons of mass destruction to discipline their population or neighbors. Israel, for example, has used generous US aid for decades to discipline the Palestinians, the displaced indigenous people whose territory it has occupied for nearly 70 years.

SHEIKH JARRAH, PALESTINE

In a small house in the hills of East Jerusalem, I witnessed a microcosm of the slow-burn murder of a people. No American who reads the mainstream newspapers or watches the corporate TV news would have had any idea this was happening. But seeing it upfront there was no way to dispute the huge crime that was being perpetrated with American taxpayers' dollars and diplomatic support.

I spent a week sleeping on the floor in the home of the Hanoun family – a husband and wife and their three children, all Palestinian. I was there with the International Solidarity Movement (ISM) – a brave collection of international activists who attempt to help Palestinians non-violently resist Israeli oppression. East Jerusalem was, by international law and basic morality, to be the capital of a future Palestinian state. After the Six-Day War of 1967, Israel had illegally occupied East Jerusalem, in contravention of international law, and has never left. In fact, Israel was working to take it all. At the time of writing, in August 2014, the Israelis have killed more than 2,000 Palestinians in Gaza, the vast majority civilians. There is talk in the mainstream Israeli media about depopulating Gaza and turning it into an Israeli tourist attraction. But during the time I was there the most pressing of the many issues were the attempts by an Israeli settler company to slowly cleanse East Jerusalem of its Arab population, focusing its efforts at that time on the neighborhood of Sheikh Jarrah, which sits in a beautiful valley looking out toward Bethlehem. Longer-term activists were sleeping there as well, ready to document what everyone expected would be an imminent eviction. A few months later, at 5.30am, the Israeli border police did come and forcibly evict the Hanouns (so forcibly that the son Rami had to be taken to hospital). The activists were arrested, as were protesters who subsequently took to the streets. The Hanouns were offered a tent by the Red Cross. It was the culmination of a decade-long program of intimidation and harassment of the Sheikh Jarrah community that had seen lives destroyed to appease the most rancid kind of religious zealotry.

Sheikh Jarrah is situated in a valley down from the American Colony Hotel where Tony Blair, former British prime minister and possibly the most willing servant of the American racket in the world, was staying in a luxury suite when he graced Jerusalem with his presence as the racket's "Peace Envoy". When you looked out of the Hanouns' window, Blair's hotel was 30m away; Blair, I had no doubt, could see the Hanouns' house during his morning swim. Before I contacted his spokesperson, Blair had nothing to say about the evictions, and he said nothing in the aftermath. That was one side of the valley. On the other, the British consulate peered down from its high security peak. The British consulate had been only slightly better, calling the latest eviction "appalling", but had done nothing tangible to halt this obscenity. The US silence was even louder. The Hanoun family, like so many Palestinians, had been the victims of terror for decades as they fought off Israel's attempts to take their homes. Maher Hanoun, who continued to lead the resistance, spoke to me with eloquence and calm as he chain-smoked his way through the evenings and recounted what had befallen his family. Maher's father was a refugee from the Nakba, or "the Catastrophe", as Palestinians call the founding of Israel in 1948 when gangs of Jewish paramilitaries expelled 800,000 Palestinians violently from their homes. Maher's father was forced out of Nablus; his grandfather was forced out of Haifa at the same time. The Jordanian government gave them the houses in East Jerusalem in 1956 as compensation and transferred the ownership to them in 1962. Maher was born in 1958 so had spent his whole life, and brought up all his children, in his home. The Israeli settler company, Nahalat Shimon, backed by the Israeli courts, used a forged century-old Ottoman-era contract to claim ownership. Like all over East Jerusalem, the Israelis also tried to bribe Maher with an open check, if he would go quietly. He refused. "This is my home," he told me. "I would never respect myself if I sold my home for money. They want to build a settlement on our hearts, on our dreams." In the end, they succeeded.

The Israelis' tactics were what Maher calls "slow torture", and included arrests, bribery and violence. In 1998, after Maher refused to start paying rent to settlers, soldiers came to his house while his mother was very ill with leukemia and took all their furniture, including the bed. Maher had pleaded with them to leave it so his mother could die peacefully. In 2002, the Israelis succeeded and eventually kicked the Hanouns out for four years, before they returned in 2006; in 2002 his two girls were 9 and 13 years old. Across the way, and in the sightline of Mr Blair and the British consulate, there was a makeshift tent where a 62-year-old woman was now living after settlers took over her house. Initially they only took two parts of her house so she was literally living next to them. Then she was kicked out. Her husband had a heart attack when the Israelis violently repossessed their house with the help of over 50 soldiers (on the night of Barack Obama's 2008 election victory). After spending some time in hospital, her husband had another attack two weeks later and died. The family again refused a bribe of an open check – in the millions of dollars – from the Israelis to leave their homes. "I don't have a life now," she told me from her tent. "With my husband and house gone, there is no life. I just hope with the help of God that this occupation will stop and we can return to our homes." I never could find out what happened to this woman in the violent eviction by Israeli forces, but one report I read said even her tent had been destroyed.

I walked from Sheikh Jarrah to the British consulate (it took about five minutes) and asked Karen McLuskie, the spokesperson, what the British line was on the ethnic cleansing of what is meant to be the future capital of Palestine. "The British position is that Jerusalem has to be the shared capital of two states," she told me. "I think what is happening in Sheikh Jarrah is not unique, sadly. There are a number of sites around Jerusalem where these kinds of actions are taking place – demolitions, evictions and settlement encouragement." She specifically declined to comment on what the British government is actually doing to stop this illegal and inhuman destruction of Sheikh Jarrah. Ms McLuskie did concede, however, that: "The annexation of Jerusalem simply makes it harder to reach a peace deal, it simply cuts off the options." After I contacted Blair's spokesperson I was told that "Blair has raised the issue with the Israeli government", and that "it remains an issue of concern". I asked if Mr Blair would make the three-minute walk down to the Hanouns' to talk to them about their predicament, to which the spokesperson assured me: "Staff from his office have previously visited families who have been evicted." Notice the past tense. Maybe when the Hanouns had actually been evicted, Blair would send an emissary to their tent. The Americans refused to give an interview.

When you look around East Jerusalem and the surrounding area, there are considerable plots of land without homes. If Israel wanted to (illegally) build new settlements without kicking out Palestinians in the area they could, there is space. The targeting of Sheikh Jarrah and other areas is a process of ethnic cleansing, the transformation of East Jerusalem into a unified Jewish Jerusalem. As Maher asked, “Why can’t they build a settlement on any other bit of land?” The one good thing about the Netanyahu–Lieberman administration, which was in power at the time, was that they were much more honest about their colonization program than their “centrist” predecessors. The Netanyahu administration was now willing to get rid of some “outposts” in return for continued expansion in East Jerusalem and “natural growth” in existing settlements throughout the West Bank. That was the same policy negotiated by Ehud Olmert and George W. Bush before the Annapolis conference in 2007. Netanyahu was just more honest in saying that it obviates the possibility of a Palestinian state. “I can’t see how we can have a capital if there is no land, no houses, no people,” agreed Maher.

The next stop in this attempt to cleanse the putative future capital of Palestine of its indigenous population was the al-Bustan area of Silwan, which sits in the valley down from the Dome of the Rock and the Western Wall. When I first arrived in Israel I went on the City of David tour, which functions as a three-hour Israeli propaganda extravaganza (dressed up as an archeological experience). King David in biblical lore is said to have been the first Jewish leader to settle the land in Jerusalem and his son King Solomon is said to have built the First Temple in the 960BC. In 2005, some archeological finds purported to provide evidence that supported this. Now the Israeli government was planning to turn the homes of the people of Silwan into an archeological theme park: 88 dwellings were due for demolition, home to about 1,500 Palestinians. At the end of the tour we went through the waterway that was built to connect the Old City to the spring outside the city walls. When I came out at the end of the tour, I didn’t realize that the spring was located in Silwan. A few days later I went to the tent where the residents of al-Bustan were mobilizing against the destruction of their homes and realized, while watching the tourists being bussed back up the hill to the “City of David”, where I had actually been. Again, as in Sheikh Jarrah, the people were defiant. “If they demolish my home, they will have to demolish my body too, I will die for my land,” said Zaid Ziulany, 54, who lived with his family in house “38” which was due for demolition. “Where are we meant to go?” he asked. “Should we all just sleep on the street?”

THE PATRON

Israel is – by any definition of international law – a rogue, terrorist state that practices colonial policies and serial war crimes against the Palestinians and has done so for decades, all supported by US taxpayers. There is no shortage of evidence that can be produced to support this claim. Having been initially turfed out of their homes in 1948 to make way for the nascent Jewish State, Palestinians have since lived in the meager strips of land afforded them by Israel and the surrounding Arab states: the Gaza Strip and the West Bank. Since then, any Jewish person who can prove their racial heritage has been entitled to settle in the Land of Israel while no Palestinian who was made a refugee in 1948 can go back to their home. This creates the insane scenario where I, owing to my Jewish heritage, can go to live in a place I have never really seen and have no connection to, whereas the estimated 4 million Palestinians living in refugee communities scattered around the Middle East, who were born and grew up in Palestine but had to flee in 1948 or 1967, cannot. Moshe Dayan, who was eventually Israel's "Defense" Minister, told the Palestinians: "You shall continue to live like dogs, and whoever wishes may leave, and we will see where this process leads." The same philosophy still prevails among Israeli elites. Since June 1967 when Israel fought a group of Arab states in the Six-Day War, Israel has occupied and built settlements that eat into the West Bank and the Gaza Strip. The settlements in Gaza were withdrawn in 2006, and the Israelis turned to a medieval siege to maintain control of the population. All of this is in contradiction of international law – Israel has been condemned by the UN repeatedly for its transgressions. The Security Council adopted UN Security Council Resolution 242 unanimously in 1967 in the aftermath of the Six-Day War. Adopted under Chapter VI of the United Nations Charter, it calls for the "withdrawal of Israeli armed forces from territories occupied in the recent conflict" and the "termination of all claims or states of belligerency". This still hasn't happened to this day: the mob doesn't have to abide by the law it sets for everyone else. Incidentally, the United States has vetoed all the subsequent resolutions brought against its client – that amounts to about 40 vetoes since 1972, all of which blocked votes unanimously supported by the other powers on the Security Council. It is these incursions into Palestinian land that motivate the violence and suicide bombing perpetrated by the Palestinian resistance and is at the root of all the international opprobrium directed toward Israel. But it has been Israeli state policy for the last 48 years to sacrifice security for expansion in the Occupied Territories.

The US propaganda runs that the Palestinians have been offered the West Bank and Gaza many times and rejected it. From the Oslo Accords in 1993 to the Camp David Summit in 2000, this is simply not true. The Palestinians have consistently been offered a deal which breaks up the West Bank into small, South African-style Bantustans with the right of return always denied. The one time a deal was struck with something resembling a fair final settlement – at Taba, Egypt in 2001 – the Israelis pulled out. In fact, in 2002 after a trip to the West Bank, the great South African freedom fighter and Nobel Laureate Archbishop Desmond Tutu compared the treatment of Palestinians under Israeli occupation with the treatment of blacks under the South African apartheid regime. "I've been very deeply distressed in my visit to the Holy Land; it reminded me so much of what happened to us blacks in South Africa," he said. "I have seen the humiliation of the Palestinians at checkpoints and roadblocks. They suffer like us when young white police officers prevented us from moving about. They seemed to derive so much joy from our humiliation." Israel has also built a "Security Wall" through the West Bank, again in contradiction of international law. The World Court at the Hague has said that "Israel is under an obligation to terminate its breaches of international law; it is under an obligation to cease forthwith the works of construction of the wall being built in the occupied Palestinian territory, including in and around East Jerusalem, to dismantle forthwith the structure therein situated". It never did.

There is, in fact, no great controversy over the main historical points at issue, and the conclusions that one should draw are simple. The situation is often obfuscated and blurred by the Israeli side to distract neutrals from the glaring, incandescent truth that the Palestinians are involved in one of the last colonial struggles left over from the 20th century. Norman Finkelstein, a scholar of US–Israeli relations, says that the Israel–Palestine conflict is "remarkably uncomplicated". "The stark truth is an unpleasant truth," he told me. "And so the pretext is that what we see and what seems so stark, the claim is, that actually isn't the case and so it's supposed to make you question your most elementary, your most basic moral judgment and sensibility." That the occupation of other people's land is wrong? "An occupation is wrong, building a wall around these people is wrong, shooting children for throwing stones is wrong, stealing people's land is wrong – that's not very complicated at all."

"They're making profit on the occupation," Jihad al-Wazir, Palestine's central bank governor, told me when I interviewed him for the FT in New York. "They control the electromagnetic waves, they control the real estate, they control 60 percent of the West Bank and this is why they like the status quo and this is why they don't want to have a Palestinian state because it's nice the way things are. They've taken land and people are not fighting them." Despite this obvious injustice, Israel remains the "third rail" in US political discourse because of the huge financing of the lobby that supports it. When I was at Columbia Journalism School my professor, who worked at the New Yorker, told me outright when I mentioned I wanted to do a piece critical of Israel not to do it. His words were: "Do it if you want, but criticizing Israel in the US is like railing against Mother Teresa: you'll never work in the American media."

The US alliance with Israel did not become economically or politically significant until the 1960s and 70s. Mr Finkelstein told me that "no one in America even cared about Israel for the first 20 years of its existence." What changed was the decline in the efficacy of the "Arab façade" whereby control of much of the Middle East could be exerted behind the scenes through subservient local Arab rulers. So when, for example, an Arab leader such as Gamal Abdel Nasser in Egypt turned to the Soviet Union, Israel became the perfect buffer against Arab nationalism and hopes of true independence in the Middle East. Around the time of President Nixon there was a conscious effort to buttress American power with what the Defense Secretary Melvin Laird called "local cops on the beat". The perfect "local cop" in the Middle East was the Jewish "democracy" Israel. As the CIA put it at the time: "a logical corollary" of opposition to Arab nationalism "would be to support Israel as the only reliable pro-Western power in the Middle East".[1] As the CIA was trying to destroy secular nationalism in the Middle East, ironically it was Israel and Islamic fundamentalists (Hamas was helped out initially by Israel) who provided the perfect vehicle to do it. The burgeoning relationship between the two countries served the self-interest of both. In a controversial essay, two prominent academics, John Mearsheimer and Stephen Walt, wrote that the pro-Israel lobby in Washington benefits Israel to the detriment of the US's own foreign policy objectives. The article caused great consternation among supporters of pro-Israel policies in the United States, but their argument was somewhat misplaced. The evidence would suggest that the relationship between the United States and Israel is much more symbiotic than Mearsheimer and Walt contend. Israel is, by far, the largest recipient of US aid presently. Since 1947 Israel has cost the US taxpayer nearly $84,855 million, which means that the taxpayer has paid $23,240 for every Israeli citizen alive.[2] This is not the result of a mystical, paranoid “Jewish lobby” or a completely anomalous foray into the politics of altruism. Israel plays a very important strategic role for the United States, one which is based primarily on political expediencies. There is the “cop on the beat” strand, but there were also concerns about the march of the Soviet Union in the Middle East. When Israel became reliant on US aid in the 1970s, its geopolitical outlook became much more western-oriented; its domestic society also became more unequal. Israel has long been the most loyal US supplicant in the Middle East and even globally. Together they supported apartheid South Africa and supplied weapons to fascist dictatorships in Latin America, among many other horrors. Israel also provided unflinching support for the US at the UN. The inventory of UN votes compiled by the State Department planner turned historian William Blum reveals that Israel reflexively votes with its patron on all matters, whether they are of strategic importance to Israel or not. In turn, according to Mr Finkelstein: “If you look at the record it’s Israel backed by the US who have been the obstacle to the resolution of the Middle East conflict, which the international community on the one hand and the Palestinians have supported.” Even though Israel has been condemned hundreds of times by the UN, even though it continues to occupy the West Bank and control the Gaza Strip, even though it has attacked its neighbors (Lebanon in 1982, killing 20,000), the US continues to provide support. There are evidently no conditions on the aid provided by America in terms of “good behavior”. Michael Mann, the historian, goes as far as to say: “I think Israel is actually the tail wagging the dog. Israel has more power there than the US does. It has a fifth column among the neo-cons and Zionists in the US and it can do whatever it likes.” All the US asks is that Israel remains a loyal “cop on the beat” to push US interests in the Middle East.

CRACKS IN THE OCCUPATION

While in Palestine, I also went to the capital of the Occupied Territories, Ramallah. I could sense the fatigue in the city. The feeling I got walking around the streets was that the Palestinians are weary of the struggle against the incremental destruction of their homeland, while the world looks the other way. I heard things like: “Our struggle has been long and it has got us nowhere.” And people asked how the world could stand by while the Israelis annex more land. It was a good question.

In one village the flame of non-violent resistance still burned. I went to the weekly demonstration against the annexation wall in Bil'in, where it cuts deep into the farmland of this old Palestinian village and the Green Line (the internationally recognized border of Israel–Palestine). Since Israel started building the wall here in 2005 (stealing about 60 percent of the village's land), the people of Bil'in have been inventively and non-violently resisting. While helplessness pervades in occupied Palestine, the successful tactics of the people of Bil'in provide some hope and inspiration. Abdallah Abu Rahmah, the head of the Popular Struggle Committee in Bil'in, described the villagers' various tactics, which so far successfully stalled the erection of a new settlement (called West Mattiyahu in Israeli legalese, which implies that it is merely a "neighborhood" of an existing settlement). First, to oppose the wall, Bil'in's residents tied themselves to their olive trees to stop the bulldozers razing their land. Then, in sight of the settlements, they constructed a one-room house overnight on the other side of the wall, a building that became the basis for a legal challenge. The High Court slapped down their petition twice before they and their Israeli lawyer, Michael Sfard, realized Israel had made an administrative mistake under their own unfair rules. Generally the Israelis use two excuses for land-grabs: one, the land is uncultivated; and, two, there is a security threat. With Bil'in they tried both.

To maintain the interest of the media, essential to their demonstrations' success, the Popular Committee brings out new initiatives every Friday in their non-violent struggle. When I was there, at the height of the swine flu hysteria in 2009, the Bil'in residents went down for the demonstration wearing face masks to say that they had all had occupation influenza for decades. On another Friday they had a slightly less subtle but equally creative tactic of filling balloons with chicken feces to chuck at the soldiers.

While the Bil'in residents maintain their adherence to non-violence, the same can't be said for the Israeli Defense Forces (IDF). The month before I was there, an activist from the village, Bassem Ibrahim Abu Rammah, was killed by a high-velocity tear-gas canister, and one 16-year-old child I spoke to survived a live round to the head. These are definitely not "mistakes": when you shoot a high-velocity tear-gas canister horizontally and not up in the air you only have one goal. They managed to murder Bassem with a shot to the heart. This is where the chicken feces idea came from. "They shoot bullets at us, so we will respond with our animals' feces," said Abu Rahmah. At the demonstration hundreds of tear-gas canisters were shot at us, and rubber bullets were aimed at the children throwing stones. This Israeli tactic of harsh and violent repression has one goal: to stop Palestinian resistance through instilling fear. This is what happened during the second intifada, and it is happening again now, in 2015, as pockets of resistance are starting to form against the annexation of their land. And it works. I asked my Palestinian friend if she wanted to come with us on Friday. "No," she replied, "I don't want to die for nothing." In recent months, since the Gaza War, the IDF has started to use a new cocktail of weapons against the Bil'in demonstrators, which includes stronger military-grade tear-gas with nerve toxins, high-velocity machinegun-style tear-gas and aluminum bullets that have crippled protesters. The IDF has also made it a tactic to come into the village in the middle of the night and arrest the members of the Popular Committee, and children as young as 13, as well as throwing around sound bombs and tear-gas.

According to a farmer from Bil'in, Farhan Burnat, aged 30, who spent eight months in prison after Israeli soldiers arrested him at a Friday demonstration, the Israelis take the kids to prison in Israel and keep them for four to six months as punishment for participating in the demonstration. In Ofer prison about 25 percent of the prisoners are children, he told me: "These lengthy periods of imprisonment severely stunt the educational development of our children."

I went down to the wall the day before the protest and talked to Wahid Salaman, a 44-year-old farmer from Bil'in who was walking home after work. "The ability of us to get to our land depends on the mood of the soldier," he said. "Sometimes we have to wait for five or six hours to get to our fields." Mr Salaman's land is on the wrong side of the wall so he has to go through a checkpoint every day to get to work. He pointed out a huge pole with a CCTV camera on top of it. "They watch us at all times as well," he said. The Israelis assign each farmer a number corresponding to points on the wall where he is allowed to go about his work. Afterwards we spotted a young boy going through the checkpoint with his herd of goats. "I look after the goats after school for my parents," he said. "The wall took 60 percent of our land, and as punishment for the demonstration we're not allowed to work on Fridays." He said that his goats had been injured by the barbwire around the wall. Like everyone in Bil'in, he said he misses his friend Bassem. "I feel very sad, but it will not stop me from doing the demonstration. We're strong enough to continue to do it. They shot Bassem because we are achieving something here."

The brutal behavior of the IDF at the demonstration has motivated a broad contingent of activists from around the world and Israel to descend on Bil’in every Friday – as they know the IDF will be less inclined to murder at will if they have passports belonging to the countries that give them the guns. When I was there, there was a 15-strong contingent of trade unionists, artists and charity workers from Canada, alongside a group of young Israelis. The IDF’s explicit policy is not to fire live ammunition when Israelis or internationals are in the area, which gives you an indication of their attitude to the expendability of Palestinian life. It also makes it clear how vital it is that the brigade of internationals and Israelis continue to show up and protest peacefully alongside Palestinians. At a bleak time for Palestinians, when they were watching the live destruction of any hopes of a viable future state, the heroic and successful resistance of the people of Bil’in (and their analogues along the line of the annexation wall) provided a glimmer of hope, and a template of how to fight this epic injustice with a mixture of consistency, courage and creativity. They did it against huge odds – against one of the world’s most vicious militaries, backed to the hilt by the most powerful military in the history of the world, and a global population continually lied to about the depredations of Israeli state power.

But foreigners are increasingly refusing to believe the lies they are told by their media. What I saw in Palestine was how important it is for concerned citizens to make the journey to the Occupied Territories, or any other place ruined by US imperialism, to make their presence felt. During the December–January 2008–09 Israeli attack on Gaza, the sickness that many people felt about the massacre was compounded by a feeling of helplessness. But there was a way to help out and attenuate the crimes of the occupation: what you realize in Palestine is that just having a foreign passport instantly civilizes the IDF when you are in their presence. I was, as mentioned, working with the ISM, which was set up in 2002 to bring internationals sympathetic to the Palestinian cause to witness and combat Israeli repression during the second intifada. Since then it has achieved a fair degree of infamy – like any organization that tries to protect Palestinians it has been traduced as “terrorist-supporting”, “anti-Semitic” and all the rest. There are even a couple of organizations online set up exclusively to libel and destroy the ISM: Stoptheism.com tries to expose its activists and says the ISM represents “Hamas, and other terrorists under Yasser Arafat”; and the Committee for Accuracy in Middle East Reporting in America states that “ISM encourages members to place themselves in dangerous situations to protect terrorists or their homes". But after spending about an hour with the ISM in the West Bank you realize all these calumnies are baseless propaganda. From the start of my time there, I was impressed by the integrity and professionalism of the organization. The ISM runs a two-day training weekend in London, which instills in prospective volunteers the ethos of non-violence and the Palestinian-led modus operandi (i.e. everything members do has to be ratified by a Palestinian council). When you arrive in Palestine you have another two days of training, which takes you through the history of non-violent resistance in Palestine and the specifics of how to deal with violence from the IDF. When I was there I met inspirational activists from Scotland and the Czech Republic, who had spent months living with families in East Jerusalem, being illegally evicted by an Israeli settler company. This was not glamorous stuff; it was staying up all night and sleeping on a thin mattress in a single room together, day after day, month after month. I also met activists from Sweden who were manning checkpoints to make sure that no Palestinians were physically abused. I had my own experience of this on the way out of Nil'in, another Palestinian village fighting back, for the Friday demonstration against the annexation wall. I saw an IDF soldier kicking a Palestinian man at a checkpoint at the edge of this Palestinian village. I got the taxi to stop, and got out and just watched. I don't know what effect it had, but you could see a change in the eyes of the soldiers when they saw my camera pointing their way. There was a group of activists from Italy who lived in Hebron, which is a particularly disturbing example of the occupation in the West Bank, since settlers have occupied the downtown market which is now closed because of the harassment the settlers gave the Palestinians living there. When you walk through the now-defunct market there is grating overhead, and caught in it are all sorts of projectiles, bricks and debris.

The settlers in Hebron are famous for their extremism. They celebrate the anniversary of the 1994 Hebron massacre by Baruch Goldstein, and the presence of the 500 of them in Hebron makes downtown a militarized zone. In Hebron, ISM volunteers escort Palestinian kids to school to protect them from the settlers, who have been known to shoot at them wildly from their rooftops. The courageous 22-year-old ISM activist Tom Hurndall was killed doing work like this in Gaza in April 2003. He was moving Palestinian children out of the line of fire of IDF snipers and was shot in the head, despite carrying international signs. Hurndall's death shone the media spotlight on the conduct of the IDF in the Occupied Territories, only because he was British – Palestinians are shot with appalling regularity. And that is why the ISM activists are so brave: they are putting their lives on the line, solely because they know they are worth more in the eyes of the IDF. It is also why the Israeli authorities try to keep out the ISM, by blacklisting anyone they suspect of being involved. Many ISMers have been slapped with a 10-year ban from entering Israel, even though the ISM is a completely legal organization in Israel.

I went to the non-violent Friday demonstrations in Bil'in and the nearby Nil'in on alternate weeks. Again the local villagers say that even though those among their ranks had been killed at an alarming rate in the past year (two in Bil'in, five in Nil'in, including a 10-year-old with a live shot to the head), it would be much worse if the internationals didn't turn up. In 2011, US citizen and ISM activist Tristan Anderson was critically wounded by a high-velocity tear-gas canister. While I was in Nil'in, the IDF was aiming right for us as we stood on the verge. The only things the IDF are up against at these demonstrations are stones in slingshots. On one Friday, a Palestinian man was killed with a live round. "We always ask internationals to please come, because they are even more brutal when it is just us Palestinians," said the leader of the demonstration.

There are definitely dangers to volunteering in occupied Palestine, but it is a highly effective way of helping the Palestinians resist oppression, and because of our passports those risks are a fraction of those faced by any Palestinian who raises so much as a finger of resistance. My stay was short, and I did nothing compared to the brilliant and inspirational activists – who range from teenagers to pensioners – who have spent far longer and risked far more. But it is clear that through the solidarity of internationals, Israelis and Palestinians, the occupation can be fought. There are more losses than gains, and ISM and Palestinian activists will continue to be lost, but as George Orwell concluded in his essay "Looking back on the Spanish Civil War", during which he had fought against General Franco's fascists: "I believe that it is better even from the point of view of survival to fight and be conquered than to surrender without fighting." In this sense, "fighting" doesn't always have to be violent. Being in Palestine also further helped me understand how the truth about what our governments do in our name is invariably distorted by the media. That disconnect between the truth and what we digest is vital to maintaining the domestic US population's passive acquiescence to the great crimes being done in their name. The powers that be are aware that if people knew the truth they would push them to stop the atrocities, like the massacre in Gaza in 2014; or the massacre in Iraq which began in 2003 and endures until today. In fact, one of the most silent of all the ethnic cleansing programs done with US diplomatic and military support happened in the east of Turkey and again continues today.

DIYARBAKIR, TURKEY

I had been to Turkey before but never to the neglected southeast, the redoubt of the sizeable and bitterly oppressed Kurdish minority in the country. In 2012, I arrived in Diyarbakır, the capital of what the locals call Kurdistan, at four in the morning, and the airline had lost my baggage. I went outside to get a taxi, which took me to the imposing walls that ring the Old City, where I had a sleepless night in a grim hotel. I noticed that the guest book was full of names from Iraq, someone from Mosul, another from Kirkuk, and one more from Baghdad. Diyarbakır is just 160 miles away from Iraq, another country in which the Kurdish minority has been treated with brutality. Now, though, in the aftermath of the US–UK invasion and occupation of Iraq, the Kurds were enjoying more autonomy than ever before. The Turkish government, at the same time, was growing fearful of this newfound independence. When I woke in the morning it was as if I was no longer in Turkey. Diyarbakır looked centuries older than Istanbul with its Gucci advertising-hoardings and appearance-obsessed elites. I walked south out of the city walls and there was a vast panorama of rolling verdant hills with a stunning stone bridge in the far distance that traversed the Tigris River, which flows all the way into Iraq. I had organized to meet Nurcan Baysal, a Kurdish activist, who was a friend of a friend, at the offices of her non-governmental organization (NGO) on Lise Caddesi street just outside the city walls. It was a big, well-kept office, with reports written by the collective displayed on desks. Nurcan was an old hand at talking to journalists, but that didn't stop the passion coursing through her voice. A young and inspiring Kurdish woman, she has been at the forefront of the fight for freedom and independence her people have been seeking for centuries. To take that fight forward she set up Disa, a Kurdish research organization, to combat the hold the Turkish state and its media had on the narrative about the conflict between it and the Kurdish population. "I'm angry at people who do research from the West," Nurcan told me. "There are many institutes in Istanbul and Ankara and they do research on Kurdish people, but they are run by Turkish people. Most foreigners know about the Kurdish question in the abstract, we know it by birth." Many institutions that work on the forced migrations in Turkey's southeast call the victims merely "internally displaced people", for example. "But when you use 'internally displaced people' you can translate it into Turkish in two different ways," she added. "The main translation makes it seem like what happened is very passive: like the Kurds came, and they left. Kurdish people want 'forced migration' used, they want people to understand that force was used."

In the 1980s and 1990s, with US diplomatic support and US-supplied weapons, the Turkish military cleared large parts of the Kurdish southeast in the name of fighting terrorism – in this incarnation, the Kurdistan Workers' Party or PKK. It became merely a war against the Kurdish population, who, like indigenous people in Guatemala during their US-instigated civil war, became synonymous as a whole with the Leninist group regardless of their activities. Today in Diyarbakır there is a savage poverty mainly due to the thousands of people who came here after the forced migrations from the villages. The Kurdish people of Turkey have actually been through a prolonged nightmare since the Turkish Republic was founded in 1923. Kemal Ataturk, the war hero and founder of modern Turkey, aspired to an ethnocentric country, which meant Kurds were stripped of their identity and referred to as "Mountain Turks". Banned from speaking their own language or expressing their historic culture, they have spent the ensuing 90 years resisting a racist state that is trying to extinguish the merest memory of their different lineage. Ataturk massacred those Kurds who opposed his plan, but those who took on his mantle – called today, the Kemalists – have become more extreme than their idol. A secular, fascist-tinged elite have dominated Turkish politics since the time of Ataturk and liquidated democracy throughout the 20th century when anyone threatened to usurp their power. Meanwhile the elite established a Turkey that suited their interests: they tied themselves tightly to the US empire and its racket as it established its domination over the Middle East, filtering cash through international financial institutions to a well-served rentier class. The current set of authoritarian nationalists are still using a nasty little constitution instituted by fascist general Kenan Evren in 1981 after a military coup. That document has dogged Turkey ever since and caused thousands of lives to be wasted in jail or ended in cold blood for merely speaking out.

The tactics of the Turkish government in combating the Kurdish intifada in the 1980s were straight out of the handbook of the British empire the Turks had fought and beaten in their own war of independence. In 1985, Turkish Prime Minister Turgut Özal, who was a close friend of Margaret Thatcher, co-opted a small elite in the Kurdish villages of the southeast and plied them with US-supplied weapons and orders to do battle with the PKK. These paramilitary units, called Village Guards, were entrusted by the Turkish government to police the southeast from within and a blind eye was turned as they committed all sorts of atrocities. Human Rights Watch say they have opposed the village guard system since 1987, the year they released their first report on the subject, State of Flux: Human Rights in Turkey. Even that early it documented emerging evidence of “brutality and corruption among village guards”. The brutal 1990s US-backed state clampdown on the southeast under the guise of a War on Terror, furnished with weapons by the John Major government in the UK and Bill Clinton in the US, saw the destruction of hundreds of villages in a scorched earth policy, and the displacement of thousands of Kurdish civilians. In the 2000s, the Islamist government of the Justice and Development Party (AKP) loosened restrictions on the use of the Kurdish language in the media and schools, which had previously been banned. Martial law in the area was lifted and the AKP has allowed the establishment of the first Kurdish-language television station; at the same time the imprisoning of Kurdish politicians and the shutting down of their parties abated somewhat. But in this period of glasnost and reconciliation under the AKP, the village guard system was left in place, even as its raison d’être disintegrated. There was a real hope that change was coming, as the Islamist party, which had been a victim of harsh repression itself, seemed to offer a different way of doing things. As the Kurdish proverb goes: “The victim understands the victim.” But it wasn’t to be. The “democratic opening” came to an abrupt halt in 2010 when seven PKK fighters arrived in Diyarbakır to cheers from the locals, many of whom were seeing long-lost relatives for the first time. Nurcan said she was in the office on that day. “I was with a young Kurdish student. I went to see what people were doing, and of course there were many congratulations to the fighters, it was like a festival. I was working and I thought, ‘Nurcan, don’t believe them, don’t be happy, something bad will happen,’ and I am 37, I saw the 1990s.” Her instincts were right. “I saw an old Kurdish woman crying,” she continued. “I asked her why she was crying, and the old woman said because today is ‘bayram’, which means celebration. I shook her and said, don’t believe them, there is no celebration, you don’t know the bad things they will do after today.”

Meanwhile, in the mainstream Turkish media the story was that the ungrateful Kurds were celebrating the return of the terrorist PKK. But what they didn’t say was that many of these people were celebrating the return of loved ones. “These are our children,” Nurcan said. “It’s a very important thing. I saw on the street many old women who saw those fighters return, and thought maybe my son will be next. For that reason they were out celebrating.” The seven fighters were eventually put in prison, alongside the thousands of Kurdish political prisoners held on spurious charges. The window for change closed, and repression as usual returned. “It’s hard to attract western media attention because Turkey is a US ally,” said Nurcan. “It’s also hard to get the attention of the Turkish public. Sometimes I feel like it is another world, we are not in the same country. What we saying here in Diyarbakır is different to what they are saying in Ankara or Istanbul. It is very hard to get their attention.” The Turkish media has never been a free media: ordinary Turkish people don’t know what is happening; if they want to know they have to check. Most Turks, like most Americans, don’t check.

Nurcan is an assimilated Kurd, and there are millions like her: they don’t know Kurdish, their dreams are in Turkish, Turkish is their main language. Millions of Kurdish people now live in the west of Turkey, in Izmir and in Istanbul, which has the biggest Kurdish population in the world (5 million Kurds). But they know what happened. And they do not intend to forget and let the oppressors win. “In my mind and in my heart I don’t know if I can forgive them for what they did,” she told me. Many Turks cannot see why someone like Nurcan, who has benefitted from modern Turkey, would complain. “They are telling me why are you sad because you don’t know your mother tongue? It’s very good that you grew up you knew Turkish, you had chance to go to those universities, just enjoy being a Turk. They don’t think that because I don’t know my mother tongue, because of the restrictions at that time, I never had a close relationship even with my mother, and I never had the chance to talk with my grandmother, or my aunt. It’s like you are coming from nowhere, there is no past. They think they are doing a very good thing for us, it is crazy. After this meeting I will go to buy books and presents for my friends in prison. And when I tell my friends in Istanbul that all my friends are in prison in Diyarbakır they say ‘Really?’ And the thing is I still had some patience to deal with Turkish people, trying to tell them what is happening. But after a while I said, ‘Why?’ ”

The most emblematic of the many sins against the Kurdish people carried out through the long “counter-insurgency” campaign of the 1980s and 1990s, and before, was the outlawing of the Kurdish language. In the Turkish state’s quest to dissolve any sense of a Kurdish identity separate from Turkey, the destruction of the fundamental cultural artifact of language was central. Nurcan told me she saw someone shot in the street because he was heard speaking Kurdish, and in her school if a child was heard using a Kurdish word, even just one, they would be taken out and savagely beaten.

Kurds who refused to be assimilated as merely “Mountain Turks” were tortured, murdered and “disappeared”, while whole villages were scorched in the battle against the “enemy”, which was publicly the PKK, but actually became the Kurdish community at large, especially those who refused to abide by the cultural genocide being imposed on them. In Diyarbakır mainly people speak Turkish, but when you go to the peripheries of the city, they haven’t forgotten Kurdish; the language is still used despite the attempts to literally beat it out of their heads.

Kurdish children in the 1980s didn’t even know they were Kurds. The constant government and military criminalization of the idea of the Kurd meant that many were ashamed to be Kurdish. “My mother and father came from the village, they were not educated, and most of the families at that time, like this, their main aim was to protect us,” said Nurcan. “I was thinking that the teacher is not using Kurdish, and they are saying that Kurdish is bad, so then someone who uses Kurdish is bad. My mind was working like this. And I was thinking that because my mother was sometimes using Kurdish, and I was wondering if she was bad. We were ashamed to be a Kurd at that time, because the school and all of society were telling us this. One side we were ashamed of it, the other side we were afraid of it. Because, for example, I broke all my teeth, and I needed to go to hospital every week to get them fixed, and I was afraid that if my mother said something Kurdish what will they do to us? Maybe they wouldn’t do anything, but I was very afraid. I remember lots of people being killed in that period. Just for example in this street they killed someone I remember. They killed one of my friend’s fathers because he was selling a newspaper. It wasn’t even in Kurdish – it was just writing about the rights of the Kurdish people.”

THE GOLDEN CHILD

The US has been a staunch Cold War ally of Turkey for over half a century. It is still selling guns to Turkey, and the Kurds were sold out many times by the US, famously in 1975 when Henry Kissinger allowed them to be massacred, and in 1991 when George Bush senior, after telling them to rise up against Saddam

Hussein, allowed the dictator to massacre them again. The situation changed slightly after the attack on Iraq in 2003 when Kurds in the Kurdistan Regional Government (KRG) believed they could become strong allies of the US because of the changing dynamics in the Middle East. The reasoning is that the US needs sound allies in the region, like the KRG and Israel. The people in the KRG believe, perhaps naively, the US cannot turn their back on them now. “If I was an American citizen I would ask myself why my taxes were buying these guns and killing people,” said Nurcan. “I don’t understand why they don’t ask this. If we have war here today, I’m not saying it’s because of America, of course, it is not, but it continues because of guns, and if there were no guns it couldn’t continue … and the guns come from America.”

One brave young American, Jake Hess, saw what was being done in his name and decided to do something about it. He went to live in Diyarbakır and surrounding areas of the southeast to investigate human rights atrocities being carried out with weapons his own taxes were paying for. What happened next was a terrifying but salutary tale. He was detained and deported in 2010 on “terror” charges, which specifically meant “knowingly or willingly supporting a terror organization without being part of its hierarchical structure”.

“I was in custody for about 10 nights,” he told me. “During my interrogation, they asked me about my reporting on human rights abuses, contacts with NGOs in Britain and Turkey, and views on political issues.” Unlike other less fortunate Kurdish activists, Hess was not tortured. The government has a public posture that is “zero tolerance” for torture, but if you are one of the thousands of Kurdish political prisoners in Turkey – held often for years without a conviction – such high-minded rhetoric often does not translate into on-the-ground policy. The US embassy offered consular assistance to Hess to secure his release on the trumped-up charges, but he refused, citing the treatment that they allowed to go on unhindered against Kurdish political dissidents and activists. “In the 1990s, these people would have been disappeared or assassinated; now, they’re held in prison indefinitely,” he told me. “The US government has murdered journalists both directly and by proxy for years. They bombed Al Jazeera in Iraq and Afghanistan. They bombed the Radio Television of Serbia in 1999, killing 16 civilians. The US was Turkey’s chief military supporter as scores of journalists were being murdered there in the 1990s, and continues to provide key military and political backing for Ankara’s current assault on the Kurdish movement. Of course I couldn’t accept the embassy’s help in that kind of situation.”

Most Americans hearing about this brutality would be shocked to learn that their tax dollars have been instrumental in propping up this racist and genocidal policy against the Kurds in Turkey. In fact, the US and Turkey have had one of the most close-knit security tie-ups in the world since the beginning of the Cold War, as Turkey was viewed as a front-line state in the NATO alliance against the Soviet Union. In another part of unspoken history, it was the US placing of Jupiter missiles, armed with nuclear warheads, in Turkey in 1961 on the borders of the Soviet Union, that led the Russians to move nuclear warheads to Cuba, which, in turn, precipitated the Cuban Missile Crisis a year later. Operation Gladio, set up by NATO, created underground "stay-behind" armies to retain a position in the NATO states early in the Cold War. Many analysts now conclude that these forces went on to become the infamous "deep state" in Turkey, which, Hess said, "is basically an unelected shadow government that has been involved in political killings, coups, and generally fomenting chaos in the country". In Turkey, governments come and go – it's the state bureaucracy and the army that run the country.

Such a state of affairs has been mirrored across the other crucible states within NATO that might become susceptible to communism, clearing the way for brutal campaigns against some of the same forces that had helped defeat Nazism, from Greece to Spain. JİTEM, the death squad that was established to murder Kurdish dissidents and intellectuals in the 1980s and 1990s, also grew out of these NATO structures. The military relationship continued even after the Cold War ended. During the dirty war against the Kurds in the 1990s, the US supplied Ankara with 80 percent of its weaponry, worth some $10.5 billion. Many human rights groups documented how US-supplied hardware was used to commit abuses, including extra-judicial killings and destruction of villages. Washington provided Ankara with more military aid during its war of terror in the southeast than it did during the entire Cold War.

Turkey is a relatively stable country in one of the most strategically important parts of the world, and the US has used it as a base for imperial operations. In 2003, Turkey refused to let the US open a northern front in Iraq from Turkish soil. However, Ankara later allowed the US to use its territory as a transport hub for operations in Afghanistan and Iraq. In a Congressional testimony in March 2007, Robert Wexler, a supporter of Turkey who was then Chairman of the House Foreign Relations Committee's subcommittee on Europe, pointed out that "The US depends greatly on Turkey to pursue shared objectives in support of the Iraqi and Afghan people", by which he meant the brutal military occupations of those countries. He went on, "Turkey's grant of blanket over-flight clearances to US military aircraft is of critical importance to our military operations in both Iraq and Afghanistan", and noted that "Turkey … provides extensive logistic supports to our troops in Iraq. This critical life line includes the cargo hub at Incirlik Air Base through which … we ship 74 percent of our air cargo into Iraq." Indeed, Wexler explained: "The substantial majority of the military assets used by American troops are flown into Turkey, and then transported to Iraq."

In an op-ed published in the Wall Street Journal in 1997, senior Republican foreign policy official Zalmay Khalilzad summarized the importance of Turkey for the geopolitics of energy. He argued that the US and Turkey "should work together to ensure the security of the Persian Gulf and the Caspian Basin regions. The US already has security commitments in the gulf, an area that is vital to the world's oil supplies. The relative importance of the Caspian region is growing, though, due to its tremendous oil and gas reserves … Turkish military facilities provide an excellent location for projecting power to both the [Persian] gulf and the Caspian Basin. Much of the world's energy resources are within 1,000 miles of Incirlik. Access to the Turkish bases can reduce the amount of military presence required in some of the Gulf Cooperation Council states. Turkey is also a viable pipeline route for bringing some of the oil and gas from the Caspian to world markets."[3]

The US has fully backed Turkey's war against the PKK, despite the fact that there's near unanimous agreement that there is no "military solution" to the conflict there. The Bush and Obama administrations declared the PKK "a common enemy", and the US supplies the Turkish military with intelligence on PKK movements in northern Iraq. WikiLeaks cables show that the US is enthusiastic about supplying Turkey with drones, despite its horrific human rights record, which never seems to come up in meetings between Turkish diplomats and US. The PKK is a left-leaning popular movement that has defied NATO's second-largest army and its US patron for decades, so it has to be crushed. They've committed human rights violations over the years, but nowhere even approaching the level of Turkey, so US opposition can have no humanitarian basis.

Many thousands of activists and politicians, including elected mayors, human rights defenders, journalists, women's rights advocates and students, have been arrested on "terrorism" charges. There have been very few convictions or acquittals up until now; thousands of people have been held without conviction for years. “I’ve looked at several of the indictments dealing with these cases, and it’s just beyond dispute that these people are being tried for political reasons,” Hess said.

In recent years, Turkey has become more involved in the Middle East. Its outreach to Syria and Iran, along with Hamas, has at points brought it into conflict with the US-Israeli-Saudi Arabian reactionary front in the region, leading to considerable outrage in Washington policy circles. Despite the extensive debate about how the West has “lost” Turkey in recent years, the US may actually be happy that Turkey is playing a more assertive role in the Middle East as a sort of alternative or rival to Iran and Hezbollah, both of whom have seemingly lost influence since the Arab Spring. Basically, the US might be able to retain some of its waning influence in the region through an active and engaged Turkey. Turkey has suffered several of its own foreign policy setbacks in recent years, and it seems very unlikely that Ankara will entirely break from the US.

“I don’t think Americans are all that aware of the situation,” said Hess. Some American NGOs did great work documenting US-funded Turkish atrocities in the 1990s, but these received little attention, unlike, say, the atrocities in Bosnia or Kosovo. In recent years, corporate media outlets and more establishment-oriented think-tanks have started to criticize Turkey, mainly because Ankara has challenged Washington on a few important issues, especially the Israel–Palestine conflict. Hess added: “The coverage is nowhere near where it should be, and there are still no foreign correspondents based in southeastern Turkey. The media coverage leaves a lot to be desired. It’s shocking how frequently people who are supposed to be experts on Turkey get basic details about the conflict wrong. For example, the PKK is almost universally described in the media as ‘separatist’ even though they backed away from their demand for an independent state in the early 1990s. Writers often disproportionately quote western or Turkish ‘experts’ when covering the Kurds, and for some reason feel compelled to constantly point out that the EU and US consider the PKK a ‘terrorist organization’. Okay, but what do Kurds think about the PKK? Doesn’t their perspective count? There seems to be this conceit that the only people who can comment on the Kurds are either American or Turkish ‘experts’ who speak English and have fancy titles. Beyond the Kurds, US media coverage of Turkey relies on very simplistic binaries that easily fit with western prejudices, like ‘East vs West’ or ‘secular vs Islamic.’ The press doesn’t really reflect the reality of Turkey.”

In 2004, while in Turkey, George W. Bush gushed about the AKP: “I appreciate so very much the example your country has set on how to be a Muslim country and at the same time a country which embraces democracy and the rule of law and freedom.”[4] What Bush didn’t mention, but was surely of interest to his administration and his friends at the International Monetary Fund (IMF), was that while President Recip Tayyip Erdogan may be a moderate on religion, the AKP was economically fundamentalist, hell-bent on turning Turkey into an IMF experiment. Though the AKP campaigned on promises to the poor and working classes, only a month after it was elected in November 2002, the party announced its plans to embark on mass privatization of state-owned industries, from the national airline to the nationalized oil company. The deputy prime minister at the time, Abdüllatif Şener, admitted that his inspiration was Margaret Thatcher; his close associate Turgut Bozkurt, who was head of the Privatization Administration, spelled out their ambitions as straight from the Thatcherite handbook: “The basic goal is to transform the economy from a state-led economy to a market-driven liberal economy,” he said. “Transferring state-owned companies to the able hands of private entrepreneurs will help rationalize structure and run according to rational or scientific principles in order to achieve desired results.”[5]

As is the case for most close US allies, the economy of Turkey has gradually grown more and more like that of its patron. Agriculture died in southeast Turkey after the forced migrations of the 1990s and neoliberal economic policies in the 1980s. It is a common theme all across the “underdeveloped world”. In southeast Turkey 20 years ago they were selling livestock around the world – like Haitian farmers once sold rice and Mexican farmers once sold maize. That was before the racket rode into town. Now in this region of Turkey they only buy meat. In one region near Diyarbakır there are lots of villages and in the not too distant past all the food from Diyarbakır was coming from that region. Now the children who don’t still live there are picking through the rubbish of the western city of Izmir. Because of this lack of production, the major cities, particularly Istanbul, have been flooded with Kurdish people migrating from the rural areas. They now form an underclass, often living 10 people in one room, in adverse conditions. When you go to Istanbul, the children who clean there are Kurdish; when you go to Izmir, the children who pick through the rubbish are Kurdish. Most of the gecekondus[6] in Istanbul are also filled with Kurds. It’s close to an apartheid situation – certainly economic apartheid. Every year more than 200 workers die because of no security at work. Most of them are Kurdish, their lives expendable. “I always think that if we had a color, if we were black or red, I am sure that then the Turkish people would see it,” said Nurcan. “Now they don’t see it, but the poverty in Turkey has a color, a race. It’s like apartheid, and those in the worst conditions, they are Kurdish.” But one thing the Turkish state didn’t count on was that living at such close quarters and in such dire circumstances has created a highly political will among the Kurds. If they do decide to rise up again at some point they will have a lot of power, but the war against them will be fierce once again. The racket does not shy away from using force to realize its economic or geopolitical ambitions.

MIGHT IS RIGHT

WAR

In the aftermath of World War II, the US emerged as one of the three biggest economic powers in the world, the others being Western Europe and the Soviet Union. This stayed pretty much constant, with the East Asian “Tiger economies” replacing the Soviet Union in the tripartite economic arrangement. The area where America overwhelming dominates is in military power. The Cold War was already in its embryonic stages in 1945. From then until the collapse of the Soviet Union, the US and its western allies maintained they were “containing” the Soviet Union. It is more accurate to say that the Soviet Union was “containing” the United States. According to Edward S. Herman “the Soviet Union was actually a defensive and quite weak regional power”. America, on the other hand, had been establishing security states throughout Latin America and Africa and had control of Western Europe through the North Atlantic Treaty Organization (NATO). The Soviet Union did not pose a problem militarily in the way public rhetoric claimed. The problem was the “virus” of “independent nationalism” that was likely to infect the rest of the world with notions of equality and independence. The wish of American business elites to keep high-scale military spending up, and of the political elites to maintain a grip on their populations meant that the threat of Soviet invasion became a common trope. Military spending shot up in the 1950s and 1960s. Yet, at this time, according to Ken Livingstone, the former MP and the first Mayor of London, who was involved in international politics throughout the period, “the Cold War was largely a fiction because the US had 20 times more nukes than the Soviets”. The historian Niall Ferguson disagrees, writing that the Cold War was a period “when the containment of Soviet expansion, rather than democratic nation building, was the objective of policy”. The excuse for military spending was destroyed along with the

"Evil Empire" in the early 1990s; yet the continuation of bloated military spending demonstrates that America's aim was only loosely related to the Soviet Union. Throughout the 1990s and up until the present, American military power has had no rival. Since the end of the Cold War, almost all the world's military budgets have declined, except America's. In 2001, the US military budget comprised 36 percent of the entire world's – six times the size of the number-two power, Russia, and seven times the size of the next three together, France, the UK and Japan. The US budget for 2012 took it to over 40 percent of the world's total. It exceeds the spending of the next 10 states combined. All of this with no Soviet – or equivalent – menace. When the Soviet Union fell, the US turned to other covers, such as the "Drug War", to keep military budgets high, as we will see.

The late historian Howard Zinn told me when I met him in Boston: "Very often the economics of empire requires a militarization of the economy, which then starves the domestic economy and eventually causes collapse." In terms of military superiority, more important than nuclear or conventional firepower have been the military bases the United States spawned across the world during the Cold War. The Pentagon says there are currently military facilities in 132 countries. Only about half of these are fully operational but the existing bases mean that nowhere is beyond the range of an American strike. The executive has been consciously accruing these outposts since World War II and it has meant deals with unsavory regimes and, in the case of Diego Garcia in 1966, the repatriation of indigenous people. Noam Chomsky told me that so-called proxy wars became common because the government "intended at first to use US forces … but there was so much popular reaction that they turned to what is called 'clandestine war' ". This meant that a large-scale propaganda offensive was not needed and none of the high-minded idealism was given lip-service. Chomsky continued: "Clandestine means the war that everybody knows about except the American population – it's kept from them and it was fought with an international terrorist network, in which Britain contributed incidentally. So it was Taiwan, Israel, Argentine neo-Nazis until they were thrown out, Saudi Arabian funding, British assistance. So that's a kind of an international terror network that was used to support the murderous state terrorist governments of Central America and in the case of the one government where they didn't control the security forces, Nicaragua, they were used just to attack. There was a terrorist war against Nicaragua for which the US was actually condemned by the World Court and the Security Council – the US vetoed the resolution, Britain loyally abstained."

One of the main institutions of enforcement through violence is NATO, which was signed into force in April 1949. It is a military pact among western countries that is supposed to commit all countries to the defense of their allies should they be attacked. In practice it became a vehicle for the United States to protect its interests in Western Europe. According to historian Michael Mann: "The other states of the North had been under protection since 1945, unable to defend themselves against communism without American help." Consequently, "America dominated security organizations like NATO." At the time it was the first US military alliance with Europe in 171 years. Planners such as the influential Dean Acheson paid lip-service to the idea that NATO was designed to "develop their individual and collective capacity to resist armed attack."[1] It was said to be a wholly defensive organization. Walter LaFeber, the historian, on the other hand, contended that NATO was created by the US with the knowledge that "It could now dominate an alliance by using its partners to carry out US foreign-policy aims." The aims LaFeber mentions were twofold. The first was to restrict the percolation of Soviet communism into Western Europe, and the second to restore the independence and power of West Germany. NATO was largely successful in these aims and, aside from some pushback during Charles de Gaulle's presidency (1958–69) in France, the US managed to retain its singular role within the organization. In a memorandum to President Eisenhower and Prime Minister Harold Macmillan, de Gaulle complained of the "tripartite world strategy" that did not include France. Eisenhower, in turn, wrote that the "United States had no ambition to carry the heavy responsibility that had been forced upon it in NATO".

Even though the alliance stayed strong and grew to include a number of other countries over the decades, its first military operation did not occur until after the fall of the Soviet Union. It took place in Kosovo in 1999 and marked the apparent metamorphosis of this "defensive alliance" into a force for "humanitarian intervention". NATO's militarism now apparently marked a beautiful new moment in the racket's altruistic program. President Bill Clinton remarked on June 10, 1999 at the end of the bombing of Serbia and Kosovo: "The demands of an outraged and united international community have been met … Because of our resolve, the 20th century is ending not with helpless indignation but with a hopeful affirmation of human dignity and human rights for the 21st century."[2] The US and its allies had actually designed the peace talks – called the Rambouillet Agreement – to fail. By imposing the condition that NATO forces would be free to operate throughout not just Kosovo but all of Serbia, those pushing for war knew that Yugoslav President Slobodan Milosevic could never accept it. It was a typically smart move on the part of the racketeers and one for the trophy cabinet of their enforcement mechanism.

Once again, scrutiny of the facts reveals a story that had much more to do with self-interest than any preoccupation with human rights and dignity. Before the war in 1999 US Defense Secretary William Cohen claimed: “We’ve now seen about 100,000 military-aged [Albanian] men missing … they may have been murdered.” When the bombing was over and investigations had failed to find any mass graves, the International War Crimes Tribunal said the total number killed on both sides was 2,788. The pre-war figures had turned out to be grossly inflated, with the leader of the Spanish forensic team lamenting the “semantic pirouette by the war propaganda machines”.[3] The purpose of the military offensive was to re-establish this diminishing military organization that many had perceived as obsolete at the end of the Cold War and the collapse of the Warsaw Pact (which had been its antonym). A White House official stated President Clinton’s position: “From the first day, he said we have to win this. It was absolutely clear. Because of the consequences for the US, for NATO, for his responsibilities as Commander in Chief, we had to win this.”[4] Columnist William Pfaff went further, stating, before the conflict: “The debate about intervention is no longer a dispute over the means to an end. It is a debate over abandoning NATO and the claim to international leadership”.[5] The Yugoslav government thus had to be destroyed to maintain US military supremacy in the institutionalized form of NATO.

Following the disintegration of the Soviet Union, the point of NATO was unclear, but then NATO bombed Serbia and Kosovo in 1999 to ensure the break-up of Yugoslavia; 9/11 provided the West with a new enemy; and NATO employed new and different machinations to keep Russia out while expanding into Eastern Europe via Georgia and Ukraine. The role of Turkey, as explored, was also crucial: since 1951 it has supported this alliance without qualification. During Israel’s 2006 war in Lebanon, Turkish soldiers were sent to be “peacekeepers”, and there were 1,300 Turkish soldiers in Afghanistan at one point. NATO has been used in Turkey to combat Kurdish activists, trade unionists, socialists and other enemies of the state. NATO troops are supposed to be prepared for foreign invasions, but actually they are often used against democrats.

THE MOB RULES BY FEAR

It is true that there have been relatively few direct military interventions by the United States. Control, as already discussed, has largely been maintained by supporting right-wing elements within a country from a distance. Military force has been a last resort. The major exceptions to this modus operandi are the Korean War of 1953, the Vietnam War, the war in Afghanistan and those in Iraq. The "defensive" rationalization was used to legitimate direct military adventures during the Cold War. In fact, it was a desire to circumvent expansionary communist powers that would spread, to use Henry Kissinger's telling phrase, "the virus" of "independent nationalism". In the case of Afghanistan and Iraq, they fell under the rubric of the "war on terror" which, on the whole, maintained the same conceptual and institutional framework, with "terrorism" replacing "communism" as the Other that must be destroyed at all cost. Far from supporting "democracy-promotion", the US military has, in recent history, become a self-fulfilling prophecy. In his autobiography, Colin Powell, Secretary of State under George W. Bush, noted how Clinton's National Security Advisor Madeleine Albright asked him rhetorically: "What's the point of having this superb military you're always talking about if we can't use it?"[6]

The philosopher Zygmunt Bauman links current militarism to the economic downturn in the US. He told me: "There is no competition in arms, there is no question about that. But if that is the case then America wants to make the world in its image; namely, that what decides in this world is application of force: who has more bombs, who has more smart missiles and things like that, the more mobile army and so on. And that's a danger. Economically the power has shifted already." The war in Iraq, which began in March 2003, is a perfect illustration of the United States' desire to use direct foreign invasion as a means to further its own economic interests. The war eventually deposed the dictator Saddam Hussein, but it was no coincidence that Iraq had the third largest reserves of oil in the world. Ostensibly the US is fighting a "war on terror" – the same war designed in the 1980s under Ronald Reagan – and "the liberation of Iraq is a crucial advance in the campaign against terror". In fact, Saddam Hussein had no hand in the September 11, 2001 atrocities in New York, Pennsylvania and Washington, but those atrocities were used to pull a veil over a preconceived desire for regime change in Iraq. Many elements of George W. Bush's administration were previously members of a lobby group called Project for the New American Century. The most informative document produced by this think-tank is titled Rebuilding America's Defenses: Strategies, Forces and Resources for a New Century (2000). It stated: "The United States has for decades sought to play a more permanent role in Gulf regional security. While the unresolved conflict with Iraq provides the immediate justification, the need for a substantial American force presence in the Gulf transcends the issue of the regime of Saddam Hussein." Much like the communist pretext was used to pursue violent conflict to establish favorable economic circumstances, "terrorism" falls into the same paradigm. The history of the Cold War shows that the US is also driven by questions of prestige, and is especially concerned to demonstrate to its supposed allies that it can do certain things. The Vietnam War occurred substantially because of the defeats in Korea and Laos: various presidents felt that the US had to demonstrate its power. Once the US was in Vietnam it was extremely difficult to get out without significant loss of prestige, so the conflict was prolonged. All leading American racketeers still share this view.

While speaking of Vietnam it would be remiss not to mention one of the most exalted mobsters in the whole system, Dr Henry Kissinger. When the then president of Iran Mahmoud Ahmadinejad was invited to campus at Columbia University where I was studying at the Journalism School, there were weeks of debate about whether we should allow him to address us at our home. On the day he arrived hundreds of protesters spoke out against his pernicious statements on the Holocaust and his crackdown on dissidents, homosexuals and secularism back in Iran. The university president joined the chorus and opened his introduction with a rhetorical salvo against Ahmadinejad. All good. Except, soon after, Columbia Journalism School welcomed a speaker who was much worse than a Holocaust denier – he had been partly responsible for one; in fact, more than one. That man is Kissinger, the National Security Advisor and Secretary of State under presidents Nixon and Ford. There was none of the publicity, none of the protests, none of the ire – he was given a warm and effusive welcome and answered questions about his experience at the hub of the United States. Conceivably, the lack of publicity was an effort to stop the protest movement that follows Kissinger around the world. But at the end of his peroration, dewy-eyed students took photos alongside him and one even hugged him passionately. It is hard to know what is more worrying – that a reputable journalism school invites someone like Kissinger to speak every year, despite his past, or that the majority of students are oblivious to what the man has done. In his 2001 book, The Trial of Henry Kissinger, the prominent late journalist Christopher Hitchens catalogued with tragic specificity the carnage that Kissinger consistently unleashed around the world during his time at the center of power. “Many if not most of Kissinger’s partners in crime are now in jail, or are awaiting trial, or have been otherwise punished or discredited,” he wrote. “His own lonely impunity is rank; it smells to heaven.” The first holocaust concerned the country of East Timor in East Asia. It was invaded by neighboring Indonesia on December 7, 1975. That same day, President Gerald Ford and Secretary of State Kissinger concluded an official visit to Jakarta and flew to Hawaii. Ford and Kissinger are revealed by declassified files to have given the “green light” to the Indonesian dictator to start the invasion. East Timor was home to an independence movement called Fretilin, or the Revolutionary Front for an Independent East Timor, whose leftist ideology put them on the wrong side of the Cold War divide and at the mercy of the Indonesian military. What ensued was nearly 25 years of mass slaughter, rape and torture and the near-destruction of a nation. It is estimated that more than 200,000 East Timorese were killed during the Indonesian occupation, a third of the population of the country. Proportionally, it remains one of the worst genocides of the 20th century, all backed by Kissinger and his boss.

It is not only the disregard for human life that is troubling, but the legal aspect. What Kissinger and Ford had supported was illegal: Indonesia had violated international law by invading a sovereign nation, they had also violated American law, which said that weapons supplied to Indonesia were only to be employed in self-defense. But this was the pattern with Kissinger. His disregard for human life was matched only by his disregard for legal niceties. His blood-soaked résumé includes other continents too. In 1973, the democratically elected government of Chilean President Salvador Allende was violently liquidated by the fascist leader of the military, General Augusto Pinochet. For the three previous years, Kissinger had been integral in trying to undermine the legal and internationally recognized Allende government. The campaign included a program to remove the coup-averse General René Schneider and replace him with a sharper toothed coup-hungry operator. A $50,000 sum was offered to anyone who could do it. Although the CIA backed out of its support for former army General Roberto Viaux shortly before the kidnapping and accidental murder of Schneider, enthusiasm for a coup was still strong among American leaders. Following the successful coup, 17 years of dictatorship were foisted on the Chilean people, while the economy was opened to western speculators. Over 3,000 people were killed, and countless others "disappeared" or were tortured. Similar scenarios were played out across the world during Kissinger's terms in office. The Kurds were massacred in droves between 1974 and 1975; rape, burning, torture – every conceivable horror visited on them after they had rebelled against Saddam Hussein with Kissinger's support. They were sold out and left to die.

The second holocaust Kissinger was partly responsible for was that in Cambodia under the genocidal maniac Pol Pot. During the Vietnam War, which Kissinger is thought to have prolonged in an effort to get Richard Nixon elected in 1968 (in Kissinger's life these titanic crimes only make the sidebar), Kissinger had ordered the secret bombing of Cambodia and Laos, two desperately poor countries that the US was not officially at war with. Between March 18, 1969 and May 1970, 3,630 bombing raids were flown into Cambodia. A Finnish government study estimates that 500,000 people died in this first phase, with 2 million refugees produced. Some analysts also argue that this bombing campaign, which depopulated large rural regions, led to the Pol Pot regime, which murdered 25 percent of the Cambodian population.

So there you have it: a veritable war criminal and facilitator of mass slaughter. And all of this information was in the public domain, available to any student with an enquiring mind. Fed up with the love-in at Columbia Journalism School, I asked Kissinger in front of his enraptured audience how he slept at night. "Do you think you are morally superior to me?" he asked after a pause. "Yes. I do," I answered confidently, stunned that he might mistake me for a mass murderer. All the while there were groans in the room from fellow students and professors, a startled disbelief that a journalist might actually confront a powerful mobster rather than attempt to fondle his ego with the usual fatuous questions. Despite this, it is still assumed that Columbia University has the best journalism school in the country. But thinking about this pandering to and reverence of one of the racket's most illustrious, I realized that to flourish in the corporate media, the destination of nearly all of these students, you have to block out the truth of how the world works. Looking at the racket with open eyes can spell career suicide, so, as Harold Pinter put it, "it never happened". Kissinger is a cuddly old statesman, not a mass-murdering racketeer. In fact, a couple of days after I confronted Kissinger, one of the school's top professors came up to me and said: "I heard you disgraced yourself the other day". If I'm honest I wasn't even surprised – this academic would never be teaching at Columbia Journalism School if he thought the purpose of journalism was to expose his own country's mass-murderers rather than suck up to them. Power selects for obedience, and by now it was obvious to me that the most obedient are inevitably rewarded with fancy positions in universities or with newspaper columns. The closest I came again to holding another mobster to account was when I was covering the 2008 Republican National Convention in St Paul and I chased Karl Rove, President George W. Bush's "brain" (he needed one), down the street asking him if he believed he was a war criminal. He pled the fifth before getting into a car.

THE DRUG WAR

Another method of enforcement devised by the US is the so-called "Drug War" or "War on Drugs", which is made up of two elements – the racialized war on the domestic poor, and the war on the rest of the world. It was formally started in the early 1970s by President Richard Nixon, focusing on eradication and interdiction all over the western hemisphere. The Drug War at home began as a way to deal with what some sociologists called the "superfluous population" – those people for whom there were just no jobs, the "permanent unemployed" that every capitalist economy has. It came in tandem with the growth of what is now called the "prison–industrial complex" whereby the privatization of corrections facilities offered all sorts of perverse incentives that made it in the interests of corporations (and the politicians whom they funded) to push for harsher sentences and more incarcerated people. Since the 1970s, the US has spent upwards of $1 trillion and seen thousands of people killed in this two-front fight.

In 2010 the US federal government spent over $15 billion on the Drug War at a rate of about $500 per second. But nearly everyone in policy circles admits it has been a failure. "I think that a lot of the arguments are quite convincing that current drug policy isn't working," Michael Shiftner, president of Inter-American Dialogue, a Washington think-tank, told me. "The evidence is strong, it has produced broad consensus of opinion." Even the Obama administration's own drug tsar, Gil Kerlikowske, was skeptical in 2011. "In the grand scheme, it has not been successful," he said. "Forty years later, the concern about drugs and drug problems is, if anything, magnified, intensified." The Obama administration did use a different tone on drug eradication policy, refusing to call it a war on drugs, and behind the scenes there is very little enthusiasm for the current approach.

But the bureaucratic apparatus that has been built up over the past 40 years has made change difficult. The Obama administration requested $26.2 billion in its 2012 drug control budget for federal efforts to rein in the problem, an increase of 1.2 percent from the 2010 budget. Nearly 60 percent of that, or $15.5 billion, was directed to “supply reduction”; in other words, law enforcement and interdiction internationally and domestically.

It is worth considering why this massive outlay in capital and human life continues. It is no coincidence that it began at the height of the Cold War – it was just another tool of control to shore up the “backyard”, or Latin America, the focus of most of the efforts. That control still needs to be exercised in a continent that is showing signs of moving away from US influence. The Drug War gave the US an excuse to keep a massive military presence in the region after the Soviet “threat” had disappeared. For example, a number of countries with drug problems – such as Colombia and Panama – have good relationships with the US, but even they seem to realize the war is not doing any good. Despite that, they let it go on because it allows them to fight their adversaries – in many cases, left-wing rebels – under the cover of the Drug War and thus escape censure from the US or anyone else.

But the conversation is building. Colombian President Juan Manuel Santos said in 2011 that he was not against legalization. “If the world considers that [legalization] is a solution, I would gladly go along with that. I can understand the benefits, and I can understand the arguments,” he said.[7] A commission on drug policy was set up by former Colombian president César Gaviria, calling for decriminalization of drugs in the region. Many Latin American governments are hoping the US will realize the shortcomings and begin a debate about other options that would be more viable. Before that happens they are hedging their bets.

Mexico is one of the most important countries for the US to control, as they share a long border (half of Mexico was bought by the US in 1803 for next to nothing). The border region has become a hell as a result of the Drug War. It has witnessed 36,000 deaths since former President Felipe Calderón launched a crackdown on drug trafficking, soon after he came to power in 2006, with the encouragement of the US which promised $1.6 billion in aid to the effort through the Mérida Initiative. Human rights groups have reported huge numbers of atrocities by the Mexican military against indigenous communities and civil society, under the guise of the Drug War. The murder of Jaime Zapata, a US immigration agent, by a drugs cartel in Mexico in 2011 and continuing violence in the border region again attested to the costs of this futile war. If you looked at it objectively you would have to say it is not working. The traffickers are cultivating and selling drugs to a huge market in the US that is growing all the time. The US seems to be incapable of doing anything internally about the demand for drugs, and where there is demand there will be supply. If a Colombian or Bolivian peasant farmer is deciding between growing a hectare of banana trees or a hectare of coca, there's no comparison in terms of the return.

The US has had problems in recent years, as left-wing governments have sprung up in Latin America opposed to the program, making enforcement increasingly difficult. It has become harder to launch coups to get rid of them, too. This nascent movement in Latin America has made the enforcement side of the eradication policy by the Drug Enforcement Administration (DEA) harder. Bolivia's leftist President Evo Morales kicked out the DEA, arguing that it was being used to pursue the geostrategic interests of the US, which was undoubtedly true. At the moment only Ecuador has followed suit, but this could change. The US's teetotal approach has also led it to oppose Bolivia's formal request to the UN to remove the ban on the chewing of coca leaves – an indigenous practice dating back more than 2,000 years. All over Latin America in recent history there have been moves to legalization. Argentina's Supreme Court ruled to decriminalize possession of drugs for personal consumption and there are continued efforts in Ecuador to reform its heinous drug law that was basically drafted under the guidance of the US. Senior figures in the region such as Fernando Henrique Cardoso and Ernesto Zedillo, the former presidents of Brazil and Mexico, have questioned the validity of the Drug War. Back in the US, it is the cowardice of the political establishment that stops anything from changing. "People are admitting it's a failure," Ron Paul, a Republican congressman from Texas, told me. "But they are intimidated. If they say it's a failure they are worried about being perceived as soft on drugs." He added: "I think we are making progress. I sense a major change with the people, but I don't think the government has caught up yet." The libertarian wing of the Republican Party has been increasingly pro-legalization and against the huge outlays in Latin America while the rise of the Tea Party has brought the issue to the fore, with some wings favoring a cessation of the policy. "I have had this position for years, people always thought I wouldn't be re-elected [in the] Deep South bible belt, but it's never been harmful politically," said Paul. "It has hurt so many people and so many families, there has been a realization that it's the war that is hurting people more than drugs themselves." And some Democrats are wising up, too. The Western Hemisphere Drug Policy Commission Act aimed to create a commission appointed in part by the president to re-evaluate the eradication and production-side emphasis of the US's drug policy in Latin America. Sponsored by Eliot Engel, a congressman from New York, it was defeated in the Senate in 2010 after passing through the House unanimously. Another act of the same name was introduced in 2014. "The War on Drugs is a failure, we still have problems with drugs," Engel told me. "In Mexico the cartels are even bolder." But it was only a failure if you believed the War on Drugs was about drugs. Honduras shows it is actually about something else entirely.

A DRUG WAR COLONY

TEGUCIGALPA, HONDURAS

Tegucigalpa (Tegus) is an American-made disaster. Traditionally the most subservient and tightly controlled US client state in Central America, it has been the base from which the US has launched a terrorist war of aggression (against the Nicaraguans in the 1980s) and ignited a savage civil war (in neighboring El Salvador). There is barely a restaurant in the city that is not part of an American corporation, and on the surrounding beautiful, rolling hills sits Tegus's own version of the Hollywood sign – except this time it says Coca-Cola. There is barely anywhere in the city from which this imposing cutout is not visible.

When I arrived in the country in 2012, it had been three years since the US-backed coup that threw out the democratically elected president. I was told I could not leave the hotel, day or night, and had to take a taxi to interviews. The whole city was on lockdown. I did not comply – but as I walked the concrete streets of the center it was like a ghost town. There were various bits of graffiti, the walls being the last place for free expression in a country wrecked by authoritarianism and violence. "El pueblo nunca olvidará" (The people will never forget); "Venceremos los dueños!" (We will defeat the owners).

Honduras is one of the front-line states in the Drug War. It has become increasingly popular with traffickers owing to the corruption of its officials, the poverty of its people, and the fact that there are large tracts of barren land, particularly in the north of the country, that are off limits to the government. The geography is also a boon for narcos – Honduras is a halfway point for cocaine coming from South America to Mexico and the US. But combating drugs is like squeezing a balloon – when you push the drugs out of one region, they reappear somewhere else. Underneath all the puritan anti-crime rhetoric, the so-called Drug War, which is now a huge bureaucracy employing thousands of people all over the world, was always about control. This method of domination became more acute after the end of the Cold War when the US was running out of excuses to base its military personnel and agents throughout Latin America. The Drug War then became the perfect front for a sustained military presence in the region that would make all its countries slaves to US dictates: the situation that the planners wanted replicated was that of Honduras. Unsurprisingly, it was a plan the rest of the hemisphere was not too happy with. When I arrived in Tegucigalpa I was aware of the real reasons for the Drug War, but I wanted to hear from the horse's mouth what US operations were about. I organized an interview with the Drug Enforcement Administration (DEA), the major US agency dedicated to eradication of coca crops, to take me through it. The DEA agent, Jeff Sandberg, did not want to be named, but in the interests of full disclosure I will not conceal his identity. US agents don't deserve anonymity, like the programs they oversee. Incidentally, that's probably not even his real name – most US agents are given cover identities. He was a squat man with a shaved head and a wild-eyed look, the sort of proselytizing anti-drugs bureaucrat you might imagine would be working for the DEA in Honduras. When I asked him whether he felt he was winning the war against the cartels, he just laughed. "No, we're not winning, but we're trying very hard. The situation is very difficult, you have government institutions that have basically failed or are failing that require a lot of work and a lot of time to strengthen them and get them back on track." He was no doubt correct, but he forgot to add that the government, the country and the state it was in, were in large part down to non-stop US intervention for pretty much a century. Any time it looked like the people were slinging off the imperial giant upstairs, the US would come in and launch a coup, as it did in 2009, President Barack Obama's first coup. The problem had been the incumbent President Manuel Zelaya, who had had the temerity to raise the minimum wage for the poorest Hondurans. The local Honduran oligarchs saw the danger of a slightly more humane society and reached out to their natural allies, the US, overthrew democracy, kidnapped the president, dumped him in his pajamas on a runway, and reinstalled the political wing of the rich, the Liberal Party. The US initially called it a coup, then the position changed, the subsequent "elections" were validated, and Porfirio Lobo, the new and illegitimate president, was invited to tea at the White House.

Since the coup, a continuing phenomenon has been the huge increase in the number of human rights violations. This is not just perception. One human rights group told me that at a national level in 2008 they were dealing with 125 human rights violations throughout the whole year. In 2010, they had 2,700 cases, and in the period 2011–12 there was very clear targeting of specific groups. Among the countries of Latin America, Honduras has had the most journalists murdered in recent years. There has also been targeting of people who are aligned to the new political party, LIBRE, that has been set up by former president Zelaya and his wife, as well as people who are community activists involved in protest and resistance movements. When I was there the country had what Hondurans called (accurately) a "narco-congress", a group of rich legislators who are in bed with the narco-traffickers with whom the US was ostensibly at war. Mr Sandberg himself agreed. "I believe there are plenty of people that are involved [in the drugs trade], that would have to be involved, to allow what goes on here, high up the food chain." The number of deputies in the congress who have been assassinated in narco-related incidents has soared over recent years, while people at the local level will say openly which mayors, members of the city councils and deputies have been elected with narco funds.

NOTHING TO SEE HERE

The method of military control used in Honduras, under the guise of the Drug War, is simple: open a military base, but do not call it a base. This method is mirrored across other countries in the region and across the world. The US officially calls these areas Forward Operating Locations (FOLs), because apparently they are temporary, and it's embarrassing to call them bases as an American empire, of course, does not exist. In Honduras, just before I arrived, the US had opened four new FOLs, ostensibly to deal with drugs. But, in truth, Central America was also showing signs of moving away from US control, with left-wing governments in El Salvador and (briefly) Honduras. The truth is that the US was trying to reassert its control of Latin America after a decade of concern about the Middle East, during which time a raft of independent leaders, not subservient to US interests, arose in the region.

In the course of my interview with DEA agent Jeff Sandberg in the gardens of the US embassy in Tegucigalpa, he denied that the FOLs were new, saying that "they have been around for a number of years, maybe not in as much use as they've gotten in the last year or maybe in the upcoming time frame, but those locations have been around for actually a number of years, so they are not really new." This sounded like an admission that the US has had a surreptitious military presence at undisclosed locations through Honduras for "a number of years". The flack (journalistic slang for PR people) who sat in on our interview chimed in: "We have no military bases, there are Forward Operating Locations, which are actually Honduran facilities where there was just renovations that were done to support these types of air operations, it's not something that was built out of whole cloth. Even though I explained it's a small operation, but these were existing facilities where it was built so that there could be the staging for these helicopters into the air where we've identified that the drug trafficking activity takes place." The rhetorical gymnastics of imperialism. Of course, it was all smoke and mirrors. FOLs are the same thing as a military base, but the Americans don't want to appear the imperialists. The flack even said there is "not a US base at Soto Cano. Soto Cano is a Honduran base". But that same base houses the US Joint Task Force Bravo (JTF-B), which is a regional force whose main goal is apparently to "assist in disaster relief " – and other more nefarious things. "I do want to reject categorically the idea that there is an American base in Honduras," he told me. Imagine if the Hondurans had an elite team of Special Forces at a base in Florida, then said it didn't comprise a base. Incidentally, the use of "advisors" in South Vietnam by President Kennedy in the early 1960s was another way of covering up for the build-up of troops and the take over of a foreign country under the veil of "altruism" and the "at their behest" ideology.

To understand the massive ideological construct that is the Drug War, designed to disguise the imperialism at its root, it is necessary to examine US claims about its efforts. Money is given by the US, alongside military and drug personnel and training, to Latin American countries in an effort to interdict drugs that are being smuggled from Colombia and other areas of South America through Central America until they finally arrive on the streets of Baltimore or Chicago. Interdiction does happen – the propaganda is not completely hollow – in the form of night raids and drug busts, but even Mr Sandberg admitted to me that "interdiction is a very small part of the puzzle". In addition, the US's Drug War hasn't hit production levels at all, but has merely caused possibly millions of deaths and untold misery across the continent. When WikiLeaks released the US diplomatic cables, they revealed that the Americans in fact knew that the most powerful oligarch in Honduras, Miguel Facussé Barjum, was allowing drugs-laden aircraft to land on his property. Facussé, who had his own private militia that was killing campesinos fighting for land rights, was of course a US ally, so nothing ever happened. Many in Honduras believed Facussé was in fact behind the June 2009 coup, an allegation with some merit.

In short, the US is losing the war against drugs, but that doesn't matter because it isn't about drugs. The war will continue because it's the perfect mask, the perfect means of maintaining high levels of military force and control throughout the Americas now that the excuse of the Soviet Union has disappeared. The Soto Cano air base in Honduras, in fact, became a vital control point for counterinsurgency in the region, and in more recent times it has been the watching point for the supervision of drug trafficking and movement throughout this region. More importantly, the US can police the people when they vote the wrong way: it was clearly concerned about President Zelaya's policies in 2007–08, the entry of Honduras into the independent trade grouping ALBA, and the close relationship with Hugo Chávez. All of these set off warning bells for the US about whether it would lose access to the bases, so there was a coup, and the people of Honduras were crushed once again.

The functionaries at the front line of US imperial operations can't – won't – see it like this. "We're making some progress, we're trying to make more progress, what's the alternative?" asked Jeff Sandberg when I mentioned that the war looks to be failing. "To throw up our hands and say we give up? Then what happens? Chaos, in my estimation. Is that the better alternative? Not in my world, maybe some people think so, but I bet if those people lived in chaos they'd think otherwise." I later organized to meet with the heads of the United States Agency for International Development (USAID) and the State Department to see what kind of narrative they had developed to explain the descent of this close American ally into tragedy. Like many individuals working in the US imperial system, they obviously believed the lies that had been concocted to legitimize, both morally and legally, the US presence in Honduras. In fact, I believe it would be impossible to not imbibe all these false theories about US benevolence – many of these people are good people who want to believe they are doing the right thing. It is the institutions that are pathological; they are merely its human form, so convoluted forms of legitimization are a must. Every now and then someone like Edward Snowden has a moral awakening and reveals the true face of American power. But the collection of officials I met comprised the standard fare. We sat around the table at the USAID building opposite the embassy and they came out with the usual lines, which are not worth quoting as they just perpetuate the myths.

CULPRITS RUNNING FREE

Like most campaigns waged by the US government to pursue its interests in a particular region, the result in Honduras has been unadulterated misery for the people living there. In fact, when I was in Honduras it had been transformed into the most dangerous country in the world. The homicide rate was higher than in war-torn Iraq and Afghanistan, two other countries destroyed by the US government and military. I talked to a number of people who had lost friends and relatives – it was unusual to meet someone who did not know someone who had been killed by a gang or political interests. No one had seen justice done. Julio Funes Benítez, for example, was shot dead in broad daylight outside his house in Tegucigalpa in early 2010. The assassins unleashed a hail of bullets in his direction while driving past on a motorbike. Mr Benítez had been active in the resistance movement which flourished after the coup. But nearly three years on, no one had been charged with his murder. "From when they killed my husband to now, I never got any support from the authorities," Lidia Marina Gonzales, Mr Benítez's widow, told me. "There was never an investigation, the culprits are free. The agent who was meant to investigate told me that if I wanted there to be an investigation I would have to pay." The fact that Mr Benítez's killers got away with murder is not an exception in modern-day Honduras. There are 91 murders per 100,000 people, or one every 74 minutes. Nearly all remain unsolved, and many, as in the case of Mr Benítez, are not even investigated. One of the big problems is that the quality of criminal investigation is absolutely appalling; sentencing is less than 3 percent. This pattern of violence cannot be attributed solely to the coup, but has been growing since around 2002. The Honduran government itself says it is focusing on modernizing the justice system and reforming political institutions in its effort to bring down the homicide rate. "The advance of narco-trafficking alongside the geographical position of the country and corruption in the police make it hard to combat," Julio César Raudales, the minister for planning in the Lobo administration, told me. "It is going to be a long road to reconstruct the social fabric, but that won't stop us."

As in all countries where the US has been intervening on the side of the oligarchs and the murderers, a heroic resistance, killed at a staggering rate, refuses to be cowed. Chief among these groups is Cofadeh, the Committee of the Relatives of the Detained and Disappeared in Honduras, which is a non-governmental organization (NGO). I walked over to their offices to talk with Dina Meza, one of its human rights workers, who was herself living in fear because of her work. “There are many threats, defenders of human rights have a lot of threats,” she told me in a coffee shop just down the street. “In my case they have increased since February of this year, text messages have come to me telling me to watch out, armed men have come to my house, I had to change my life radically, including where I live. I spend much more on security, but of course the government isn’t investigating the threats. This office is watched, all our actions are watched. I had to leave with my family from where we lived because armed men were watching us at home, even though Cofadeh had told the police, they had never come to protect us, they wanted to kill us all. They gave me a number to call of the police if I get in a bad situation, but the number doesn’t work, no one picks up. We have a state that doesn’t work.” So how does she go on? I asked. “I don’t want to see a country with no human rights; we have to keep fighting for our children. Even if I die, we are fighting for democracy, rights, it’s a natural bravery.”

When you travel around the world investigating how the US has uniformly tried to stub out popular movements through the most heinous and brutal programs, people like Meza also pop up everywhere. These are people who refuse to become just another statistic buried by the US media, people whose names will never be known beyond their communities but who continue to fight every day, at great risk to themselves, positioned against the most powerful state and military in the history of the world. Meza didn’t mince her words: “The US support the oppression of anyone lifting a finger against the coup government, I wish the American people could see this.”

In the aftermath of the June 2009 coup, the resistance had been strong and was brutally suppressed. A new party emerged which was said to represent the disparate groups allied against the de facto regime – these included unions, lesbian, gay, bisexual and transgender (LGBT) groups and women’s movements. It was called LIBRE and was led by Xiomara Castro, wife of the deposed president Zelaya. I met the international coordinator of the party, Gilberto Ríos Munguía, in Tegucigalpa. “The government doesn’t have real power,” he told me. “A de facto group have power in the country. They control the police and the military. It’s a group of narco traffickers, from Mexico and Colombia; it’s the same cartels that are in Mexico that control this place. They have more power than the state of Honduras; they have neutralized the functioning of the state, in police, investigations, in the military. This has provoked the high levels of violence."

After the US and oligarchs threw out the democratically elected Zelaya, the narcos gained near-complete control of the congress. Although the US denied being involved in the coup and, in WikiLeaks cables subsequently released, privately said it was illegal, it has strongly supported the coup regime under President Porfirio Lobo. Many people in Honduras suspect that the US was involved in the coup itself. There is a famous joke in Latin America that the US is the only country in the hemisphere to have never had a military coup because it is the only country in the hemisphere without a US embassy. "The CIA had a lot to do with the coup. Obama with the new coup, he didn't recognize the de facto government of [Roberto] Micheletti; however, he never did a commercial blockade, like in Cuba. In the case of Honduras he only criticized six months of de facto government, then recognized the government of the same coup," added Munguía.

Munguía believed that the US favors some cartels over others, a view that is gaining increasing currency in Central America and is backed up by revelations from Mexico. He held that "the DEA is very corrupt, it's a cartel, and they are working with the cartels, in Mexico as well". Like in Iraq and Afghanistan, where someone who has a score to settle will erroneously tell the Americans that their enemy is al-Qaeda, the cartels in Central America are informing on their enemies to the DEA in the hope that the biggest military power in the world can help them vanquish their rivals. "In Mexico, the country started going bad at the start of the war on drugs, and in Honduras we are worse than even Mexico," said Munguía. The activists in LIBRE, like many others who are standing against the US-backed coup regime, feel in constant danger. "Many people of us are under threat of death, we have received many threats," he said. "I have friends that have been assassinated, the mayor, the deputies. I lost a friend who was very close six months ago. The first deputy candidate [from the LGBT community], he was killed." That activist was a young man by the name of Eric Martinez, who was murdered by anonymous forces for speaking out too forcibly against the US-backed regime. Munguía said that most of the assassinations were the work of the police or military, a situation mirrored in countries that the US controls across Central America.

LIBRE is a rare beacon of hope in Honduras, where a sense of hopelessness pervades. In a country where dissent and democracy is attacked mercilessly, its activists, in the face of violence and murder, are organizing from a grassroots base to take on the oligarchy and their backers in the US embassy. Before they are successful, however, a lot of blood will have to be spilt. It's the same for those fighting US-backed tyrants around the world, from Egypt to Saudi Arabia. "Honduras is the most anti-democratic country in Latin America," said Munguía. And of course it has to be this way, because as soon as real democracy appears and threatens US interests, it will have to be cut down. What the US likes, and promotes, is "low-intensity democracy", a political system in which there are formal elections every four years but the social relations of the society, the control of a rich elite, is never questioned and the concerns of the country's poor people are never heard.

Not long before I arrived in Honduras there was what became an infamous massacre. On May 11, a gun helicopter ship, US-owned but apparently Honduras-piloted (and overseen by DEA agents), murdered four people, including two pregnant women. "I wasn't there in the incident, nor was I here in the country," Jeff Sandberg said. I asked instead if there were regular firefights between the Honduran military and people they were ambushing. "I don't know if I would say regularly," he replied. "But there certainly have been incidents and there will be further incidents of government forces against people involved in the cartels." I asked about the role of the DEA in such operations. "Mentoring, advising, and building the capacity of the Hondurans to at some point function on their own without our help." It was the same excuse – of beneficence and aid – that had been used to control South Vietnam, Afghanistan and countless other countries. But many argue that the role of the DEA is much more hands-on. "In this case, that was a police operation not a military operation, and they were in a situation of trying to seize drugs out of a community that had a lot of arms," Lisa Kubiske, the US ambassador to Honduras, told me in her office in the embassy. What that operation did provoke was massive anti-American feeling in Honduras. Mr Sandberg added: "It's just part of the politics that goes along with any kind of country that is requesting assistance from another country, wouldn't have to be just the US. What happens if Hondurans ask Guatemala for assistance, and you have Guatemalan police or troops to assist and an attack happens where some civilians are killed by the Guatemalans, I'm sure the Hondurans would say the same thing." The problem for Sandberg and the Americans is that they work militarily in 130 countries around the world – no other country does that. Of course the dynamic is the same: people don't like outsiders coming in and killing their people. But those outsiders are nearly always American. Ask an Iraqi or Afghani or Honduran or Guatemalan. The flack representing the embassy at this point reminded me that the Americans were “here at the request of the government, working in areas that the government has identified”. This is the oldest American propaganda line there is. Like all the best propaganda, too, it has a semblance of truth if decontextualized. So, of course, the Honduran government has invited the US, but it’s a government the US installed and is backing to the hilt against their own people, so it would be a huge surprise if they rejected US solicitations to base themselves in the country. This is the problem of the American empire: it has to hide itself continually, it has to live in the shadows, not allowing detection, because the country is founded on strong anti-imperialist ideas, and its media class would implode if it reported the truth. So the military bases have to be “forward operating locations”, the military presence has to be at the behest of the “Honduran people”, the military operations have to be operated by Hondurans, and “overseen” by Americans. It’s a constant dance to cover up rapacious power and give it the gleam of legitimacy. Once you scratch the surface, however, it falls apart.

THE ECONOMY OF DESPAIR

Although Honduras is a major military outpost for the US empire, it pales into insignificance when you look at the “tonnes of personnel” (Sandberg) that the US has in Mexico and Colombia. “Every Central American country has DEA personnel assigned in Central America,” Sandberg said. In fact, the US set up multi-billion-dollar programs in both Mexico (the Mérida Initiative) and in Colombia (Plan Colombia), alongside the Central American Regional Security Initiative (CARSI), the US government program through which it filters money to countries in the region. Sandberg pointed to these two places as evidence of what might be achieved in Honduras. “There are many obstacles. I would say take a look at Colombia and Mexico. How long has it taken Colombia to get its handle on the drug trade and various anti-government entities operating in Colombia, it was a long time frame. Realistically it’s probably what it’s going to take here, but we have had tremendous success in Colombia, and I think we’re starting to have some very good success in Mexico, so it’s possible here.” Colombia, as has been noted, has the worst human rights record in the hemisphere; in Mexico, from 2004 to 2014, 200,000 people were killed in the Drug War fought by the military and the cartels. That’s what Honduras has to look forward to – courtesy of the

US. But Sandberg was adamant that it's the Hondurans who "need to change", not the US. "Their country, their views, their legal system is what needs to be revamped, and I think that's probably decades. Generations that have the wrong outlook, maybe, of how things function here, and accept how things function here, that's what needs to change." This is traditional imperial mentality. The colonial powers, and their agents, nearly always ascribe any faults in a country they are administering to the cultural mores of the local people. This provides an important function: it stops the colonial powers' administrators from ever having to question the system that created the mess in the first place, and which they oversee. Another point that the US might consider is that nearly all the demand for these drugs comes from within the US, as well as a large portion of the guns used by the cartels. If the US government could reduce the demand for drugs and supply of guns, the violence might very well start to abate.

In the big debate about the Drug War, most politicians turn to simple demonization of cartels and their members, as well as the trade itself. The cartels are brutal organizations, but they are a product of a destroyed economy. When young kids are growing up in Honduras or northern Mexico, and their choice is between a life of penury in the formal economy or joining a cartel and becoming fabulously wealthy, unsurprisingly they often choose the latter. In the May 11 killings, for example, even if the people killed were guilty, they are likely to have been dirt-poor kids moving product up the river because they had no other option. DEA agent Sandberg had actually put his finger on the problem, when I asked why there were such high levels of violence in Honduras: "I think because the legal system in Honduras and the other social systems are so broken that there's no impunity for people to not commit a crime, so it doesn't have to be focused or because of drugs, it's just a crime of opportunity or because you have a tonne of people who are living in poverty, people are trying to literally stay alive, and if that means committing a crime to get what is required to stay alive, then so be it. So I don't attribute it all to drugs and cartels." He did not, however, connect the state that Honduras was in to the fact that it had been the recipient of continuous US intervention. Was it a coincidence that Haiti, Honduras, and all the rest of these countries controlled by the US, were in tatters? Forcefully wrenching control from the people of any country, making it a dependency, a slave state for foreign capital, would, of course, not benefit the majority of the population.

Honduras economically is a playground for American capitalists, having been cursed by various neoliberal institutions. The multinationals operating in Honduras have nearly all been given tax-free holidays of up to 20 years to locate in Tegucigalpa, which has decimated government revenues. It is part of the reason why the justice institutions, education and health are so chronically underfunded. The profits are repatriated to the US and other western capitals, while the Hondurans spend their money in their restaurants. In this sense, Honduras is one of those unfortunate places where many facets of US imperial power converge – the neoliberal economics, the support for the military institution, the hysterical anti-leftist ideology. In such a situation, for people to retain their dignity and shake off the oppressor is extremely difficult. These tensions and problems contribute to the sluggish economy. When I was there, a “model cities” project was seen as a way to kick-start the economy, through creating privately run cities on Honduran land where immigrants from across Latin America could come to work in the maquiladoras (sweatshops). It was, however, rejected by the Honduran Supreme Court in October 2012 as “unconstitutional”, but it will, without doubt, be back.

“If you want security for citizens it’s interrelated with socio-economic conditions of country,” said US ambassador Kubiske. “If you have people who can earn enough money, they don’t have to be tempted by criminal activity. If they think there are no options, they may be tempted.” True – but the US has kept Honduras chronically undeveloped. Like Haiti, Honduras experienced neoliberal economics on top of an already desperate situation. Hurricane Mitch, which hit in 2002, destroyed large parts of the infrastructure of the country and the livelihoods of many thousands. There was a big surge in male migration up to 2006. Then after that there was a big internal migration, mainly of women who moved toward the maquila sector. The majority of these “free trade zones” were in the north, like San Pedro Sula, which is now the most deadly city in the world. As late journalist Charles Bowden has pointed out, this mix of ultra-violence and ultra-capitalism is an apocalyptic vision of all our futures, as capital reforms governments around the world to make their people slave to it. Honduras is a very unequal society, as are most US client states. The concentration of income that is being captured by the top 10 percent of the population is growing, while the percentage that has been captured by the poorest 20 percent is decreasing, from about 3.7 percent of national income to just over 2 percent over the last decade. This inequality and the blatant consumerism are evidence that there is a section of the population who are concentrating income, which inevitably leads to violence – petty and otherwise.

Debt, both internal and foreign, is also beginning to grow in Honduras. There is an urgent need for job creation that is not dependent on the sweatshops, as it is difficult for the Hondurans to compete with China on wages. Zelaya tried to raise minimum wage by 61 percent overnight to give some dignity back to the poorest Hondurans. The economy did not break down as had been predicted by the oligarchs, and the fact that they were able to pay it shows just how much money had been accumulated.

One industrial park now has 18,000 workers in one spot, making textiles, clothes and footballs. Sally O'Neil, head of Irish charity Troicaire, based in Tegus, told me: "When you got to the maquilas in Honduras, the really big ones that make Christian Dior, the workers aren't even allowed to bring in their handbags, it's incredible. We're working with a women's organization, which work on occupational issues like repetitive damage to people working for hours on the things. We weren't allowed to ask any questions or talk to any of the workers, but [when] we met the women afterwards we found out they have to have a pregnancy test every month. The women were given handouts. When they go through the turnstile in to work, they put their hands out, and they have to take the pill; before they used to throw it away, now they have to swallow it. You have to swallow it before you go out in front of them. Another one where the women we work with, they go in the morning, there's a big sack and you put your hand and take out a piece of paper and the piece of paper will have a time on it, and that's the time you can go to the loo, your one toilet stop. But you can start work at 6am and your toilet stop may be 7.15pm."

EXCUSES

I was granted the interview with Lisa Kubiske, whose first ambassadorship this was, probably because so few journalists were making it to Tegucigalpa, as the story was no longer "sexy" – another country destroyed by America, and forgotten. "If we have in Honduras a place that is democratic, and economically prosperous and has social inclusion for its people, has strong institutions of government, strong democratic institutions, that's good for Honduras, it's good for the region, and it's good for the US in a lot of different ways," she told me. Except I knew that wasn't true. A truly democratic Honduras, where the will of its population would be put ahead of the interests of foreign multinationals and the local oligarchs, was exactly what the US didn't want to see and had helped to shut down. Ms Kubiske refrained from mentioning that the US has implicitly backed a coup against a government whose biggest crime was raising the minimum wage, which would have pulled many people out of poverty.

So I asked about US support for the Lobo administration, which was a coup government that won the election merely because many did not vote in what they called an "illegitimate" contest. "Not only do we work with the elected government of the country if you think they were elected in a legitimate election, the reason we think that is because they were the candidates selected in primaries. We recognized this result." I asked if the coup made the situation worse, as many in Honduras hold, and whether the elections were illegitimate. "The violence of this society is perpetrated by many different actors, and that's the first thing," she replied. "The second thing is there has been a rising trend in violence that goes back several years before the coup. I'm going to say something like 2004, 2005, but you can look it up. So to say that the violence is a result of the coup, I wouldn't say that. I wouldn't say that." She added: "They have other cultural weaknesses. For many years they had problems with how they treated women – women getting killed, beat up, that kind of thing. The family issues, that's been there, it's just worsened in the last few years."

I mentioned that the militarization of law enforcement and drug interdiction, under the aegis of US forces and policy, has made the situation worse and resulted in murders like those on May 11. "I wouldn't characterize them as murders," the flack interrupted. "Killings, then," I said, and added, "some people say 'we are a sovereign country, we don't need the superpower upstairs here with their trained officials' ". Ambassador Kubiske answered: "I would refer them to surveys about US participations in their country. Firstly, we do really just go where we're invited." She said that most Hondurans ask for more intervention and use of Soto Cano as a counter-drugs base (which it already is). For a long time, the Honduran military had a fearsome reputation and was hated by the population for its brutality and human rights abuses. Now, the coin has flipped and the police are feared while the military enjoys a better reputation. This is not a sign of progress, but rather how far in people's estimation the police have fallen.

I mentioned I had spoken to human rights groups in Honduras, and Ambassador Kubiske shot back, "They don't all have the same views", which means that there are some critical and some supportive of the US. One of the major features of US imperial strategy is to maintain a pretense of an open civil society inside "low-intensity democracies" and then put money into certain human rights NGOs which are supportive of the US and its policies. So it looks as though the US is contributing to a vibrant civil society and human rights system, but actually it is creating bodies that shore up its position. It is structurally impossible for these organizations to threaten to upset the social relations of the country or impinge on the US-backed oligarchs. So you get "human rights" and control, with no need for a crisis of conscience.

Of course, the US doesn't control all civil society groups, and so the ones outside US control, like Cofadeh, support groups that fight for justice on a more general level. For this reason, they must be discredited. Cofadeh had asked me why it was that the US embassy released a strong statement after a lawyer was killed in Tegus, but had said nothing about the campesinos in Aguan Valley where private militias rented by the local oligarchs to clear the land of protests and occupation murdered 80 people. "It's very complicated," said Ambassador Kubiske, in a common refrain from US officials overseeing an unjust policy. "It could be private guards, one time it could be one campesino group on another campesino group, one time it could be narcos. So for what we're seeing, we're seeing lots and lots of different motives."

The case in Aguan was horrific – the wanton murder of powerless campesinos by private militias controlled by some of the wealthiest people in the region – but for the US embassy it was "complicated" because admitting that this was a horror show would mean taking on the oligarchs who represented their interests in the country and the region. "I think we're known in general society for being quite an active voice on behalf of human rights because it is important to us," said Ms Kubiske, ignoring the reality beyond the walls of the US embassy. When I asked about the huge private armies amassed by the oligarchs, she legitimized it as a natural reaction. "I can't comment on Facussé himself, but I've lived in a lot of countries that have weak police systems, and when you don't think you are getting adequate security from the state, you tend to go and pay for your own to do that. What I've seen in Honduras and elsewhere before are middle-class people on up hiring private guards, lots of them because they can, the police aren't there when you need them. That's what I think is going on, I think it's a natural response." A natural response. The people of Honduras had been beaten down to the point where only a whimper could be heard. But elsewhere in the continent people were breaking free of the vast web of control the racket had imposed on the region. Welcome to Bolivia.

WAR ON HOPE

LA PAZ, BOLIVIA

In the middle of the night on April 16, 2009, an elite Bolivian police unit entered the four-star Hotel Las Americas situated in the eastern city of Santa Cruz, a hotbed of opposition to the President Evo Morales's government. Flown in from the capital, La Paz, the commandos planned to raid a group of men staying in the upscale lodgings. What happened in the early hours of that morning is still disputed, but at the end of the operation, three men who were asleep in bed had been killed in cold blood. Some say they were executed, while the Bolivian government claims its officers won out in a 20-minute firefight. In the aftermath, the story gained international attention when it was revealed that two of the dead were not even Bolivian. One was Michael Dwyer, a 26-year-old Irishman from County Cork, where he had been a bouncer and security guard before moving to Santa Cruz just six months earlier. Another, Árpád Magyarosi, was Hungarian-Romanian, and had been a teacher and musician before relocating to Bolivia at the same time. The third person killed in the operation was the ringleader of the group, Eduardo Rózsa-Flores, an eccentric Bolivian-Hungarian who had been born in Santa Cruz before fleeing the country during the US-backed dictatorship of Hugo Banzer in the 1970s. His family moved to Chile before the ascent of another US-backed dictator in that country, General Augusto Pinochet, and resettled finally in Hungary. Rózsa was a supporter of Opus Dei, the right-wing Catholic sect, and fought in the Croatian independence war in the early 1990s, founding the paramilitary International Platoon that many believed was aligned with fascistic elements. Two journalists, including a British photographer, died in suspicious circumstances while investigating the platoon. In Santa Cruz on that night, two others, Mario Tadic, a Croatian, and Elöd Tóásó, also from Hungary, were arrested and remain in a high-security La Paz prison to this day.

WAR ON HOPE

LA PAZ, BOLIVIA

In the middle of the night on April 16, 2009, an elite Bolivian police unit entered the four-star Hotel Las Americas situated in the eastern city of Santa Cruz, a hotbed of opposition to the President Evo Morales's government. Flown in from the capital, La Paz, the commandos planned to raid a group of men staying in the upscale lodgings. What happened in the early hours of that morning is still disputed, but at the end of the operation, three men who were asleep in bed had been killed in cold blood. Some say they were executed, while the Bolivian government claims its officers won out in a 20-minute firefight. In the aftermath, the story gained international attention when it was revealed that two of the dead were not even Bolivian. Another, Árpád Magyarosi, was Hungarian-Romanian, and had been a teacher and musician before relocating to Bolivia at the same time. The third person killed in the operation was the ringleader of the group, Eduardo Rózsa-Flores, an eccentric Bolivian-Hungarian who had been born in Santa Cruz before fleeing the country during the US-backed dictatorship of Hugo Banzer in the 1970s. His family moved to Chile before the ascent of another US-backed dictator in that country, General Augusto Pinochet, and resettled finally in Hungary. Rózsa was a supporter of Opus Dei, the right-wing Catholic sect, and fought in the Croatian independence war in the early 1990s, founding the paramilitary International Platoon that many believed was aligned with fascistic elements. Two journalists, including a British photographer, died in suspicious circumstances while investigating the platoon. In Santa Cruz on that night, two others, Mario Tadic, a Croatian, and Elöd Tóásó, also from Hungary, were arrested and remain in a high-security La Paz prison to this day.

Two more suspects, both with Eastern European connections, were not at the scene and are still missing.

It transpired that the government had acted on intelligence indicating that these men comprised a cell of terrorists who were planning a program of war and violence in the country, which included a somewhat bizarre plan to blow up Evo Morales, the president, and his cabinet on Lake Titicaca, the biggest lake in the Andes and a major tourist attraction. The intelligence services, after a tip-off from an informer close to the group, had been following them for a number of months. They decided to act soon after a bomb exploded at the house of the Archbishop of Santa Cruz, Cardinal Julio Terrazas. The government appointed a seven-person committee to investigate the plot, headed by César Navarro, deputy minister for coordination with social movements and civil society, which spent the next five months until November 2009 looking into it. Among the items seized during the raid was Rózsa's laptop in which investigators claim to have discovered emails between ex-CIA asset and Cold War double-agent István Belovai. “There are emails between Rózsa and Belovai, he was the brains behind it,” Mr Navarro told me in his office in the presidential palace in La Paz. “He would ask them logistical questions about escape routes, about whether the government or police would be able to get to them.” Belovai, who died in 2010, was a spook who called himself “Hungary's first NATO soldier”. Rózsa is thought to have become friends with Belovai in the 1990s during the Balkan war.

At the time of the attacks, the attitude of the US embassy, revealed through the cables sent from La Paz to Washington, was one of incredulity at the government's claims and worry about persecution of the opposition. One comment was headlined ‘ “Terrorism” excuse for mass arrests?” The US embassy was concerned about “raising fears of possible arrests of members of the Santa Cruz-based political opposition”. Another cable did admit that in “an interview released posthumously, the group's leader [Rózsa] advocated the secession of Santa Cruz department, Bolivia's largest and most prosperous state”. The reaction from the opposition was no less sympathetic. The right-wing governor of Santa Cruz, Rubén Costas, accused the Movimiento al Socialismo (MAS) government of “mounting a show” in the aftermath. The photos released by the government afterward told a different story. Rózsa and Dwyer can be seen posing with large caches of heavy weaponry including pistols and sub-machine guns, and a large rifle with telescopic sights. President Morales said the cell was planning to “riddle us with bullets”. A US embassy official met with a public defender assigned to alleged terrorist Tadic. She told the official that "the Santa Cruz leaders named by the government are most likely linked with the group" – these leaders were in fact intimately involved with the US embassy. Tadic, she said, had been stockpiling weapons and carrying out military training on rural properties outside Santa Cruz. She confirmed they were responsible for placing the explosive device in front of the cardinal's house, while Tadic had testified that the next target was going to be Prefect Rubén Costas' residence, and that Rózsa had advised Costas to strengthen his security gate to minimize the damage. The intent in targeting the cardinal and the prefect was to make it look like MAS supporters were carrying out the attacks.

The fact that the alleged terrorists were staying in a four-star hotel with no discernible day job suggested they must have had money coming from somewhere. The pictures of these foreigners partying in Santa Cruz – subsequently released – also show they were accepted and welcomed openly by some powerbrokers in the city – it seemed to go all the way to the top, even the prefect of the department. But none came more powerful than Branko Marinkovic, a local oligarch of Croatian origin, who had been a long-time friend of the US embassy and is now in exile in the US after being identified as one of those "most likely" to have been involved with the terrorist group. Juan Kudelka, Marinkovic's right-hand man, said in March 2010 that he had been asked by Marinkovic to pass envelopes of money to Rózsa as part of the plan to support this terrorist group, called, he said, "La Torre". Another suspect, Hugo Achá Melgar, a keen friend of a strange human rights group in New York, also soon fled to the US, where he was also welcomed with open arms. "[T]here are several factors that could induce the [government of Bolivia] to connect us to suspected extremist groups in Santa Cruz," noted one US embassy cable released by WikiLeaks. "The petition of political asylum from alleged terrorist Hugo Acha and his wife, allocation of USAID assistance to a Bolivian organization suspected of funding a terrorist cell in Santa Cruz, and an implied [US Government] role based on the [Government of Bolivia's] assertion that the Santa Cruz cell leader organized meetings and had contacts in Washington." All of these assertions turned out to be true; in fact, the situation was worse than that. The US planned to bring the opposition from all over the country together in a supra-departmental business lobby in an effort to rid Bolivia of its socialist government.

At the time, the US embassy "reassured" Vice President Álvaro García Linera "that there was no US government involvement", and President Obama vouched for that too when asked by President Morales soon after. But Mr Navarro, the investigator, still didn't believe it. "The US didn't not know," he told me. When I brought Vice President Linera into the Financial Times office in London to speak to the union at the paper, he told me: "Nothing like this happens in Bolivia without the US knowing something about it." Even if we assume the US embassy didn't know of the cell, why would the US then provide a sanctuary to alleged funders of "terrorists" whose own public defender was telling the embassy that they were "most likely" guilty? The answer is long and complex and reveals the lengths to which the US has gone to undermine the democratically elected government of Evo Morales since it came to power in 2005.

TURNING THE TIDE

The raid and the deaths came at a pivotal moment in Bolivian history. At that time the poorest country in South America, it also had the highest proportion of indigenous people in the continent – 60 percent. In December 2005, there was a tectonic shift in the power structure of the nation, unheard of since independence from Spain, when the country elected its first ever indigenous president, the socialist trade union leader Evo Morales. It wasn't a sudden development but followed decades of confrontation and public protests that had escalated in the previous five years. In 2000, the so-called "Water Wars", centered in the city of Cochabamba in the middle of the country, had pitched the local communities en masse against the government and the World Bank which had overseen the privatization of the water industry and resultant soaring prices. Police had been instructed to arrest people collecting rainwater to avoid the new prices they could not afford. Over the next years, the indigenous movement, which is based around small micro-democratic communities, grew stronger. In 2003, mass protests spread and thousands of demonstrators went on to blockade La Paz before troops, allegedly under orders of the government, shot dead a score of protesters.

The presidential incumbent, Gonzalo Sánchez de Lozada, more commonly known as Goni, was forced out and fled to Miami, where he lives to this day. It was in this ferment that Morales, a former cocalero (coca picker) turned trade union leader, and his party, MAS, came to power with a huge take of the popular vote. This turn of events, however, was not greeted kindly by the traditional elites in Bolivia and their international backers. The US had been sending its own political “experts” for years to try to avoid exactly this scenario: a 2005 documentary, Our Brand is Crisis, shows a team of slick campaign managers from Greenberg Carville Shrum, the political consultancy, successfully running Goni’s campaign as he defeated Evo Morales in the 2002 presidential elections. This time it was different: the US was powerless to stop Morales, causing serious worry among planners. Bolivia remains one of the most unequal societies in the western hemisphere, but the established state of affairs had made some people very rich. As the New York Times put it when describing Santa Cruz: “Scenes of extreme poverty stand in contrast here with the construction of garish new headquarters of corporations from Brazil, Europe and the United States.” On top of this, the land distribution has led some analysts to describe the set-up as akin to “semi-feudal provinces dominated by semi-feudal estates”. Five percent of the landowners control over 90 percent of the arable land. When MAS came to power it sought to deal with this egregious inequality, which is marked pretty consistently along race lines, with the poor landless peasants largely comprising the indigenous population. As always, the US supported the oligarchy, which in turn supported the continued slavery of the country to US corporations.

A land reform program was started by Morales to break up the huge rural estates that had long been controlled by a small elite and to redistribute land that was fallow to landless indigenous peasants. The government stipulated that private ownership of huge estates would only be acceptable if put to “social use”. But a plan like that was going to engender vociferous opposition from an entrenched elite that felt it was being usurped. One particularly illustrative case is that of Ronald Larsen, a 67-year-old American from Montana, who came to Bolivia in 1968 and who, by the time President Morales came to power, owned 17 properties throughout Bolivia (along with his sons), comprising 141,000 acres, or three times the size of the country’s biggest city. The new Bolivian government accused Mr Larsen of keeping indigenous Guarani farmers as “virtual slaves”, and tried to deliver seeds to them to help them escape from servitude. Mr Larsen responded: “These people, their main thing in life is where they’re going to get their next bowl of rice. A few bags of rice buys a lot of support.”[1] The government reported that it was fired on as it tried to deliver the said rice.

The reaction to land reform from the east of the country, where the majority of natural resources and wealth is located, was near hysterical. A class of magnates – most of European descent – own many of the businesses there and, over the next three years, with their allies in the media luna (the crescent-shaped “opposition” area of the country) worked to bring down the new President Morales. The US government and its agencies, which had for decades exercised overwhelming economic and political power over Bolivia in tandem with these newly displaced elites, was not a benign player in this period. It actively worked to help the opposition and undermine the democratically elected government. The spider web of US control was, and is, extensive, with many US agencies created at the height of the Cold War still in place, civilized language hiding their use, first, as a tool against Soviet influence in the region, and now to undermine the democratic socialism of MAS. Despite vast natural gas reserves, these agencies, alongside transnational corporations and their local compradors in government, have conspired to keep Bolivia the second-poorest country, and among the most unequal, in South America.

When the MAS government threatened to upend that social order, it was logical that the US would be nervous. One of President Morales’ first acts in power was to shutter the CIA office that had until then, he said, been operating in the presidential palace. Morales’ claims that the various agencies that make up the US foreign policy apparatus have been giving covert support to the opposition are dismissed by the US government as “conspiracy theories”. Alongside the US government, a score of non-governmental institutions, some headquartered in New York, or US-ally Colombia, have been working to undermine the democratic government in Bolivia and continue to this day.

PAYING CLANDESTINE VISITS

When I interviewed César Navarro, who headed the investigation of the April 2009 incident, in his office lined with pictures of Che Guevara and prominent members of Bolivian civil society, he spoke at 100 miles an hour, desperate to get all the information out as quickly as possible. “Rózsa didn’t come here by himself, they brought him,” he told me. “Hugo Achá Melgar brought him.” The prosecutor in the case had charged that one of Achá’s business cards was found in the backpack of one of the alleged terrorists. Further, it was claimed that Achá met with Rózsa on at least three occasions, while testimony from other terrorist suspects in custody implicated Achá as a financial supporter of the group. The Bolivian government has tried to request the extradition of Achá, who is currently in the United States, to no avail.

Achá's story reveals a long trail that leads all the way to a set of plush offices in the midtown area of Manhattan. The husband of a prominent opposition congresswoman, Achá was the founder and head of a Bolivian version of the Human Rights Foundation (HRF), an American non-governmental organization (NGO) based in New York. Not very well known – but boasting Elie Wiesel and Václav Havel on its "international council" – the HRF was founded in 2005 by a character atypical of the NGO and human rights world. A rich playboy-cum-political talking head, Thor Halvorssen could be spotted on the Manhattan party scene, as well as giving his two-pennies-worth on Fox News.

His foundation is not typical either – Mr Halvorssen told The Economist in 2010 that he wanted his organization to break from the traditional NGO mold. First his group had an overt agenda, the magazine said, focusing "mainly on the sins of leftist regimes in Latin America". But his tactics were different, too. "With the confidence of a new kid on the block," the article continued, "he argues that the big players in human rights have become too bureaucratic, and disinclined to do bold things like pay clandestine visits to repressive countries." From his midtown Manhattan office, Halvorssen said: "They work in these big marbled offices, where's the heart in that?" It was in the dusty streets of La Paz that he wanted to be. In many ways, Halvorssen was merely a chip off the old block. HRF's obsession with the "repressive" governments of, particularly, Venezuela and Bolivia was not something new to the family. Neither were clandestine activities. Halvorssen's father, Thor Halvorssen Hellum, is a Venezuelan businessman, the head of one of the richest families in the country. In 1993, he was arrested and charged with homicide and other counts after a group of terrorists set off a series of six bombs around the capital, Caracas. It was named the "yuppie" terrorists plot because its planners were allegedly bankers and other gilded elite who hoped that the panic caused by the bombs would help them speculate on the stock market. The Houston Chronicle noted at the time: "Police have identified one alleged mastermind as Thor Halvorssen, a former president of telephone company CANTV, former presidentially-appointed anti-drug commissioner, and, according to officials, a former operative of the US Central Intelligence Agency in Central America." Halvorssen Hellum eventually spent 74 days in prison before a superior court judge found him innocent of attempted homicide and all other charges related to the bombings. Many found the decision murky. And two hours after his release, another "human rights" NGO, the International Society for Human Rights, appointed him director of its Pan-American committee. During a CIA "anti-drug" campaign in Venezuela, which saw a ton of nearly pure cocaine shipped to the US in 1990, Mr Halvorssen Hellum, in his position as narcotics chief, was again in trouble. The New York Times reported that "[t]he DEA discovered that Halvorssen, who had his own links to the CIA, was using information from DEA cases to smear political and business rivals".

Like father like son. Halvorssen Jnr's own human rights project, the HRF, was set up, he said, to help in "defending human rights and promoting liberal democracy in the Americas". HRF "will research and report on human rights abuses" and "produce memoranda, independent analyses, and policy reports". But it is clear that the organization is set up, primarily, to malign the governments of Venezuela and Bolivia. It did have sizeable funds to carry out its tasks. The group's financial accounts make interesting reading. In the year ending December 31, 2006, the first full year of operations, the group spent $300,518 on its programs. By the next year, ending 2007, this had more than doubled to $644,163. In 2008, this had gone down to $595,977, but it surged again in 2009 to $832,532, as political violence was reaching a head in Bolivia. Interestingly, in the year ended 2008, "general programs", which was the highest spending category, was $85,525, or 14.4 percent of total spending on "program services". By 2009, "general programs" spending was up 813 percent to $458,840, and comprised 55 percent of total spending. In the four years from 2006 to 2009, HRF has spent nearly $2.6 million on running costs. But where was the money going? We do know thanks to the WikiLeaks cables that when Branko Marinkovic, the oligarch, fled to the US from Bolivia, one of his first ports of calls was the HRF office in Manhattan. Unfortunately, we don't know what they talked about. In its six years of operations, the group has released two 30-odd page annual reports, and 16 other reports on varying topics related to "repressive governments". To be fair, the group did organize an Oslo human rights conference which, one Wall Street Journal journalist noted, was "unlike any human-rights conference I've ever attended", because "there was no desire to blame … the US or other Western nations".

In the same article, Mr Halvorssen laughed off claims that he, like his father, was in cahoots with the CIA, calling such claims "conspiracy theories". But links between his group and Achá, the man accused of buying the tickets for the terrorists in Santa Cruz, were closer than he let on. Mr Halvorssen maintained that the Bolivian group was "inspired by HRF's work" but is "a group of Bolivian individuals … a wholly independent group with a board of directors made up entirely of Bolivian nationals”. Really? Achá was briefing the US embassy on his problems all through the period and officers from the embassy met with him in “his capacity as head of Human Rights Foundation – Bolivia”, which the embassy was told was tightly linked to the New York-based organization. One cable notes that Achá’s outfit is “an affiliate of the larger Human Rights Foundation group” – the one headed by Mr Halvorssen.

The HRF group in New York naturally still denies any wrongdoing by Achá, and is, according to some, likely helping him in his efforts to remain in the US. Its spokesperson told the press that “Human Rights Foundation in Bolivia has carried out extraordinary work denouncing human rights abuses in that country, and unfortunately the response of Morales comes in the form of insults and unfounded accusations … We have carried out an internal review and have found no evidence that Mr. Acha is linked to the group that the government claims is carrying out separatist activities.” As WikiLeaks cables reveal, the group further accused President Morales of “vilifying the reputation” of HRF due to HRF–Bolivia’s reporting on the “destruction of democratic institutions, the grand human rights violations in Bolivia” and the “anti-democratic character of the Morales Administration”. It was a typical response. The Bolivian human rights ombudsman (Defensor del Pueblo) Waldo Albarracin, referring specifically to the Human Rights Foundation, told the US embassy: “they do not have the facts and so any opinion they have is just that, an opinion.”

Achá was at one point arrested on suspicion of being involved in the plot. The cables reveal the concern of the embassy over the arrest of this “Embassy contact and leader of a human rights NGO”. Achá had even given the embassy a copy of the warrant for his arrest, which he linked to his “investigations” into a massacre in the Pando department of Bolivia (carried out, in fact, by far-right elements of the opposition). But, like many of the opposition figures, he was successful in persuading the US to grant him political asylum. The cable ends by saying that “Acha is currently in the US”. Providing a sanctuary for Bolivian suspects would become a theme of US policy. In fact, the US had been active in his alleged terrorist education. According to the WikiLeaks cables, Achá had actually participated in a Center for Hemispheric Defense Studies “Terrorism and Counterinsurgency” course in Washington in late 2008 – one assumes to gain knowledge for his own violent “counter-insurgency” terrorism back in Bolivia. Included in the course’s mandatory reading were “Left Wing Terrorism in Italy” by Donatella della Porta and “Lenin on Armed Insurrection” by Tony Cliff.

Roger Pinto, a senator for the opposition party, Podemos, told the US embassy that the government "has evidence that Acha was involved with the alleged Santa Cruz cell". He added that Achá was involved in trying to solicit funds for the group from opposition leaders in the media luna, the opposition stronghold, but only in order to "set up a self-defense force for the Media … not to assassinate the President". Pinto contended that, among others, Achá had approached the mayor of the central city of Trinidad, Moises Shriqui, with Rózsa to enlist his support. Pinto said that Shriqui flatly refused to get involved and discounted the group as "a really bad idea". Another opposition Podemos deputy, Claudio Banegas, told the US embassy that the congressional investigation into the Santa Cruz group had revealed that Achá did in fact have a relationship with the cell. His colleague said his involvement was "not at the top of the lighthouse, just at the bottom". In another cable from La Paz, Achá is called a "human rights lawyer" and it is noted that political officers from the embassy met twice with him in Santa Cruz while he was investigating the September 2008 massacre of indigenous peasants in the Pando department of Bolivia. "He was preparing a report detailing a high degree of Morales administration involvement to provoke violence in Pando," the cable added. Halvorssen never mentioned whether this "wholly independent group" had received funding from the HRF for the task, but his own group came to similar politically motivated and erroneous conclusions about the Pando massacre. Incidentally, Thor Halvorssen contacted the Financial Times soon after I asked for an interview with a résumé of my apparent "radicalism" and precipitated my departure from the paper. These "believers in freedom", as mentioned, only believe in freedom when it benefits them.

LA ESPAÑA GLORIOSA

Bolivian people, and particularly the business community in the country, have always had a strong disdain for a central government they see as interfering and stifling. To this purpose, in most areas of the country, there are institutions called civic committees, which organize and represent business interests. They have become especially important in the opposition stronghold of the media luna. In Santa Cruz, where the Rózsa group was foiled, the civic committee has become the major non-governmental voice of opposition to Evo Morales. Its presidency has been held by some of the most powerful businessmen and politicians in the country, including Rubén Costas, the current governor of Santa Cruz.

Its funding comes from 220 businesses in the department. In its internal report on civil society in Bolivia (which I obtained through the Freedom of Information Act), the United States Agency for International Development (USAID) reported that the two main columns on either side of the state are “the civic committees [...] on the right, and the large labor organizations on the left”. There have been accusations that the Santa Cruz civic committee (SCCC) has members with fascist leanings involved in violence against indigenous citizens, particularly in the affiliated youth branch. Ignacio Mendoza, a senator in Sucre, who is part of the left-wing opposition to MAS, told me: “Against us there is the Santa Cruz Civic Committee and the Youth Union, which is a neo-fascist group. These groups always threaten.” In the New York Times, correspondent Simon Romero noted: “It is no surprise that many Bolivian supporters of Mr. Morales view Santa Cruz as a redoubt of racism and elitism.” He added: “This city remains a bastion of openly xenophobic groups like the Bolivian Socialist Falange, whose hand-in-air salute draws inspiration from the fascist Falange of the late Spanish dictator, Francisco Franco.”

This would appear to include the SCCC. At the conclusion of a series of interviews at SCCC’s offices, the group’s spokesperson inexplicably allowed me to download a tranche of files from the computer in the main office. These included racist cartoons of Evo Morales, as well as a poem lauding the old colonial country, Spain.

One reads (my translation):

The grand Spain
with benign fate.
Here he planted the sign
Of surrender.
And it did in its shadow
An eminent people
Of clear front
A loyal heart

There is also a letter titled Filial Espana (Spanish affiliate) sent by the president of the committee to the president of the far-right civic committee in Spain, Carlos Duran Banegas, thanking him for his support and help. Another folder includes a coat of arms for Germán Busch who was a president of Bolivia in the 1930s and was believed by many Bolivians to have Nazi tendencies. Reports by the fascist-linked grouping UnoAmerica also feature prominently on the SCCC computer. In fact, among the documents there are photos taken, one must assume, by an SCCC photographer of UnoAmerica delivering its report on Pando to the Organization of American States (OAS) in New York.

The computer files I retrieved were also full of unhinged documents calling Chávez and Morales terrorists. One reporter accurately noted that the SCCC is “a sparkplug of separatist agitation in the East”. Despite these leanings, the US taxpayer, through USAID, is funding members of this group. In the WikiLeaks cables, under the subtitle “Blowing Smoke”, an August 2007 dispatch makes fun of Bolivian government claims about USAID activities being used to help the opposition. But inadvertently this proved it. It noted: “[a]nother USAID contractor, Juan Carlos Urenda (a Santa Cruz civic leader) described the MAS accusations as an attempt to cast a smokescreen over the ‘serious problems in this country’.” A search in the trove of documents from the SCCC’s computer turns up the same Mr Urenda, USAID contractor, as the author for the SCCC of a long article lauding the history of the department’s autonomy struggle. A prominent lawyer in the east, in 1987 he published a book called Departmental Autonomies, which, he noted, “outlines what will be the fundamental doctrine of the process of autonomy”. He went on: “Conscious of the error of having structured the country in a centralized way, [Santa Cruz] has not ceased in its attempt to decentralize the state throughout its republican history.”[2]

It turns out that Mr Urenda was actually one of the founders of the SCCC’s pre-autonomy council and one of the area’s most prominent ideologues. This finding makes a mockery of USAID’s claim to be apolitical. As its own report noted: “it is clear that Bolivian civil society in the first columns on both sides [civic committees and labor organizations] are playing roles that are less social and more political and governmental.”[3] Although they shy away from talking about direct aid, the top brass of the SCCC were full of praise for USAID when I talked to them. Documents from the computer also show extensive preparations for the Ferexpo 2007, a business show in the city, which US ambassador Philip Goldberg would attend. “USAID in Bolivia was supporting democratic organizations and tourism and fairs,” said Ruben Dario Mendez, the spokesperson. “They were interested in fomenting political participation. Evo doesn’t like that, he doesn’t like there to be freedom.”

It’s not just USAID that helps out. Mr Mendez noted that the Journalists’ Association of Santa Cruz has an agreement with the US embassy that helps them print books and put on events, an agreement which is not in place in other parts of the country. “In some cases the US helps us,” he said. “Anyone can submit a proposal to get help. I have attended events about political governance, about freedom of expression, human rights,” he added. “There was a new penal prosecution code, and a workshop on that has been carried out by USAID for years.” He was still optimistic about the ability of USAID to go about its work: “There are still organizations and people in Santa Cruz who believe in democracy. This was proved the other day when I went to the opening of a center for the support of democracy, USAID helped fund this, they work with the university president, and the vice-president of the civic committee helped set this up.” He obviously thought that USAID believed in his type of democracy. “We have a totalitarian system here, if there was a democratic government there wouldn’t be a problem here. The biggest problem in Bolivia is centralism.” (A view echoed in USAID’s reports.) The extensive cache of reports from both organizations on the office computer also reveals the links between the SCCC and the NGOs HRF and UnoAmerica. These were evidently being sent out as primers on the situation in Bolivia.

I found more evidence of US support for these right-wing opposition forces in Sucre, the judicial capital of the country, where in August 2006 President Morales announced the opening of the constituent assembly. It would spend six months redrafting the constitution with enhanced rights for indigenous communities, more economic control of the country’s resources, as well as land reform. It was eventually passed by a referendum in 2009. “Sucre is like the dividing line between the east and the altiplano [poorer indigenous west] so the idea was it was a place that could bring peace between the two peoples,” Mr Mendoza, the left-wing senator, told me as we sat in the local government headquarters. “But radical groups here connected themselves with Santa Cruz and all of a sudden it became about something bigger.” The whole process was marred by violence, as the opposition set out to scupper the process. “It all comes down to racism,” he added. “The constituent assembly was largely made up of indigenous farmers and that prompted racism. People were saying, ‘Whoever doesn’t jump is a llama’, acting superior to indigenous people and calling them llamas because they are from the altiplano.”

As the killings and lootings got under way, the US made no statement of condemnation. “They are setting fire to gas pipelines, and the US government does not condemn that?” asked Morales at the time. “Of course, they know they [the opposition groups] are their allies. So why would they denounce them?" He was right.

The tactics used by the SCCC mirrored those used in Chile when the US was trying to destabilize the government of Salvador Allende in the early 1970s; he was eventually taken out in a US-backed anti-democratic coup. In Bolivia, there was the violence from the local youth groups but also strikes – this time organized by the business elites – designed to bring the country to its knees and keep goods from being delivered to the west of the country. The Confederation of Private Businesses called for a national shutdown if the government refused "to change its economic policies". Altogether this was called a "civic coup". It failed, but around the same time the US was trying to rejuvenate the opposition, according to evidence uncovered during my time there. While in Sucre, I talked to the civic committee for the department of Chuquisaca, in which the city sits, still an opposition stronghold. Félix Patzi, the president, described the civic committee's role as keeping "an eye on government projects to make sure they follow through on their promises". But the US embassy had been in contact with a staggering request, he recalled. "They made an offer years ago. They wanted to finance a meeting of all the civic committees in the country to bring them together in 2007," he said. The idea was "to bring together the works of the different civic committees to encourage communication between them". He added: "I don't know why the US did it, but we heard from Santa Cruz that the idea was to create a national civic committee." The US obviously knew (from its own internal documents) that such a national civic committee would be right wing and take on a political and governmental role. That must have been its intention. Mr Patzi said the Chuquisaca committee refused because it doesn't receive outside funding, but, he added, "I don't how many other civic committees have accepted money from the US."

Back at the SCCC I talked to other officials who gave the impression of a tight relationship with the US. "We've always tried to work so that civil society in Bolivia has its own place to develop," said Nicolas Ribera Cardozo, vice president of the SCCC. "We've always had a conversation with the US about it." He said that in the past year-and-a-half as vice president he had had two conversations with the head of communications and publications at the embassy. "What they put across was how they could strengthen channels of communication," he said. "The embassy said that they would help us in our communication work and they have a series of publications where they were putting forward their ideas." But things were even better under Bush. "There were better programs under Bush; there were programs from USAID and DEA [the US Drug Enforcement Administration] to deal with narco-trafficking." He added that the US-funded National Endowment for Democracy had "held informative workshops for young people about leadership". For him it was not controversial that these programs were designed to help the opposition. "Of course they were opposition, it's a liberal train of thought, you train people to be more aware, productive."

The most controversial aspect of the SCCC is its youth branch, the Unión Juvenil Cruceñista (UJC), who have been called by one Bolivia analyst "paramilitary shock-troops". They roam the streets of Santa Cruz in times of unrest and have been involved in violent attacks and atrocities against indigenous peasants, as well as damage to government buildings. The US embassy noted that the UJC "have frequently attacked pro-MAS/government people and installations", adding, "Their actions frequently appear more racist than politically motivated. Several months ago, a group of mainly white Youth Union members attacked an altiplano migrant … The Youth Union has boasted to the press that it has signed up 7000 members to participate in the [civil defense militias] – the number is likely inflated but many of those who have signed-on are militant." Another cable noted: "the Santa Cruz youth union seems to be radicalizing: one group waving Santa Cruz flags drove through town in a jeep emblazoned with swastikas." In the aftermath of the Rózsa plot, the police apprehended Juan Carlos Gueber Bruno, reportedly an advisor to the UJC, and former SCCC activist, who was known as "Comandante Bruno".

"Youth Union violence was basically in retaliation to a threat," Mr Cardozo told me. "The youth groups did participate in these things but because they thought it was a threat and MAS started it."

I also talked to Samuel Ruiz, president of the UJC, at the SCCC headquarters, surrounded by photos of previous presidents, including Marinkovic and Costas. "The committee was formed in 1952 as a means to protect this region, it was under attack from other regions and felt it needed to protect itself," said Mr Ruiz. "The civic committee existed but it was felt it could do with a youth branch too." Now the UJC has 3,000 passive members, and 500 active, according to its president. Asked three times if it has any indigenous people as members, he avoided the question twice. On the third time of asking, he replied: "What percentage? I don't know. There are 20 representatives in different provinces that represent areas with indigenous people." He complained that when Morales came to power he got rid of USAID and other US groups – a false claim. “It has had a huge impact,” he said. “When there were international agencies, Bolivia was much more peaceful, now we see loose arms and legs about the streets, there are kidnappings, it’s violent and dangerous whereas it wasn’t before.” The UJC had taken matters into its own hands. He said that the government was bringing people from Chile and Peru to train farmers in military combat, and that Venezuelan and Cuban doctors were actually providing military training. His paranoia about Cuban and Venezuelan influence was similar to that shown in the cables from US officials. He claimed that Morales sent campesinos to Santa Cruz to start violence at the height of the tension, even though the cables noted that Morales went out of his way to avoid casualties. “[M]ilitary planners have told us that President Morales has given them instructions not to incur civilian casualties,” one noted. “Field commanders continue to tell us they will require a written order from President Morales if asked to commit violence against opposition demonstrators.” Another said: “A senior military planner told [an embassy official] December 13 that President Morales wants the military to be careful to avoid violent confrontations with demonstrators if called upon to support Bolivian police.”

“We are monitoring government to see what they are doing,” Ruiz claimed. “But for example they are getting people from Peru to come and train campesinos who kill my friends, and they are training campesinos in war, what are we meant to do?” On the resulting violence against indigenous people, Ruiz said it was self-defense. “After last elections, Evo sent campesinos to Santa Cruz to start aggression; our organization sent out its people but only to defend itself … It’s not a direct threat,” he admitted, but it worried him because they were “training campesinos who can’t even read or go out and feed themselves”. Ruiz claimed the UJC has never had any weapons – which is also demonstrably false.

The cables also revealed US suspicions in the same period that “some Crucenos are reportedly forming fighting groups”. They would know, as they were funding them. “Sources reported that Crucenos are developing fighting/defense groups and are equipped with weapons such as long rifles and hand guns.” Ruiz claimed that fighting campesinos caused the Pando massacre. “The Venezuelans killed the indigenous people. There are photos … The Venezuelans infiltrated by entering through the Cuban doctors,” he said. “They went to Pando to form military strategy for organization, so it wasn’t chaos, but all the campesinos, armed people, were drunk, and the Venezuelans killed them by mistake because they didn’t know what side they were on, and they also shot in the leg a Bolivian journalist because they wanted them to stop filming." The SCCC were also implicated in the Rózsa plot by Ignacio Villa Vargas, a local fixer and driver for the group, who said that a number of their members had been involved. But the SCCC believed that the Morales government organized the Rózsa plot. They did, though, admit to me that Rózsa had been to their offices, but they claimed that he was trying to infiltrate the committee on behalf of the government, disguised as a journalist. I was shown screenshots of supposed emails between Rózsa and Vice President Álvaro García Linera, which were clearly faked, dating from August 2008 and March 2009, just before the raid in the Hotel Las Americas.

The cables revealed by WikiLeaks noted that the opposition "are nervous to the point of paranoia". They were also trying to cover their tracks with delusional conspiracy theories. As noted above, one of those suspected of involvement in the terror cell was retired president of the SCCC, Branko Marinkovic, one of the wealthiest men in Bolivia, who owns a vast soybean business and large tracts of land in the east of country. His parents were emigrants from the former Yugoslavia in the 1950s and Marinkovic became a successful businessman before moving into politics, a well-trodden route in the east of Bolivia. When the Morales government came to power and embarked on a land reform program that took fallow lands from their owners to give to landless peasants, men like Marinkovic had much to lose. In a 2007 interview with the New York Times, Marinkovic predicted that Bolivia would soon be like Zimbabwe "in which economic chaos will become the norm". (The head of the International Monetary Fund's western hemisphere countries unit in the same year praised the Morales government for what he referred to as its "very responsible" macroeconomic policies.) But Marinkovic continued – "speaking English with a light Texas twang he picked up at Southern Methodist University" – with a veiled threat: "If there is no legitimate international mediation in our crisis, there is going to be confrontation. And unfortunately, it is going to be bloody and painful for all Bolivians." This was just before the Rózsa-Flores plot was scuppered.

The New York Times also noted that Croatian news services had investigated claims that Marinkovic "sought to raise a paramilitary force with mercenaries from Montenegro, where his mother was born". Marinkovic denied the claims, but there is no doubt he was pushing for a break-up of the country in the same way Yugoslavia had been split in the 1990s. On September 1, 2008, Marinkovic flew to the US, and when he came back just a week later the east of the country was in open revolt. At around the same time, US ambassador Philip Goldberg met in secret with the governor of Santa Cruz, Rubén Costas (the meeting was captured by a news organization). Initially Marinkovic filed a lawsuit against two government officials for "slander" for linking him with the Rózsa-Flores plot. His attorney declared that he "is in Santa Cruz, will stay in Santa Cruz, and will remain in the country", to prove he had no links to the terrorist cell. Except now he is in hiding. The UJC president divulged that he was in the US. "The government has already cast him as guilty and he can't defend himself from here so he asked the US for political exile and they granted it to him." Like Achá. He added that he didn't know if Marinkovic had ever met Rózsa. Maybe it's not so surprising. "The US has had a very good relationship with Branko Marinkovic," said Mr Navarro, MAS minister. "When he was head of civic committee they shared their opposition to the president." Marinkovic once jettisoned plans to visit Argentina due to distrust of the Morales-allied Kirchner government, fearing that he might be arrested there and extradited to Bolivia. During one of Marinkovic's trips to the US, he, contrariwise, participated in strategy meetings with political consultants Greenberg Quinlan Rosner and other polling and consulting firms, according to WikiLeaks cables.

When I had finished talking to the SCCC, I asked if there was anyone else I should speak to. The spokesperson recommended former general Gary Prado, who is infamous for being the man who captured Che Guevara and handed him over to his executioners. At the time Prado was a young captain in the Bolivian army. "Where do I find him?" I asked. "He usually has coffee over there in a little café about 4pm every day," I was told. I subsequently found out that Gary Prado is under house arrest, but as it is not enforced he moves around freely. I head along to his house in an upmarket neighborhood of Santa Cruz. "I am under house arrest but I go to work every day so there's not much point in that," he said. Mr Navarro had told me there was "a group of retired generals who have advised the civic committee in the event of a government attack on them". Prado is alleged to be among them. The government has drawn attention to a meeting Prado had with Rózsa at his house. "I gave an interview to Rózsa-Flores just like I'm giving to you, he came here to this same room, we had an interview about the guerrilla Che Guevara in Bolivia, he took a picture with me here, and that's all the contact I had with him." Rózsa apparently thought he was the new Che Guevara, as well as the new Hemingway. But from what Prado does know, he doesn't believe that Rózsa planned to assassinate Morales. "There was no intent of assassination, never, absolutely not," he said. Asked why they bought in foreigners, he replied: “They were brought to Santa Cruz by some people probably to try to create a group of mercenaries to defend Santa Cruz.” Then he added that the cell was “probably created to justify political repression”. He would not offer a guess on who bought the mercenaries in. The US, he added, merely “promote seminars about democracy and freedom”.

THE MASSACRE THAT WASN’T

In May 2008 political turmoil rocked Bolivia and threatened civil war. Santa Cruz held an autonomy referendum, which the government claimed was a move to secession by the eastern province. Rubén Costas, the governor of Santa Cruz, had said in the run-up that the vote – which was not legally sanctioned by the National Electoral Court or recognized by the OAS – would “give birth to a new republic”. (This is the same governor whom terror suspect Mario Tadic told authorities had met with the terror cell’s leader three times and vaguely discussed “organizing something”.) As things hurtled out of control with mass protests and violence, President Morales refrained from annulling the plebiscites which took place in other departments and called a recall referendum on his own mandate. He won resoundingly, with two-thirds of the national vote. At this point, desperate and bewildered, the opposition went on strike, and sent out the UJC (the far-right youth group) to attack government buildings and local indigenous people. The defeat at the polls led the opposition to unilaterally declare “autonomy” in four of the country’s eastern provinces. One of the platforms of the autonomy movement was the rejection of central government control over profits from the country’s natural gas reserves concentrated in the region. In the Bolivian context, therefore, the term was used as a euphemism for increased control over taxation, police and public works. If autonomy was granted in the form Santa Cruz wanted, Morales’ extensive reforms would be impossible – which was obviously the aim of the request.

The strategy of the autonomy movement was to take complete control of the media luna, provoke a national crisis to destabilize the government, and convince the army to remain neutral or move against Morales. The mayor of Santa Cruz, Percy Fernández, had already called on the military to overthrow Morales’ “useless government” just before the August referendum. In this heady tumult, in September 2008, 13 indigenous peasants in the Pando department of Bolivia were massacred in violence erupting across the region between pro-government and opposition forces. The atrocity remains relatively uncontroversial – unless you are the HRF, Achá, or the Bolivian opposition. A report by the United Nations Office of the High Commissioner for Human Rights (OHCHR) placed the blame for the killing of the peasants at the hands of people working for the local prefecture, which was led at the time by the opposition politician Leopoldo Fernández. Fernández is still in jail in La Paz, after being arrested, in the aftermath, on charges that he was involved in ordering the attack. The US embassy, in the WikiLeaks cables, noted that he was being held "under dubious legal pretext".

The UN report unequivocally called it a "massacre of peasants" and a "grave violation of human rights", concluding that the massacre was committed by personnel from the local road service office, members of the Pando civic committee and others linked to the prefecture. The Union of South American Nations (UNASUR) also sent a delegation to investigate, headed by Argentina's undersecretary for human rights who concluded that the Bolivian government had acted fairly and it was the opposition that was responsible for the murders. Chilean President Michelle Bachelet called an emergency meeting in Santiago of UNASUR to discuss the Bolivian crisis. The resulting Declaration of La Moneda, signed by the 12 UNASUR governments, expressed their "full and decided support for the constitutional government of President Evo Morales", and warned that their respective governments "will not recognize any situation that entails an attempt for a civil coup that ruptures the institutional order, or that compromises the territorial integrity of the Republic of Bolivia". Morales, who participated in the meeting, thanked UNASUR for its support, declaring: "For the first time in South American's history, the countries of our region are deciding how to resolve our problems without the presence of the United States."

But men like Achá and his "affiliate" HRF saw it differently. In October, a month after the massacre, HRF dispatched their own team to Bolivia to investigate – not the massacre but the "arbitrary detention" of "opposition members and at least one journalist". HRF's sources in Bolivia, presumably Achá, were telling it how serious the situation was. "Preliminary research done by our staff and reports sent to us from Bolivian civil society advocates suggest that the recent arrests of journalists and members of the opposition in Bolivia are politically motivated," said Sarah Wasserman, chief operating officer of HRF. The report from Achá, as mentioned by the US ambassador, posited that the MAS government had actually initiated the murders. And the HRF went on to link the massacre to a speech by government minister Ramón Quintana exhorting government sympathizers to take Pando governor Leopoldo Fernández "to the end of the world" and "give him an epitaph: Prefect, rest in peace and live with the worms. "The speech preceded violence that erupted on September 11, 12 and 13 in Pando, where more than 20 people were murdered for political reasons," they noted. The report by the Bolivian "affiliate" of the HRF blames the massacre on Morales and his national executive officers. "The deterioration of the rule of law, individual rights … do not allow the existence of a democratic system," the report concluded. "In Bolivia, with this background, it outlines the installation of a regime despotic and dictatorial presided by Evo Morales."

To be fair, there were other NGOs which came to a similar conclusion. One was the aforementioned UnoAmerica, another "human rights" group based in Colombia, whose logo shows crosshairs in the 'o' in their name. It was founded in 2008 by Alejandro Peña Esclusa, who is now detained in his home country, Venezuela, for allegedly being found with detonators and 2lb of explosives in his home. The Venezuelan government claims he has close ties to the CIA, and was involved in the 2002 US-backed coup that temporarily deposed Hugo Chávez. In one video, Esclusa is seen insisting on a plan for massive protests across Venezuela, making the government unable to control it. "It is a more efficient mechanism that generates a political crisis and a crisis of instability that forces the regime to withdraw the reform," he says. UnoAmerica became heavily involved in Bolivia after the Pando massacre, sending a team on a five-day mission to investigate what had happened. To conduct the investigation they partnered with NGOs from Argentina, Colombia, Uruguay and Venezuela (whose names read like a Who's Who of fascists in Latin America). Taking part from Argentina was El Movimiento por la Verdadera Historia, or Movement for the True History, a group which seeks to bring to justice "subversives" working against the US-backed fascist junta that ruled from 1976 to 1983 and murdered an estimated 30,000 people. One of its Argentina delegates was Jorge Mones Ruiz, an intelligence officer of the Argentine army in Bolivia during last dictatorship. (The government also claimed that the Rózsa cell had links with fascist groups in Argentina, which go by the name of carapintadas or "painted faces".)

The joint report concluded that "the government of President Evo Morales had planned and executed the violent acts". It claimed it had "sufficient information to demonstrate the responsibility of the Evo Morales administration in the so called Pando Massacre". The WikiLeaks cables revealed that the US embassy was receiving highly questionable intelligence like this from Achá and other contacts in the opposition, without applying the constant cynicism it reserved for MAS statements. In conversation with a political officer from the embassy, one contact "alleged the MAS deliberately fomented unrest in Pando in September to justify a military siege, depose Prefect Leopoldo Fernandez, and arrest opposition-aligned leaders to swing the balance of power to the MAS in the Senate". It is not countered. Another cable noted after the September 2008 violence in Pando: "the government illegally jailed Prefect Leopoldo Fernandez and violently detained over forty more, many of them prominent political opposition members." The UN had said that Fernández's jailing was not illegal.

WE'LL TAKE CARE OF HIM

The most active of the many US agencies working in Bolivia is USAID, the main foreign aid arm of the US government. USAID poured money into the country: between 1964 and 1979, it contributed more than $1.5 billion, trying to build a citizenry and investor climate conducive to US corporate needs. For nearly half a century it has carried out its ostensible goal of providing "economic and humanitarian assistance" – a gift "from the American people". The agency operates around the world in a similar capacity, and invests billions of dollars annually on projects that span from "democracy promotion" to "judicial reform".

Its operations are controversial. The Morales administration has continually said that it uses its money to push the strategic goals of the US government under the cloak of "development", claims denied by the US government. The Bolivian government also derides the lack of transparency, in comparison with EU aid money, for its programs. Mark Feierstein, USAID assistant administrator for Latin America and the Caribbean, put its raison d'être bluntly in December 2010 when he said: "USAID's programs are not charity … they are not only from the American people, as the agency's motto says, they are for the American people." As an aside, Mr Feierstein was a key campaign consultant to the former president Lozada (Goni) who fled to the US to avoid facing trial for the massacre of protesters in La Paz. There is now an attempt to prosecute him under the Aliens Tort Statute for his role in the murders. (Feierstein has never expressed regret about the campaign; in fact, the same firm did polling for Morales' opponent, Manfred Reyes Villa, in 2009.)

Like other methods and agencies used to control democracies in Latin America and around the world, it is hard to pin down USAID. But on-the-ground interviews, documents obtained through the Freedom of Information Act and the WikiLeaks cables have made it possible to unearth the strategies this agency uses to keep its stranglehold on Bolivia, at the same time providing a template for how it is used across the region to undermine left-wing democratic governments. There is no doubt how USAID personnel felt about Morales before he came into power, and one young American student heard first-hand their plans for him. In the summer of 2005, he found himself in La Paz learning Spanish on a break from university when the powder keg of political resistance in the city blew up. President Carlos Mesa – who had taken over from Goni in 2003 after the massacre of protesters in La Paz – had just stepped down. The student decided to go on a bike trip. “Basically I went down the ‘Death Road’, the world’s most dangerous road, with some other gringos,” he said, not wanting to be named. “There were some folks from the US embassy and USAID on the trip. I remember them having a discussion on the road down to [the city of] Coroico, talking about not wanting Evo to get into power. They said something along the lines of, ‘We can’t let Evo get into power’.”

In fact, the officials went further. “There were two things that were said, one was ‘We can’t let Evo get into power’, and then something along the lines of, it struck me, it was harsher than that, it was something along the lines of, ‘We’ll have to take care of him’. It was ambiguous enough that it could be interpreted that we have to take him out, which I don’t think is what they meant. But when they said it I thought, ‘Whoa, I can’t believe they are saying this, they don’t even know me’.” The conversation continued as the group descended the mountain. “I’m assuming they thought I was sympathetic,” he said. “This was right in the middle of the protests and the president resigning, so a lot of the tourists had fled Bolivia, so perhaps they thought I was there because I was working for some sympathetic capacity, maybe working for an international corporation, or related to the embassy or something. It shocked me at the time. One, it seemed weird to have this conversation in public, because not everybody is sympathetic. And two it seemed like they were meddling in democracy, people that shouldn’t be involved in those things, the US embassy and USAID shouldn’t have anything to do with voting a president into power or not.”

But involved they were and would remain as Morales eventually did take power.

Much important work has been carried out on this topic by the investigative journalist Jeremy Bigwood in the period before MAS came to power, but his Freedom of Information Act requests stopped being answered when he asked for information about projects after the election of 2005. What Bigwood unearthed from before 2005 supports the testimony of the American student. Early on, the MAS party was fingered as a problem for the US that had to be dealt with. In a declassified July 2002 letter from the US embassy, a planned USAID political party reform project was outlined which aimed to “help build moderate, pro-democracy political parties that can serve as a counterweight to the radical [MAS]”. The next section, presumably more open on details, was redacted. A series of emails from USAID functionaries in Bolivia also detailed attempts to form relationships between the US government and indigenous groups in the coca growing region of the Chapare (the sector from which Morales emerged) and the eastern departments, aiming, as Bigwood explained, to “create a common USAID-guided front against … the MAS”. A few years into the MAS government, USAID made itself so unpopular in the Chapare region that its local leaders in 2008 suspended all projects funded by the agency. They said they would replace the funding with money from Chávez’s Venezuela. In Pando, the mayors signed a declaration in 2008 also expelling USAID. “No foreign program, least of all those from USAID, will solve our problems of poverty, physical integration, family prosperity and human development while we ourselves don’t decide the future,” it said.

I managed to procure documents that relate to the operations of projects since 2005, and they show a similar effort to weaken the power and popularity of the MAS government. The USAID tactic is not the overthrow of the government, but the slow transformation of Bolivian society from its participatory democracy to the type of democracy it had before: controlled by the US and good for investors. The Bolivian example is important because it provides a template of how USAID tries to control Latin American democracies that have “got out of control” and make them work “for the American people”, or American business interests.

Of course, USAID pitches itself as something completely different. In one cable from La Paz, the ambassador wrote: “We will continue to counter misunderstandings about USAID’s transparency and apolitical nature with reality.” But the reality is that the agency is not transparent or apolitical. And its own internal documents reveal as much. USAID maintains it is transparent with the money it invests in the country, but the Bolivian government claims large sums are being handed out without its knowledge, in contravention of usual aid etiquette. In the WikiLeaks cables, Morales tells the US he wants to start an “open registry to monitor aid”, but it was not supported by the US. The Bolivian government's estimate that 70 percent of aid money is unaccounted for appears overstated, but there is clear evidence that money was being spent without the knowledge of the government.

After one spate of criticism of USAID programs by Morales, the US ambassador noted that the country "cannot afford to risk USD120 million in assistance" from the agency (it works out as about $12 for every Bolivian). In another, it is noted: "we're spending about $90 million annually to further social and economic inclusion of Bolivia's historically marginalized indigenous groups and to support democratic institutions and processes, including decentralized governance." But an American journalist living in La Paz was present at an emergency meeting called by the US embassy to explain USAID's activities to foreign journalists, after another round of criticism. She was given a breakdown of spending by USAID. "This information was given to the small group of reporters gathered to use as background in stories," she told me. It outlined $16.8 million to USAID health programs, $19.2 million to integrated alternative development (alternative to coca production), $15.3 million to environmental and economic development programs, and $22 million to counter-narcotics. It added up to $73.3 million. But the ambassador had said in the cable that $120 million was invested in Bolivia per year. Where was the other $50 million going?

Internal evaluation documents give an indication of why some projects are best kept secret. I procured a host of documents on USAID "democracy promotion" programs in Bolivia in the period after the Morales government was elected. In one, outlining the goals and success of its "administration of justice" programs which have run in the country for 17 years – "among the largest in Latin America" – the group was explicit about where its money was going. "USAID/Bolivia programs include support to promote decentralization and municipal strengthening, support to Congress and political parties," it noted. There is no mention of which political parties it is "supporting" but this is candid language that the group and the US embassy have never used in public. (Morales has said that one mayor told him that USAID offered him $15,000 to $25,000 to oppose the president.) Decentralization in this context is also a euphemism for strengthening the opposition. One of USAID's central functions in Bolivia, ramped up since 2005, has been moving power away from central government, an effort which clearly chimes with the interests of the opposition in the east.

The justice project was conceived by USAID and Bolivian officials before the 2005 election that brought Evo Morales to power, and coordinators admit that “the personnel changes at the higher echelons” of the government “completely changed the atmosphere” in which it worked. The project hoped to open a training school for public defenders, but in mid-2007 it was suspended, “a prime example of the project being ‘overtaken by events’ that were completely outside the control of … USAID,” the evaluation noted. Internally, USAID was very critical of the Morales government on the subject, commenting that the Bar Associations of Bolivia have been “significantly weakened in the past few years” by the government’s policies. As is customary in projects of this kind, USAID paid subcontractors to carry out their functions, enhancing the already intricate web of institutions and clouding accountability. This project was run by Checchi and Company Consulting, set up in 1973 by economist and Democratic donor Vincent Checchi, which then brought on board the State University of New York and Partners of the Americas. One of the main ways USAID exerts influence – in this justice program but also through its other activities – is through training programs. These programs school young Bolivians in the “American way”.

In Sucre, I spoke to Ramiro Velasquez, an administrator in the local government offices who has worked for a USAID-funded program in the city. He said it was set up by a consultancy firm, funded by USAID, which has a subsidiary called Fortalecimiento Identidad de Democracia, or FIDEM. “They were looking for Bolivian operators in every department to do their work,” he said. “FIDEM was looking for an NGO to do the work and they would look for operators. They were in La Paz, Oruro, Potosi, and Sucre.” Mr Velasquez was asked to be an operator and told they wanted him to run courses on “democracy and participation”, a program eventually shut down by the Morales government. “This project was aimed at young people,” he said. “So to get young people, you had to get into universities and social movements and state institutions, even the church.” In the end 600 young people signed up. The courses took on two phases with the first workshops an opportunity to select around 20 young people to move on to La Paz for the second phase, carried out by FIDEM and another NGO. It was called “leadership training”, ostensibly to create a new generation of Bolivian leaders. But they had to have the right opinions. “They were teaching about democracy but not the type of democracy Evo and Bolivians have,” he said. “They were teaching them about representative democracy not participatory democracy … It was clearly to create leaders for the opposition.”

The cables from La Paz support such a conclusion. One visiting official went to a “civic education project funded by USAID through the NGO FIDEM and implemented by the Santa Cruz binational center". Its aim was to grow a "civic responsibility" arm in addition to its educational and cultural activities. "The project was reaching 21,000 (out of 150,000) residents in the marginalized neighbourhood 'Plan 3000' which is widely thought to be a MAS stronghold," it added, as if to explain why it was a good thing. The local residents were "enthusiastic" about the initiative, it noted. The same cable registered that Santa Cruz residents were "determined as much as possible to halt democratic backsliding. Their main request to us is to report accurately to Washington and the international community what is really happening in Bolivia." Vice President García Linera repeatedly told the US embassy he opposed democracy programs like FIDEM's, because they strive to "win the hearts and minds", presenting a vision of democracy that differs from the government's. It was true. FIDEM works in eight of the nine departments in Bolivia (three of which are governed by democratically elected MAS prefects) providing the kind of state-building training and technical assistance that USAID and other donors provide worldwide. The work – regional development planning, service delivery, financial planning and more – is technical and non-political. Its focus on departmental authorities was planned to weaken MAS, as was admitted in the cables: "MAS's goals [is] strengthening municipal governments to the detriment of departmental governments, thus weakening one of the MAS's main sources of opposition."

Also in Sucre, I talked to the MAS mayor, Verónica Berrios Vergara, who has been under concerted attack since taking her position in 2008. The city had been the venue of intense violent unrest in 2007 when the constituent assembly, given the responsibility of writing a new constitution, was placed there. In 2008, an opposition candidate was voted into the position of mayor in Sucre, but was disqualified because he was under a criminal charge. Ms Vergara took his place on a decision of the municipal council, causing an outbreak of violence and unrest. "Vested interests were behind the anger of the opposition and that led to us living the most difficult moment in Sucre in many years," she told me. She said various explosives were thrown at the mayor's headquarters and the dissidents tried to kill her on a number of occasions. "One of the questions we asked ourselves at the time is where these students got the money from, because they had the money to buy lots of explosives. They don't even usually have enough for rent and food, where did they get the money for them from?" She began to cry as she recounted her experiences at the sharp end of the turmoil in Bolivia. "I do fear that these groups are still waiting in the wings and at any point they could come out and do something to me," she said. "This is really about racism and also that this local government and national government are threatening business interests." She believed that USAID was behind the funding to some of these groups: "The fact that the Rózsa affair was taking place at the same time and there were question marks over USAID's work and suggestions they were trying to overthrow the government leads me to question where the money was coming from." At the time it sparked violence in the streets of the city, which Ms Vergara thinks USAID was behind. "They are in union with the opposition and media to stand in the way of the government's development plans in the country."

BUILDING ~~DEMOCRACY~~ AN INVESTOR-FRIENDLY BUSINESS CLIMATE

USAID had another reason to dislike President Morales and his government: they weren't good for business. The investment climate in Bolivia, which had been open for business to US transnationals for decades, was turning into a more hostile place. Their fears were shared by their natural allies among the oligarchy of European descent in the east of Bolivia. Both were increasingly scared of the economic program of the Morales government, which has provided a model for developing countries around the world: achieving high growth, as well as reductions in poverty, while part-nationalizing key industries. The Bolivian government, even when composed of ruthless dictators, maintained an investor-friendly business climate, which saw US mining companies, such as Coeur d'Alene Mines Corp, take advantage of the vast natural resources in the country as the Spanish had done before them. Bolivia's major exports to the United States are tin, gold, jewellery and wood products. For a long time, foreign investors were accorded national treatment, and foreign owners of companies enjoyed virtually no restriction. Foreign direct investment (FDI) in Bolivia grew to $7 billion in stock during 1996–2002, nearly all of which went to the business interests in the east.

Concern about nationalization crops up frequently in the cables from La Paz. "There is … rampant speculation about President Morales' traditional May 1st speech, in which he is expected by many to announce nationalization of companies based in Santa Cruz, potentially including Cotas or food industries," one reads. "If the latter, many expect Branko Marinkovic's cooking oil and other companies to be taken in the name of 'food security'." The cables from La Paz do not pull punches when outlining their opposition to the economic thinking of the MAS government. One advisor to Morales, an economics professor is, one cable notes, “steeped in outdated socialist economic theories and has yet to accept the practical realities of a globalized economy”. It adds that he “may be beginning to understand the real impact of free trade on job creation”, but, unforgivably, “he appears to believe that markets in Venezuela and China serve as alternatives to US markets. He has told Bolivian exporters to seek markets outside the United States, unconvinced that the US is crucial to their trade.” It notes that he recently returned from Venezuela after negotiating an agreement to buy Bolivian soy. “Additionally, he has regularly antagonized other businesses, telling them that the President’s Dignity Tariff, a new lower price meant to provide cheap electricity to Bolivians is a done deal, remarking that the private sector should either get on board or suffer.”

USAID had a plan to deal with this. One of the most important components of the justice project is “promotion of legal security”, through which “it was hoped that the business and investment climate in Bolivia would be improved”. The principal donor for this purpose was USAID and the project was budgeted $4.8 million over five years. It chimed with the sentiment in cables from La Paz, one of which noted, the “key areas of concern in Bolivia currently are democracy, narcotics, and protection for US investments” (my emphasis). The justice project sought “reforms in the commercial and administrative law areas” as well as “business organization assistance and training”. For this purpose, USAID funding would help develop a civil, commercial and administrative law curriculum for law schools in Bolivia. In a sign of the penetration of USAID into the highest echelons of the justice system, USAID and the Bolivian Supreme Court jointly published a document called Civil and Commercial Justice in Bolivia: Diagnosis and Recommendations for Change, which urged the creation of a specialized commercial law jurisdiction. It would “enhance the investment climate of Bolivia”, while the “establishment of a good business climate is essential to attracting investment” and will “maintain and improve its competitiveness”. It noted: “This component was important to the overall success of the … project due to the fact that it enlisted enthusiastic support from many private sector actors, while also furthering the goal of improving the investment and business climate in Bolivia.” The agency worked with its “partner organization”, the National Chamber of Commerce, in order to replicate and strengthen arbitration centers through local chambers of commerce (big donors to civic committees). “If Bolivia wants to attract foreign investment … then it will need legal security for investors," it noted. "Should there be an opportunity to continue the work in this area, it would be of high importance for the development of Bolivia." Their natural allies in this task were organizations like CAINCO, a business confederation in Santa Cruz. In the aftermath of the Rózsa shoot-out, another suspect, Alejandro Melgar, who was a key figure in CAINCO, fled the country. Eduardo Paz, the president of CAINCO, was also an investor in the Santa Cruz civic committee. One cable noted that "The main impact [of nationalization] has been to halt new investment in the [energy] sector, which Bolivia needs to meet domestic demand and fulfil contractual obligations to Brazil and Argentina." It added that "[as] a political measure, however, the 'nationalization' remains wildly popular." It was also successful. In June 2011, Standard & Poor's, the rating agency, raised Bolivia's credit ratings by one notch, praising President Evo Morales' "prudent" macroeconomic policies which allowed for a steady decline in the country's debt ratios.

The truth was that the US embassy was fearful for US mining investments, despite high-level Bolivian officials giving "repeated assurances that the Morales administration will respect existing US mining interests".

Threats that the Bolivian government would nationalize the mining industry – including taking over a smelter owned by Swiss company Glencore (which had been sold by ex-president Goni) – scared them. "We continue to urge the [Government of Bolivia] to respect existing mining concessions and to limit tax and royalty hikes," one cable noted. In other words, create a good "business climate" at the expense of the population. The US embassy viewed the Morales administration as contrary to its interests. "Strengthening and supporting democracy in Bolivia is our mission's primary concern," notes another cable. But in the next line it says: "Although the ruling MAS party and President Evo Morales were elected with a clear majority in fair and open elections, their actions since assuming power have often displayed anti-democratic tendencies." Elsewhere the cables note the "overwhelming victory" of MAS in elections. Despite this, the US called Morales a "leader with strong anti-democratic tendencies" who "manipulates the media". His closest advisors were compared to "back alley thugs".

In fact, the democratic credentials and popular mandate of the MAS government are among the most stellar in the world. First elected to the presidency in December 2005 by 54 percent of the popular vote, nearly double the 29 percent of his nearest rival, Morales was re-elected in December 2009 by 67 percent of the public vote, more than double the percentage won by his nearest opponent, Manfred Reyes Villa. In between these landslides, Morales won the recall referendum called in the face of the “autonomy movement” in August 2008 with 67 percent of the public voting for him to be returned. Just five months later, in January 2009, Morales won the constitutional referendum with 61 percent voting in favor, to 39 percent against. In 2014, he won yet another landslide. But the embassy was disparaging of these achievements, saying Morales was “like a struggling student in the areas of economics and international relations decision-making”. It also noted his apparent desire to become a dictator: “[As] an admirer of Cuban President Fidel Castro and Venezuelan President Hugo Chávez, Morales probably is drawn by the longevity of their time in power and seeks to emulate their ‘success’.” It was rubbish. The referendum in 2009 stipulated a two-term limit for the presidency. On the occasion of a foreign dignitary visiting, the ambassador pushed him “to encourage Morales to follow a democratic path”, alongside, of course, pushing him “to respect US mining interests to take advantage of free trade”.

The cables are full of fear about US investments. “One US investment which is vulnerable is San Cristobal mine, which is 65 percent owned by Apex Silver,” said one cable. “San Cristobal would be particularly hard-hit by a bill currently in Congress, which would increase mining taxes. Although the Bolivian government claims to want a fifty-fifty split of profits, the proposed tax increases actually result in, on average, a 60 percent government take of profits.” Although fantastically rich in silver and other mineral wealth, in the past the Bolivian people had never benefitted and stayed poor.

TRADING BRIBES

The US was also using trade deals as leverage in trying to get MAS to change its economic outlook. In September 2008, President Bush suspended the crucial trade preferences that Bolivia enjoyed – alongside Colombia, Ecuador and Peru – under the Andean Trade Promotion and Drug Eradication Act (ATPDEA). The country has lost millions of dollars in exports because of this punitive action. The ostensible reason was Bolivia’s uncooperative attitude to coca eradication in the country, but political and economic motives were thought to be highly relevant. A Reuters article written a few weeks afterward noted that “the decision came one day after five leading US business groups urged the Bush administration and Congress to consider ending trade benefits for both Bolivia and Ecuador because of what they described as inadequate protections for foreign investors in both countries".[4] The next month, in November, President Morales announced that the DEA would be expelled from the country. For decades, hundreds of DEA agents swarmed the northern Pando and Beni regions, destroying coca crops and, in the process, becoming implicated in massacres of the indigenous cocaleros. Largely given a free rein to carry out military operations or eradication by successive governments eager to please their masters, the former cocalero Morales wasn't so easy to convince. He charged that the DEA was carrying out "political espionage", and "financing criminal groups so that they could act against authorities, even the president".[5]

The goal of the DEA, one cable noted, "is to provide assistance to achieve US goals while keeping the [government of Bolivia] out in front". In 2008, Morales suspended DEA operations in Bolivia and expelled its 37 agents in the country. He named Steven Faucette, the regional agent of the DEA in Santa Cruz, as a spy, saying that he had made trips to cities in the media luna provinces of Beni and Pando with the objective of financing the civic committees which were committed to carrying out a "civic coup". The US was also using its aid as leverage to keep the DEA in Bolivia. "The Ambassador suggested that if eradication is to be stopped and USG involvement in the Chapare ended … we could begin shutting off our multi-million dollar assistance programs now," one cable noted. Many had long said that the DEA was acting as a front for the CIA in Bolivia. (The agency refused my request for information through the Freedom of Information Act, as did the National Security Agency.) The cables are full of criticism of Morales for failing to heed the US's call for areas it specified to be cleared of coca. It also called the EU effort "relatively modest and narrowly-focused".

But the US preoccupation with eradication in Bolivia, evidenced in the cables, is strange. According to one cable, the DEA estimated that "less than one percent of cocaine seized in the US can be chemically traced back to Bolivia". One percent. The US was also alone in blocking a UN resolution on making the coca leaf sacred in 2011. The tension surfaced even though the Morales government was being largely compliant. The cables present successes like 133 factories being raided in El Alto during the first 10 months of 2008. During the first full year of Morales's tenure, the amount of coca grown in Bolivia increased around 5 percent. In Colombia, the US ally, it jumped 27 percent in the same period, according to UN statistics.

The opposition I talked to, interestingly, were all in support of the DEA. The spokesperson for the SCCC said that during his time as a journalist working on the topic of narco-trafficking, he saw the DEA and the US embassy dealing with the issue properly: “They were teaching us about how the drugs workers work, how they buy drugs, it helped us.” Another vital US agency which works in Bolivia is the National Endowment for Democracy (NED), created by President Ronald Reagan in 1983 to “promote democracy”, but with a history of doing the opposite. In Bolivia it has focused on potentially recalcitrant indigenous areas, promoting the “American way” to the young. I obtained the proposals for various Bolivian projects granted money by the NED. The tactic of “training civil society” to gain a stranglehold on communities around Bolivia was exactly the same as that used by USAID projects. One project, Observancia, which ran from 2008 to 2009 and cost $54,664, was typical. It worked in eight municipalities in the country and helped in the “training of municipal functionaries and civil society”. The aim was to create future “municipal candidates” who would be “inserted into government programmes”. Another project, from 2006 to 2007 and costing $48,000, focused on Uriondo, Tarija, which sits in the media luna opposition stronghold. The grant was given at a politically tumultuous time. The report mentioned that the area of Tarija has the largest hydrocarbon deposits in the country, and the project wants “to increase the capacity” and “strengthen local government” of Uriondo, particularly by improving how the media communicates with the locals. Other projects look to “encourage political citizenship among young people”.

In one project in Totora, Cochabamba, the proposal notes that the population are mostly Quechua speaking and a lot more “politicized” than in Uriondo, adding that “there exists … an obstinate opposition to what they term as ‘neoliberal’, and they reject any advances from such parties”. Finally, it noted that the people of Totora organize themselves through a model of “corporativism” – the imposition of “a logic of the majoritarianism”, which rejects a form of democracy respectful of any differences. “This prompts us to consider that in the future we should include democratic values, in all sectors of society, not just as a citizen’s exercise when voting for their electoral representatives, but also with the logical respect that democracy has in other contemporary global societies,” the proposal noted. But the fact that the people of Totora organize themselves into collectives and make decisions collectively is common among indigenous groups throughout the country. The organization writing the proposal, however, concluded that this is in fact undemocratic and that they should introduce programs that demonstrate how undemocratic this form of democracy is compared with “other global societies”.

Another project called for better election monitoring. It suggested “revising the referendum votes for 2008 and 2009, where, in some regions, participation is registered at 100 percent and where the vote in favor of President Morales is of a similar percentage, something which does not have antecedents”. This accusation is questionable because in many departments people vote collectively – a tradition within many indigenous groups.

One project awarded $36,450 to the Bolivian National Press Association. Its ostensible aim was to defend freedom of expression “through the supervision and documentation of violations and threats against journalists” and “improve the professionalism and impartiality of Bolivian journalists”. However, its focus is trained on the government, in keeping with US embassy fears about Venezuelan influence. “The [National Press Association of Bolivia] denounces that the action the government of Morales has taken, something which has never happened under a democratic government, total control of the National Company of Bolivian Television (ENTB), when he integrated the directors with state ministers.” In another project, in Totora, it was noted that they were “expecting – in the coming months – the installation of a community radio transmitter, financed by the Venezuelan government, which forms part of a communications network which that regime has been promoting”. A later section called 2008 “the worst year for freedom of expression since the return to democracy” with “one dead and over a hundred attacks”. The Santa Cruz UJC and its allies committed a number of these attacks. In one case: “A police officer sprayed pepper spray at a journalist who approached the Vice President of the Santa Cruz Youth Union.” The NED criticized Evo Morales for denouncing La Razon newspaper, even though coverage of the president Morales in that newspaper has been overtly racist for years, with racist caricatures and racist commentary.

VERY MEASURED

As in smaller countries in the region, such as Haiti, the US embassy in Bolivia wielded huge power through the second half of the 20th century, often more than the sovereign government itself. The US embassy in La Paz is the second largest in Latin America (slightly smaller than in Brazil), despite the country having a population of just 9 million people. Through the last 50 years, the US had supported coups to get "their" dictators in place (Hugo Banzer), lent public relations specialists to get "their" presidents in place when democracy returned (Goni), and sent their brightest economists to "restructure" the economy in their image (Jeffrey Sachs). Now, the US provides sanctuary for "their" presidents wanted for crimes against humanity (Goni, again). But such a situation could give rise to complacency. And the election of the democratic socialist government of MAS in Bolivia marked the first time the country threatened to break free of US control. As such, relationships with ambassadors from the US became increasingly strained as the power dynamic switched around, and the sovereign government issued orders to the embassy, not the other way around. Maria Beatriz Souviron, Bolivian ambassador to the UK, told me: "The US ambassador before Morales had a lot of influence over the politics in our country, even pushing to take domestic decisions at some points." She added: "We want some sovereignty in our country and to make our own decisions. And of course the former ambassador [Goldberg] was involved with the opposition."

The MAS government accused ambassador Philip Goldberg of "subversive actions" which included a "disinformation campaign" in the lead-up to the recall referendum, as he tried to unite the opposition. In late 2007, the US embassy began moving openly to meet with the right-wing opposition in the media luna. Ambassador Goldberg was photographed in Santa Cruz with a leading business magnate who backed the autonomy movement, and a well-known Colombian narco-trafficker who had been detained by the local police. Morales, in revealing the photo, said the trafficker was linked to right-wing paramilitary organizations in Colombia. In response, the US embassy asserted that it couldn't vet everyone who appeared in a photo with the ambassador. Goldberg was expelled because of his meetings with opposition figures at the most on-edge period of the battle with the MAS government. In 2008, he was photographed having a secret meeting with opposition governor Rubén Costas. The US embassy liked Costas. In one cable it was noted: "Costas' willingness to work with the United States would make him a solid democratic partner." It also praised his "politically savvy use of the media to advance the interests of the media luna".

This government anger at US embassy interference culminated in September 2009 when ambassador Goldberg was expelled from the country. He has still not been replaced, the US embassy having to make do with the diplomatic downgrade of a chargé d'affaires. The US retaliated by expelling the Bolivian ambassador to Washington. “The US embassy is historically used to calling the shots in Bolivia, violating our sovereignty, treating us like a banana republic,” said Gustavo Guzman, the ambassador who was expelled from Washington. Goldberg had an interesting history, which made him a curious appointment by President George W. Bush in October 2006. Between 1994 and 1996 he had served as State Department desk officer for Bosnia and as special assistant to the late Richard Holbrooke, who had been instrumental in brokering the Dayton Accords and then the NATO military campaign against Serbia in 1999. From 2004 to 2006, Goldberg served as chief of mission in Pristina, Kosovo. In other words, he was used to dealing with countries that were breaking up into their constituent parts.

The leaders of the Santa Cruz Civic Committee certainly liked him. “My overall impression of Goldberg is that he was very measured politically,” said its vice president. “Compared to the two ambassadors that preceded. They were very openly political, they got involved a great deal, and compared to them Goldberg was measured.” The US embassy had been overtly hostile to Morales from the start, and the previous two ambassadors had openly tried to halt his rise to power. In 2002, when Morales narrowly lost his first presidential bid, US ambassador Manuel Rocha, the first Bush appointment, openly campaigned against him, threatening: “If you elect those who want Bolivia to become a major cocaine exporter again, this will endanger the future of US assistance to Bolivia.” In 2003, the second Bush appointment, David N. Greenlee, was put in place, and he had a long history with Bolivia. He served in the Peace Corps in Bolivia, 1965–67, and met his wife in the country. Later he served as a political officer at the US embassy in La Paz, 1977–79, dealing with issues, one think-tank noted, such as communism, military coups and Operation Condor, the continent-wide terror network set up by General Pinochet with the help of the US government. He returned as deputy chief of mission, 1987–89. When back as ambassador, Greenlee openly tried to scupper MAS’s ascent. In March 2003, for example, he sent a letter to Carlos Mesa, then president, alleging, falsely, that MAS was planning a coup in the summer. The MAS government hoped that things would change with President Obama’s election, but MAS officials say it has been no different. In fact, President Obama is now thought to have deployed special operations forces to Bolivia, while he supported the illegitimate post-coup election in Honduras. “President Obama lied to Latin America when he told us in Trinidad and Tobago that there are not senior and junior partners,” said President Morales in 2009.[6]

While in La Paz I arranged an interview with the US chargé d'affaires, John S. Creamer, who has served in embassies in Nicaragua, Argentina and Colombia. I was not allowed to record the interview, but took notes. "The Bush administration took a heavy toll on perceptions of the US, that's an empirical fact," he said. He denied knowing of the various foundations – HRF and UnoAmerica – but is "sceptical" they were involved in the Rózsa plot. It became clear later that the US embassy is aware of these groups, and is being briefed by them. Mr Creamer told me there was "growing opposition" from within MAS against the leadership, an interesting observation, as it is a strategy that the government itself is increasingly wary of. "Evo is now scared that the new tactic is the opposition infiltrating the government and MAS, in order to take power from within," Mr Mendoza, the Sucre senator, had told me. The embassy is obviously still in close contact with the radical elements in the east, as Mr Creamer defends the violence of the UJC and other radical opposition elements, arguing self-defense. "It's natural to defend yourself," he said, as we finish.

The international community have also been accused of supporting the break-up of the country. I talked to the British ambassador, Nigel Baker, in La Paz, who seemed to agree with the autonomists. "I think the long-term destiny for Bolivia ... is some form of federalist structure," he said. "The topography of the country, the different character of different peoples in different parts of the country, different economic structures, all work in favor in Bolivia of greater autonomy." He thought the US had entirely benign intentions: "I think historical record will show that the US was operating correctly in Bolivia and trying to work with all political groups, people of all political colors, to work with and strengthen Bolivian democracy." The WikiLeaks cables reveal that opposition politicians were openly approaching the US embassy for support in elections. One opposition politician "stands out as a potential national opposition leader," one cable noted, before adding that in a meeting with embassy officers he had "privately expressed his interest in obtaining US support to run for the presidency".

One the major concerns for the US after Morales came to power was Bolivia moving out of its traditional sphere of influence and making alliances and economic deals with other countries: thumbing its nose at its traditional patron. Among the people consulted by USAID for one its projects was Eduardo Rodríguez Veltzé, a former president of Bolivia who controversially decommissioned the country's only air-defense system, purchased from China, putting Bolivia under the basic military control of the US. It was people like this the US was used to dealing with. But Morales no longer countenanced such servility. At the same time, China embraced the MAS government openly (largely because of the lithium reserves, no doubt), and did not seem as intent to undermine the democratically elected government as the US was. They also provided an alternative source of investment, worrying US planners. And it wasn't just China. In 2008, it was announced that Bolivia had signed a deal with state-owned Russian gas company Gazprom to explore and produce natural gas in the country. State-owned oil and gas company, YPFB, which was nationalized by the MAS government, signed the deal to exploit South America's second-largest reserves, concentrated in the southeast.

Bolivia also announced more military purchases from China and Russia, after the US blocked Bolivian purchases of Czech aircraft. Most worryingly for the US, Venezuela and Cuba were also increasing their presence, a fear constantly discussed in the cables. One cable from La Paz noted: "Cuban and Venezuelan advice, interference, and assistance continue to be a serious concern." The concern is listed as "Cuban doctors and newly inaugurated hospitals bring medical care to isolated communities", while Venezuela provided micro-credit financing to small businesses. Unlike USAID, of course, "Venezuelan funding is pouring into the country with no transparency or accountability, further damaging the democratic process." Venezuelan funding for the media was a particular "issue of concern", which, we have seen, was being fought as a proxy war through the NED's programs. One cable worried "that media will be sold without public knowledge, changing the opinion-leader landscape in the country", i.e. the anti-Morales bias. The cable even noted that the main newspaper, La Razon, has a "generally anti-[government of Bolivia] stance".

In February 2008, a story broke about a Fulbright scholar in Bolivia who had been asked to spy on Cubans and Venezuelans in the country. John Alexander van Schaick said that he was told by regional security officer Vincent Cooper at the US embassy "to provide the names, addresses and activities of any Venezuelan or Cuban doctors or field workers" he came across while he was in Bolivia.[7] His account was supported by similar testimony from Peace Corps members and staff who were all told by Mr Cooper to gather information on Cuban and Venezuelan nationals. Three days after the story broke, it was announced that Mr Cooper would not be returning to Bolivia. Morales called it the "expulsion" of a "man who conducted North American espionage", an accusation with some justice. Many believed it was the tip of the iceberg. “We had a mutual friend, and [van Schaick] approached me in December 2007,” Jean Friedman-Rudovsky, the American journalist living in La Paz who broke the story, told me. “It took a couple months to get a hold on the Peace Corps angle, I had heard lots of rumors, but hadn’t been able to substantiate them. The Peace Corps duty director went on record at the time saying Vincent Cooper came and gave these inappropriate instructions to the group.”

The volunteers were in a moral quandary about what to do. “Some kids were worried about the message coming from the embassy, one girl was planning on living with a Cuban family; she wondered if she would have to collect information on them,” said Friedman-Rudovsky. The director and the Peace Corps staff complained to the US embassy, remonstrating that they couldn’t act like an intelligence service for the US government. Four months later, however, van Schaick received the same instructions. “In general, not much has changed in terms of US-Bolivia since Obama came into power,” said Friedman-Rudovsky. The ambassador never admitted it had happened; he merely commented that if these instructions had been given, it went against US policy. But it was the first ironclad proof of the US using its agencies to gather information in the country. “Every time Morales speaks on US-Bolivian relations in terms of US meddling in Bolivian affairs, he refers to this story, it’s the only story with definitive proof of spying,” said Friedman-Rudovsky. In the aftermath, the Bolivian foreign minister asked the US to establish exchange programs because the current US programs “are not transparent and we are suspicious when scholarship students are asked to spy on us”. The US did not comply.

Another controversy erupted in 2008 when a police unit called the Special Operations Command (COPES) was implicated in a domestic surveillance scandal after it was revealed that the unit had been used to collect intelligence on areas outside its remit of narco-trafficking. The unit was funded by the US, and was ultimately answerable to the US embassy. The idea that no one there knew what was going on is hard to countenance. It was disbanded soon after.

There had been a long lineage for this kind of subterfuge. In 1997 testimony to Congress, James Milford, deputy administrator of the DEA, said: “The Intelligence and Special Operations Group (GIOE) is one of Bolivia’s most successful drug enforcement programs. It was developed four years ago as a result of cooperation between DEA and the Bolivian National Police [and was] responsible for handling sensitive intelligence and conducting the most important complex criminal investigations in Bolivia."

The US had long-established law enforcement agencies in Bolivia operating under the guise of drug enforcement; these agencies could be used for different purposes, and no one could actually verify whether they were gathering intelligence. Later, President Morales alleged that the CIA had tried to infiltrate state-run oil firm YPFB through marketing director Rodrigo Carrasco, who had attended a number of "training courses" in the US, which involved intelligence, security and politics. Carrasco had been a member of COPES. In the aftermath, the US embassy still complained that the "threat to expel the CIA from Bolivia means that any one of us can be (mis)identified as a spy and kicked out should we do – or be falsely accused of doing – anything that displeases Evo". Spying was definitely taking place on a large scale. All through the cables there are allusions to "sensitive reporting" which is a euphemism for spying. One cable noted that a MAS official whom "many political analysts" consider "a radical" is "railroading controversial legislative measures", before adding: "Sensitive reporting indicates that Ramirez may be very vulnerable on corruption and human smuggling charges."

BEING A SOFTY

When in Sucre, I talked to Enrique Cortes, a professor at one of the universities in the city and a specialist in US-Bolivian relations. "Bolivia is still dependent," he said. "This position of dependency was from the beginnings of when the nation was created, we were always dependent on an international monetary system lately led by the US." He added: "There was a triangular relationship between the state, oligarchs and transnational organizations and these oligarchs responded to international money. When they lose power they use force to stop history from developing. Within that fits Rózsa-Flores and the Pando massacre, and Leopoldo." The move to democracy, he said, may not be permanent, and could be scuppered. "There was the fascist process, dictatorship, but it's not over. With Carter began the phase of controllable democracies, but now we think a new phase has opened. And this new phase is characterized by vital resources, and wanting control over these vital resources. So that's the central conflict with the US." He thought that the US could still put a brake on the process initiated by MAS to greater independence. "A coup is not the only way to put brakes on this.

History shows there are other strategies, such as penetrating the popular organizations, and social movements using agencies like USAID." But coups have been the traditional US tactic in the country.

Declassified documents released in 2008 exposed US financial and political support for the military coup led by right-wing general Hugo Banzer in 1971, who ruled until 1978 (before making a comeback, democratically elected this time, from 1997 to 2001). The State Department at the time denied supporting the three-day coup that left 110 dead and hundreds more wounded. Banzer's dictatorship was a nightmare for organized labor and anyone who disagreed with his restructuring of the economy in the interests of foreign capital. He arrested 14,000 Bolivians without due process, and 8,000 more were tortured. Some 200 people were thought to have disappeared. Banzer had been trained at the notorious School of the Americas in Panama (Fort Gulick) and at Fort Hood in Texas, before becoming a military attaché in Washington. The declassified documents show that the Nixon administration had signed off $410,000 to be made available for politicians and military officers willing to take out the left-leaning dictator Juan José Torres. At a meeting in July 1971, the 40 Committee – chaired by the then Secretary of State Henry Kissinger and overseeing covert operations around the world – discussion focused on giving this money to opposition figures who, the understanding was, would undertake a coup. Under-Secretary of State Alexis Johnson said: "What we are actually organizing is a coup in itself, isn't it?" The plan was approved and the same day that the coup began in Santa Cruz, Bolivia, a National Security Council staffer reported to Kissinger that the CIA had transferred money to two high-ranking members of the opposition.

A month earlier, Nixon and Kissinger had discussed the possibilities for dealing with the Bolivian leader who was leaning too far left.

Kissinger: We are having a major problem in Bolivia, too. And –

Nixon: I got that. Connally mentioned that. What do you want to do about that?

Kissinger: I've told [CIA Deputy Director of Plans, Thomas] Karamessines to crank up an operation, post-haste. Even the Ambassador there, who's been a softy, is now saying that we must start playing with the military there or the thing is going to go down the drain.

Nixon: Yeah.

Kissinger: That's due in on Monday.

Nixon: What does Karamessines think we need? A coup?

Kissinger: We'll see what we can, whether – in what context. They're going to squeeze us out in another two months. They've already gotten rid of the Peace Corps, which is an asset, but now they want to get rid of [US Information Agency] and military people. And I don't know whether we can even think of a coup, but we have to find out what the lay of the land is there.[8]

Fast-forward 40 years and not much had changed. The WikiLeaks cables reveal that as the political turmoil was peaking, the US embassy was contemplating the eventuality of a military coup. One noted that "there are strong indications the military is split and could be reticent to follow orders". Another complained that: "A strong commitment to institutionalism would require a rock-solid constitutional argument before commanders would participate in any action that could be considered 'political'." There is no doubt that these feelings were being communicated from within the military to the US embassy. "[Armed Forces Commander General Wilfredo] Vargas had been, publicly and privately, a supporter of US-Bolivian military relations," one cable noted. "Although he continues to cooperate enthusiastically with us at a working level, even giving awards to three [Military Group] officers December 13 his public comments in the last few months have irritated Bolivian military officers and raised eyebrows within the Embassy." (The Military Group is part of the US Department of Defense.) But there were reasons for optimism. "Evo does not have a network of personal friends within the military (although his Presidency Minister Juan Quintana does)," one cable noted. "[T]he military is leery of taking on any role considered remotely political. The military fears above all a repeat of the bloody military-civilian conflicts in El Alto in 2003, which brought down the Goni government." The Goni government – supported by the US, where he is now in exile.

Finally, we are told that Commander Vargas is too unreliable to count on. "Vargas remains an enigma," the cable noted. "Some commanders suspected, at least before his December 8 comments, that he might be sympathetic to a coup. He is widely characterized as an 'opportunist' ". The cable added wryly: "We cannot expect him to stand behind his assurances."

In a piece of bare-faced historical revisionism, USAID said that between 1985 and 2003 "fundamental economic and political rules of the game were liberalized", adding, "organizations with a pluralistic view of democracy grew and flourished – especially in response to the availability of donor assistance". It noted that, "Corporatist civil society organizations dominated citizen participation in the public sphere between 1952 and 1985", which was the moment when the Bolivian government "began to change the direction of Bolivia's economic policies and democratic practices". Soon, as the fairytale went, "Pluralistic civil society then emerged, and was active – especially at the level of communities." What that period, in fact, describes is the "Shock Doctrining" of the Bolivian economy and wider society. President Víctor Paz Estenssoro, who had been a supporter of US-backed dictator Hugo Banzer, ruled from 1985 to 1989 and instituted a neoliberal recipe to help put the staggering economy back on its feet. He repressed labor unions, sacked 30,000 miners, and privatized most of the state-owned companies. The broken society he and his successor Goni created would provide fertile ground for the Morales administration to grow in.

As its framework for the definition of civil society, USAID uses the work of Larry Diamond, a professor at Stanford University and fellow at the Hoover Institution where he coordinates the project on Democracy in Iran. He was a senior advisor on governance to the Coalition Provisional Authority in Iraq and the founding co-editor of the National Endowment for Democracy's Journal of Democracy. He has worked for the State Department, World Bank and USAID. In other words, the perfect intellectual to design democracy in Bolivia.

US weapons and military had been found in Bolivia. In June 2007, Donna Thi Dinh, a 20-year-old American woman, was detained at La Paz airport after arriving on a flight from Miami. The authorities found 500 rounds of .45-caliber ammunition in her luggage. Ms Thi had initially claimed to customs that she was carrying cheese. She was met at the airport by the wife of a military liaison at the US embassy in La Paz. US ambassador Philip Goldberg said that the bullets were for training and sport shooting and she did not realize that she had to declare them. This might be true, but at the very least it shows the impunity with which Americans felt they could act in Bolivia. Bolivia's director of migration, Magaly Zegarra, noted: "the fact that a North American citizen, related to the embassy, is carrying ammunition on a North American aircraft coming from Miami, a city where terrorists from all over Latin America are protected by the government, especially their teacher, as [Luis] Posada is called by the terrorists, and make a mockery of all [justice] mechanisms, is questionable."[9] In another incident, in March 2006, Triston Jay Amero, a 25-year-old from California, set off 300 kilos of dynamite at two hotels in La Paz. He was carrying 15 different identity documents. Two years later, security services uncovered the presence of two fake American journalists photographing presidential vehicles.

The US military itself was also using Bolivia as a base. In June 2010, it was revealed that the Obama administration was expanding the role of US special operations forces around the world in a “secret war” to combat al-Qaeda, with the Washington Post noting that they were placed in 60 to 75 countries, with about 4,000 personnel available in countries aside from Iraq and Afghanistan. Jeremy Scahill reported in The Nation, based on “well-placed special operations sources”, that Bolivia was one of those countries. The role of the joint special operations command forces was to launch “pre-emptive or retaliatory strikes”, but this was ambiguous. “While some of the special forces missions are centered around training of allied forces, often that line is blurred. In some cases, ‘training’ is used as a cover for unilateral, direct action,” Scahill wrote. A special forces source told him: “It’s often done under the auspices of training so that they can go anywhere. It’s brilliant. It is essentially what we did in the 60s,” adding, “Remember the ‘training mission’ in Vietnam? That’s how it morphs.” US armed forces did occasionally pop up in Bolivia. In 2008, just weeks before the raid on Hotel Las Americas, Iraq war veteran Lieutenant Commander Gregory Michel was arrested after he pulled a gun on a prostitute in Santa Cruz. The US embassy managed to secure his release on grounds of “diplomatic immunity”. The WikiLeaks cables also show that C-130s and helicopters owned by the Narcotics Affairs Section (NAS) at the US Embassy were being used to transport “eradicators and troops”. Elsewhere, the embassy noted allegations that the DEA, US military and Bolivian national police headed Bolivian anti-narcotics efforts “from a US military base” in the Cochabamba department. In reference to this, the cable noted: “The US supports Bolivian anti-narcotics efforts at the Chimore Airport and has offices there, but there are no US military bases per se in Bolivia.” Per se. The WikiLeaks cables reveal an embassy concerned about renewing “mil-mil” (military to military) cooperation and establishing a “Status of Forces” agreement. But the Bolivian government was reticent about signing up – also refusing to ratify an “Article 98” which excuses US nationals from the jurisdiction of the International Criminal Court, a common demand made by the US, a rogue nation intent on not abiding by international law.

But, as the US knows, Bolivia is still captive to the American military. A cable noted: “Bolivia has not spent any money on ammunition in two years, and the capacity to quickly move troops remains in doubt.”

SAYING THANK YOU

In early 2006, a cable from La Paz noted “the billions of US dollars of assistance in the past few decades”, and said that the ambassador observed that the US government “would sometimes appreciate a good word or thanks” from President Morales. To this day, the Morales government and his party, MAS, have not “thanked” the US for its support, because since 2005, and before, that support has been designed to finish them, and by extension democracy, in Bolivia. In many ways, Bolivia is the most democratic country in the world now. When you walk around the country you sense the involvement of the citizenry in the politics of their local community as well as on a national level, in a way that is markedly absent in the US or UK. There is a simple formula for US foreign policy in Latin America and beyond: support democracy if the people vote the right way. If they don’t, and the political party threatens to upset the “natural” order of things and with it the business interests of America and other foreign companies, then a program of subversion and destabilization gets under way. This investigation is focused on Bolivia in the specifics, but the general patterns have been replicated from Venezuela to Ecuador, from Brazil to Peru.

Another cable noted: “Evo Morales’ election in December 2005 was a political earthquake in Bolivia, sweeping aside political expectations that have defined Bolivian politics for generations and at the same time breaking open fissures and offering up new possibilities.” It is these new possibilities that scare the US government, the threat of the “virus of a good example”, a government that can provide for its citizens while growing the economy. Even Bolivia’s admirable lead on climate change is dismissed by the US embassy as a “vehicle for raising [Morales’s] and Bolivia’s international political stature”. The US is slowly losing the ownership it has had over Bolivian society for decades. For the first time in living memory, the Bolivian people are deciding their own destiny according to their needs, ideas and hopes – not those of the US. For this reason, war has been declared on Bolivian democracy, alongside any other democracy that does not see its raison d’être as supporting US interests to the detriment of its own people. But it was not just the indigenous people of Latin America who were proving a problem for the racketeers. When the financial crisis hit, its own indigenous population stopped being so easy to exploit as well. The racket abroad meets the racket at home.

REINFORCEMENT

SAYING THANK YOU

In early 2006, a cable from La Paz noted “the billions of US dollars of assistance in the past few decades”, and said that the ambassador observed that the US government “would sometimes appreciate a good word or thanks” from President Morales. To this day, the Morales government and his party, MAS, have not “thanked” the US for its support, because since 2005, and before, that support has been designed to finish them, and by extension democracy, in Bolivia. In many ways, Bolivia is the most democratic country in the world now. When you walk around the country you sense the involvement of the citizenry in the politics of their local community as well as on a national level, in a way that is markedly absent in the US or UK. There is a simple formula for US foreign policy in Latin America and beyond: support democracy if the people vote the right way. If they don’t, and the political party threatens to upset the “natural” order of things and with it the business interests of America and other foreign companies, then a program of subversion and destabilization gets under way. This investigation is focused on Bolivia in the specifics, but the general patterns have been replicated from Venezuela to Ecuador, from Brazil to Peru.

Another cable noted: “Evo Morales’ election in December 2005 was a political earthquake in Bolivia, sweeping aside political expectations that have defined Bolivian politics for generations and at the same time breaking open fissures and offering up new possibilities.” It is these new possibilities that scare the US government, the threat of the “virus of a good example”, a government that can provide for its citizens while growing the economy. Even Bolivia’s admirable lead on climate change is dismissed by the US embassy as a “vehicle for raising [Morales’s] and Bolivia’s international political stature”. The US is slowly losing the ownership it has had over Bolivian society for decades. For the first time in living memory, the Bolivian people are deciding their own destiny according to their needs, ideas and hopes – not those of the US. For this reason, war has been declared on Bolivian democracy, alongside any other democracy that does not see its raison d’être as supporting US interests to the detriment of its own people. But it was not just the indigenous people of Latin America who were proving a problem for the racketeers. When the financial crisis hit, its own indigenous population stopped being so easy to exploit as well. The racket abroad meets the racket at home.

THE FIRST PEOPLES OF AMERICA AND THEIR LAND

OKLAHOMA

When I met them, as the fog of economic crisis engulfed the community, the Delaware Nation tribe had a simple strategy for creating jobs for the nearly two-thirds of its members who were destitute and unemployed: it wanted to manufacture lighting. The Native American community already distributed lighting so they knew the industry well; now they wanted to produce LED lights. Except they couldn't. No one would lend them the money they needed to get started. They weren't white and had no natural resources on their arid reservations, so the financial players, the racketeers who make everything in America move, turned away. It was just the latest stage in a centuries-old battle for basic dignity by America's First People against the usurpers and financial wizards who have kept them condemned to underdevelopment. They were still losing. "The economy has taken a complete dive," Kerry Holton, the eloquent president of the tribe, told me. "Banks won't take any risk whatsoever, unless you have twice as much in assets than what you are loaning they are not interested." This meant the rich could borrow, but the poor, no way.

The indigenous Lenape people were originally located across large swaths of the eastern coast of the modern-day United States, including parts of New Jersey, New York, Delaware and Pennsylvania, and theirs was the first tribe to sign a formal agreement with the newly established government in 1778. Over 200 years later, the same people – now part decimated, wholly displaced – are called the Delaware Nation, a white man's name given to the people who migrated from the west coast and ended up in Oklahoma. In the 21st century, they are still suffering from the barbarism of their conquerors, who no longer come in the form of land-grabbing British colonists, but modern-day moneymen. The tribe today is suffering majority unemployment, has incurred an insurmountable level of debt, and across the land they have inhabited for 150 years there is a pervasive hopelessness typical of indigenous communities being buffeted by the financial industry. But the Delaware Nation is run more efficiently than the institutions of the state that massacred their ancestors and now loves to preach about the "exceptional" nature of its democracy. They have a small governing council of six members, divided between elders and younger members of the community, who make the decisions.

The Delaware Nation have just one casino – the patronizing gift of the white establishment as it took their land – which they want to use as a stepping stone for other economic developments, including developing green energy. But the tribe has no chance of getting the financing to kick things off. "We can do some of it ourselves, but we need millions to start these things," said Mr Holton. "We realized pretty quickly that the banks are no help. We want to create some jobs, but the casinos don't do that. It does create some, but it's not enough". The Delaware Nation have already done a leveraged buyout of a company to take a majority stake, becoming one of the leading semiconductor lighting distribution networks in the US. Everything is in place to move into manufacturing. "We just need capital to get inventory and contracts. But that has been difficult. Even if we have contracts, we go to any financial institution and can't get lending based on that contract." The 1,500-strong tribe is just one of the many Native American victims of the freeze in credit markets in the aftermath of the financial crisis.

Like pretty much everything else negative that happens in the US, the lack of available funds has hit tribes – always seen as a risky investment because they tend to rely on a single revenue stream – more intensely than any other group. The aftermath of the financial crisis hit Native American economies hard as many rely on casinos for their revenue, one of the discretionary spending sectors that was hit hardest in the recession. For many tribes like the Delaware Nation, the revenue stream from the casino is their tax base. They use the funds in the same way as municipalities or states use their tax revenue, to develop social services and educational programs, for example. When the recession hit and the casino revenues went down, it meant cutting back on many of the most crucial welfare and social services.

THE BUBBLE

Many of the tribes were tempted in the credit bubble to expand their, often high-end, business ventures. The Mashantucket Pequots, who have maintained the same reservation in Connecticut since 1666, announced in April 2008 plans for a "breathtaking" new $700 million resort at its Foxwoods Resort Casino, which was already the largest in the world, along with a new Hilton.[1] Within the days of it opening that summer, Lehman Brothers collapsed and with it the global economy slumped. Soon after, the tribe was battling to pay back the highly leveraged debt it had incurred. In January 2010, it managed to reach an agreement with senior lenders to extend debt forbearance and restructuring of $2.3 billion in arrears. "It's the same old story," said Joseph Kalt, co-director of Harvard University's project on American Indian economic development. "A lot of cash flowing, tribes investing like mad and then getting hit by the recession."

But the economic challenges of tribal governments are broader than the recent recession. It has always been difficult to attract high-quality credit. Tribes lack the taxing power of local governments, a predicament that has been exacerbated by state budgetary pressures and revenue or tax disputes between governments. Tribal governments have only enjoyed self-governance since the 1970s, when the Gerald Ford and Richard Nixon administrations made strides on the issue. Although they existed before the US itself, in a modern sense they have only had 45 years of self-determination. This has left them open to exploitation by banks. "Any tribe's debt-managing policies have had relatively little time to refine government structures," said Jeffrey Carey, managing director and specialist in tribal finance at Bank of America Merrill Lynch. Many believe this has made them more susceptible to the worst banking practices.

There has also been an erosion of the monopoly protection in gambling they enjoyed, while the macroeconomic environment continues to be a challenge with the dependence on the limited asset class versus the broad tax base of a state or locality. They also have collateral limitations because, under Federal Trust status, their assets are held in trusts by the federal government, which limits their ability to access the bond or capital markets. Holton told me: "One of the things that the recession has done is woken us up to the fact that we can't do everything via casinos, we have to diversify so we can shore up those programs and make sure they are there when people need them. Everyone felt casinos were bulletproof but they aren't." "Diversification is now a theme for tribal economies," added Mr Carey. "There's more onus now on investing in infrastructure and services to citizens, alongside partnerships with non-tribal governments." In Alabama, the Poarch Creek Indians work with local government on a variety of issues, including police protection and roads. It is a model for cooperation between tribal and non-tribal that is gaining traction across the country.

To add insult to injury, in the midst of this uncertainty, President Barack Obama's administration decided to cut dramatically the Indian loan guarantee program, which backs tribal loans. For 2012 the program was slashed by nearly two-thirds to $3 million, down from the $8 million that was allocated in 2010. "The budget realities that we're in right now require some reductions," said Larry Echo Hawk, assistant secretary of the interior for Indian affairs. But it was all a lie. "The Obama administration has tried to make a difference, but it hasn't trickled down to the tribes: it sounds good in the press, but when you go to tribes, it hasn't been gainful," said Holton. The tribal economic development bonds are unusable for many tribes because they lack the infrastructure to do anything with them. "The irony is that banks are now starting to make loans again but the damage has been done and the Obama administration's proposed cuts will decimate the loan guarantee program," Gavin Clarkson, a professor at the University of Houston and the country's leading scholar on tribal finance, told me. "Indian country was given a test but the test was rigged."

Mr Obama's stimulus package included $2 billion in tax-exempt bond allocations for tribes. But the markets were so bad and the lending criteria so onerous that even though tribes had these allocations financial institutions effectively shut them out. "They were created for us, but you can't do anything with them," said Mr Holton. "They have been nothing more than paper." The loan guarantee program primarily served tribes that did not have access to capital markets. That is now nearly gone, for Washington proof that Native Americans cannot attract investment. But like the colonists before them who wrote contracts on land which they then reneged on, the banks have always seen the Indian tribes as a chance to make a quick buck, an expendable sponge to squeezed and let go when times get tough. For example, in 2011, the Securities and Exchange Commission (SEC) found that Wachovia bank had overpriced a tranche of collateralized debt obligations and sold them to the Zuni Indian tribe in New Mexico. The bank paid $11 million in penalties to the SEC, which caused the media to take note. But for those with knowledge of Indian economies it was nothing new. “The banks definitely take advantage of the tribes, especially if you have gaming,” Mr Holton said. “That’s what they want to attack; in the business world as a non-native, you get treated a lot differently to natives or members of tribes. They think they can get in your pocket, it’s very difficult, a lot of times it’s better to approach them and not tell them you are a tribe.”

The racketeers work to keep the poor world underdeveloped, and they do the same with the tribes within their own borders. “The large retail banks were happy to make oodles of money on the backs of tribes when they were financing casinos,” said Mr Holton. “But when it came to financing business or industry, things required for a functioning economy, it was always a challenge.” That is not a coincidence: building up the capacity of native communities to run their own affairs and not rely on handouts from the state could challenge their subservience to the system; this, of course, would not do. It’s a long story of financial savagery that has created this situation – there is nothing inevitable about it. Bank of America Merrill Lynch, meanwhile, estimated that more than $17 billion of tribal securities have been issued over the past decade as well as $25 billion of capital raised by tribal markets. But those statistics can be misleading as the bulk of this financing has gone to the select successful and thus creditworthy tribes. “The cutbacks disproportionately affect the tribes most in need, so it has been a big disappointment for Indian country to see it cut back just when they need it the most,” said Jeffrey Carey, managing director and specialist in tribal finance at Bank of America Merrill Lynch.

The effect of the financial crisis has not been even across tribes. It is possible to classify them broadly into three distinct groups. Casino tribes, whose economy revolves around that one business, saw their revenues drop precipitously, by more than 30 percent in many cases. In Florida, the Seminole tribe was celebrated when Bank of America Merrill Lynch helped them to buy Hard Rock International in a $965 million buyout in 2006. The Wall Street Journal lauded it on their front page, and the financial press beamed. But when the financial crisis struck, the situation took a turn for the worse and it ended in the long- serving tribal chief stepping down.

A second set of tribes was not so severely affected because they were recipients of lucrative government defense contracts that were maintained in the crisis. The Flathead reservation in Montana has a company called S&K Electronics which produces items such as cooling fans for military helmets used in Iraq and Afghanistan. In Nebraska, the largest tribe does field preparation for military equipment, putting together the packs that soldiers take into the field. “The manufacturing tribes have generally weathered the recession very well because overall government contracting has been resistant because of the wars,” said Joseph Kalt.

Lastly, there are the tribes that have 70 to 80 percent unemployment, which were so poor and starved of investment – without casinos or government contractors – that the recession did not make much of a difference. Starting in the 1990s, around the time the dotcom bubble was inflating, a number of financial firms became interested as tribes gained economic self-sufficiency after political self-determination in the 1970s. They also gained assets from natural resources or the 1988 Gaming Act. Now there was a quick buck to be made, the financial world woke up. Merrill Lynch has had accounts with tribes since the 1960s, while Wells Fargo and Bank of America worked with tribes on a more regional basis instead. Leading up to self-determination, many tribes received land settlements or other reparations, monies for land or natural resources, which became investable assets. That increased in the 2000s as 50–100 more tribes gained investable assets and enterprise levels that warranted more than local bank coverage. “I think tribes have been subject to predatory practices throughout the history of the US,” said Jeffrey Carey.

As government grew from self-determination, the tribes faced a number of challenges, including developing investment policies. They were inexperienced, while the financial sector saw a potential killing. “There is a learning curve for tribes and it has been a challenge for them,” added Carey. “I think there have been predatory practices for hundreds of years. I’m sure there’s still an element of that that continues and it’s not limited to financial institutions, its developers, land or natural resources.” There was a broad-based assault on tribes that initially was led by federal government. There are 565 tribes in the US, and most of them are still at or below the poverty level and/or experience high levels of unemployment.

NAOMA

The racketeers, once they had taken the land from the indigenous Americans, are now trying to destroy it in their efforts to produce even more capital, in an unending cycle of greed and gluttony. The emblem of this in modern-day US is the literal destruction of some of the country's most beautiful mountain formations, alongside the people living there, to unleash one of the world's dirtiest energy sources: coal. The fact that man-made global warming is a specter hanging over the human race does not concern corporations because it is an "externality" – something we all have to pay for, while they privatize the profit. Mountaintop removal mining (MTM) is a relatively new method of extraction which involves blasting the top off mountains to access the coal inside. It has become increasingly popular across Appalachia despite the damage it does to the health of those who live in nearby communities as well as the harm it does to the natural environment. But, of course, money talks. And it goes on, but not without a fight.

Vernon Haltom, 48 and a father of three, used to live in the small West Virginia town of Naoma, near the bottom of a mountaintop mine. He left in 2009 after five years, because, he said, the mine made life impossible. "One of the things you really notice is the blasting," he told me. "The companies detonate in Appalachia the equivalent of a Hiroshima bomb every week, in terms of the amount of explosives. It feels like an earthquake; sometimes you don't hear it, you just feel it." He has now become one of the outspoken fighters against the destruction of America's natural heritage, and was the co-founder of Coal River Mountain Watch. In the process he has put himself in danger – another reason he left Naoma was the death threats he said he received from Massey Energy, the huge company which is at the forefront of mountaintop removal mining in the area. He also complained of the dust the blasting was sending down on to the communities. "The real problem of blasting is dust, silica dust from rock, whatever elements have been isolated from the surface for hundreds of millions of years are put into the atmosphere. The nitrate and other blasting by-products that come down on communities where people live and breathe, that's something that the agencies are supposed to be regulating, but they refuse to do anything about it. They don't think it's an issue at all."

He recalled one episode when he was going home from work and walking past Marsh Fort, the local elementary school. In the sky above the school, the sun could be seen only dimly through the dust cloud. "The agency never bothered to come out and investigate," he told me, still angry years later.

A growing body of scientific studies has outlined the health impact on communities in the areas where mountaintop removal mining is being carried out. In July 2011, the peer-reviewed Journal of Community Health published a study which posited that among the 1.2 million people living in central Appalachian communities affected by mountaintop removal mining, there were an additional 60,000 cases of cancer directly related to the practice. In the previous month, a study by researchers at West Virginia University found higher rates of birth defects in Appalachian areas with mountaintop removal mining compared with non-mining areas. These include central nervous system and gastrointestinal defects.

The sad truth is that state agencies have been captured by the racket, and now work more for the companies than for the people they are meant to represent. Instead of acting on their powers to regulate the industry and enforce laws and regulations, they are merely the legitimizing tool through which big business operates. Corruption is built into the system in the form of revolving doors between the regulators and the companies. An inspector will spend a couple of years "regulating" then move on to a coal company without a bat of an eyelid. "We've had polls for years to show people are opposed to MTM, unfortunately politicians don't care what's right, they will be swayed more by wealthy companies that finance their campaigns rather than people," said Mr Haltom. On West Virginia election day, both the Democrat and the Republican love mountaintop removal mining, he said. "Given the financing that the coal industry does, they butter bread on both sides. It doesn't matter if you have a D or an R after your name, you should just have a C, for the Coal Party."

"There is an emerging body of science [about] health effects in communities effected by MTM," Melissa Waage, campaign director at the Natural Resources Defense Council, an environmental advocacy group, told me. "Two important studies in the past month show higher rates of birth defects and higher rates of cancer, and the activists have picked up on that and have brought that to Washington and said this is literally killing us and we're not going to take it."

Of course, the functionaries of the racket were busy legitimating it with the usual excuse for exploitation: investment. "Mountaintop mining helped the economics of Appalachian coal miners," said John Bridges, US coal analyst at JP Morgan. "It lowered cost and improved productivity in a competitive sector." So all the people whose kids are dying of cancer should be thankful. But he admits it's harder for these destroyers to go about their work now. "Now we have a situation where the easy opportunities have been mined and costs are going up. And environmental lobby is opposed to the method, so permits are much harder to come by." The coal companies themselves chime in, mirroring what corporate interests use around the world, as we have seen in Haiti: "but we bring jobs!"

"There is no question that the EPA [Environmental Protection Agency] is stymying job creation at a time when the US economy is struggling, and when jobs and the economy are the top concern of most Americans," said Deck Slone, vice-president of government relations at Arch Coal, one of the worst offenders. In 2010, the EPA elicited fury from coal companies and some local politicians when it tightened its guidance on the criteria for granting permits for mountaintop mining sites. It followed a move by the regulator to set aside 80 proposed mining projects for "enhanced review".

Lenny Kohm, former campaign director of Appalachian Voices, one of the many grassroots organizations that have sprung up to oppose mountaintop removal mining, said the activism is working. "Without question it's had an effect," he said. "It used to be until several years ago that that industry had carte blanche. If they applied for permit it was automatically granted. Through the efforts of our group and others, through legislative channels, but also direct action and working on agencies, the EPA, which is responsible for issuing permits, about a year ago they took 80 permits and held them up for further review, while major permits have been denied." He added: "I would bet that within the next five years mountaintop removal doesn't exist at all. The most important thing that will get us across the finish line are our efforts on making this a national campaign, we've taken it all over the country. I will brag a little bit, I don't think there's many people left who haven't heard of it; six years ago nobody had heard of it."

The fight of the people of Appalachia for their homes and the rights of the natural environment shows that the needs of capital to reproduce itself incessantly can still be trumped when the wider population is awakened to the issue free from corporate-backed propaganda. In fact, there lies the key to defeating the racket. Both Republicans and Democrats rely on coal money to get re-elected so working within the political process can be futile.

The fight is made harder because the corporations have all the money – they have millions of dollars to bribe elected officials, to influence the national media and get their voice heard in Washington. The residents of Appalachia have no such money, but their voice was still heard above the din of lies and dissembling. "If you want to encapsulate our strategy, we want to form public opinion and then leverage it to get political will," Lenny said. The official political process is broken, so the people have to work outside it, building their own media outlets, and building consciousness of what this racket wants – its tentacles in every part of our lives.

FRACKING

One of the few bulwarks against the power of capital to run rampant in the US are the regulatory bodies which are there to enforce the rule of the law. For this reason, these bodies come under concerted attack. When I was in Washington, the issue burst on to the news agenda when a gas well in Pennsylvania exploded and sent thousands of gallons of fluids coursing through the drilling site and into a local tributary. The fluids were laced with a medley of dangerous chemicals, forcing seven families to evacuate their homes. The accident created more controversy for a method of gas extraction known as hydraulic fracturing. Its supporters in the corporate world claim it will end US reliance on foreign oil and cut greenhouse gas emissions.

“Fracking” has been around for decades, but only in the 2000s were big shale gas deposits found in the US. The racket could barely conceal its excitement. The accident happened on a drill site working the Marcellus Shale, which stretches over New York, Pennsylvania and West Virginia, the biggest natural gas deposit in US. As many as 100,000 wells are expected to be drilled along the shale over the next half century if allowed to go ahead unrestricted. Fracking involves injecting fluids into shale rock to unlock the natural gas inside. Many countries around the world are betting on shale gas as a big future source of energy as traditional sources of oil run out. But while the business press was in raptures and the mining companies sang the praises of this new frontier of profit-making, ordinary Americans were speaking out against a technique which has the potential to destroy communities and landscapes, and puts people in danger of cancer and other diseases. Cuadrilla Resources, the first company to explore for shale gas in the UK, suspended operations at one site in fear that it might have triggered two small earthquakes near Blackpool in northwest England. In the US, local communities have been up in arms over the practice. State legislatures across the country are passing new laws to stem the perceived environmental fallout: the fluids used to break up the rock can contaminate the water supply. “Clearly, water pollution is a big problem, as well as the impact on air quality,” Myron Arnowitt of Clean Water Action, an environmental group, told me. “We need to make sure drinking water supplies are protected and stop waste water being discharged into rivers without real treatment."

The companies are also acting like Wild West criminals. The Pennsylvania state environmental agency found 1,200 environmental violations at gas drilling sites in 2010, and one in six wells had violations. There is a clear record that the fracking industry has poor environmental management and when things go wrong they are very significant for local communities. "The states are reacting to events on the ground, rivers being contaminated, well blowouts, leaks that they were seeing in well casings," said Mr Arnowitt. "The problem is that states never sit back and say, 'Let's stop drilling and think about what is going to happen if we drill all these wells'." These same companies do not even have to divulge what chemicals they use. The Texas House of Representatives, of all places, passed a bill that would require fracking drillers to make public the chemicals they use. "Although there have been no cases of the process contaminating groundwater in Texas, the people say they want to know the contents of the fluid used in the process," said the Texas bill's sponsor, Republican Jim Keffer. Texas Railroad Commission chairman Elizabeth Ames Jones, meanwhile, told a US energy department hearing that it was "geologically impossible for frack fluid to migrate into the water table" because the process took place too deep in the earth. Texas is actually at the frontier of some of the biggest discoveries of shale rock, particularly in the south of the state. One recently discovered formation which runs from the Mexican border to the south of San Antonio has been called the largest onshore oil or natural gas find in the past 50 years. Bills, meanwhile, have been introduced in California, Pennsylvania, New Jersey and New York to stop fracking.

The EPA, the only bulwark the American people have against big business in this case, has been responding extremely slowly to concerns. Its spokespeople were hesitant to take a line when I spoke to them. Of course, as an institution which might impinge on corporate bottom lines in America, it was under concerted attack by the corporate sector. "We will lose several years of development and have to spend money on bringing in natural resources from around the world [if the EPA intervenes]," said Ray Ludwiszewski, who was general counsel at the EPA in the 1990s and is now a lawyer at Gibson Dunn. This is another facet of the racket – racketeers will use any excuse to get their way. In the case of fracking, the companies and their lackeys were using the excuse that America has to rely on foreign oil – a serious concern – when shale gas can meet those needs.

SHEDDING THE REGULATOR

In 1998 Arch Coal, the second largest coal producer in the US, unveiled its plan to build the largest mountaintop extraction operation in West Virginia's history, a 3,000-acre site with huge mineral deposits. The Missouri-based company spent the next decade clambering over various logistical obstacles until in 2007 it was granted a permit for the project by the US Army Corps of Engineers. But the project hit a snag in 2009 when the EPA vetoed the permit under the Clean Water Act. The EPA ruled that the new project "may result in unacceptable adverse impacts to fish and wildlife resources", adding, "the damage from this project would be irreversible". The project remains stalled. Arch Coal filed a lawsuit to defend the original permit against the EPA veto.

You may think that this was the EPA doing its job, acting in the interests of preserving America's nature and its people, but it was also stepping on the toes of big business, and that made it Public Enemy No. 1 in Washington. This story, alongside countless others, became causes célèbres for the Republican Party and its allies in the business community.

"This over-regulation all started with the Obama administration," William Kovacs, director of environment and regulation at the US Chamber of Commerce, told me. "Four months in, it became clear that they were moving very aggressively on greenhouse gases and there was a list of other rules they wanted to rewrite." Some might point out that saving the planet from global warming might not in fact be a bad thing, but there is scarcely a less extreme organization in the US than the Chamber of Commerce, the organization which represents the interests of Big Money. As the most powerful business lobby in Washington, it saw only the dollar signs – a disintegrating world didn't enter the equation. The US Chamber of Commerce published Project No Project which outlined a litany of projects around the country being held up because of "excessive regulation", including Arch Coal's mountaintop mine.

The EPA is targeted not because it is doing anything wrong, but because it is the most powerful and active regulator, with its rulings effecting large swathes of US business. Of course, the Chamber trotted out its usual excuse for allowing businesses to do whatever they want, saying "all too often EPA provides little consideration to the jobs lost or economic consequences of its actions". In this schema, everything that business wants to do is permissible, because any check on the power to expand and accumulate could impact on the number of people they can employ. It's a vision of apocalypse, but these forces are indeed winning in the US, and the spaces for people outside of the rat race of capital accumulation continue to shrink. The Republicans, ever loyal to Big Capital, were trying to shift regulatory powers from the EPA to the Congress, including barring the EPA from regulating carbon emissions. "Big polluters would flout legal restrictions on dumping contaminants into the air, into rivers and onto the ground," Linda Jackson, the EPA administrator, told Congress. I spoke to Henry Waxman, the ranking member of the energy and commerce committee and a senior Democrat who said: "The Republicans are science deniers. They don't just want to limit regulations, they have a proposal to make a finding that the EPA was wrong in deciding greenhouse gases are a threat." The American political establishment, though, did not just see the land as expendable. The people of the country, too, had for decades been sacrificed on the altar of the racket's thirst for more dough.

WORKING AMERICA

OCCUPY, NEW YORK CITY

In the early part of 2011, I heard about a protest happening down the road from our office in Washington, DC. Knowing it was not up the Financial Times' street – a sit-in at Bank of America – I decided to do a story on it. The group was called US Uncut and was setting up protests in over 50 cities across the US, targeting the massive cuts being made to public services to pay for the corporate greed that had bought about the financial crisis. It was based on a group that had done similar work in the UK, focusing on using tax revenue gained from the richest people in their society – which they avoided assiduously – to bring down the fiscal deficit. The group was armed with all the facts, pointing to a 2008 congressional study which found that nearly two-thirds of US corporations do not pay federal income taxes thanks to the use of loopholes and offshore tax havens. Bank of America was the first target of these coordinated sit-ins and protests because it was the biggest bank by deposits in the land. To add to the protesters' ire, this same bank had received $45 billion in federal bail-out money in the aftermath of the financial crisis. I decided to call up Bank of America to get its perspective on what seemed like completely legitimate protest. "I don't know they are protesting against us," said a bank spokesperson, not completely ingenuously. "The bank paid back all of the Tarp [federal bail-out money] in 2009 with interest. Our practice is to follow all relevant tax policies and pay taxes when taxes are owed."

The group's British analogue and inspiration, UK Uncut, had made headlines after targeting retailer Topshop and its owner Philip Green, as well as mobile phone company Vodafone, with spontaneous demonstrations at stores in London and around the country. Both companies had become famous for their tax avoidance.

The American economy's slow recovery from the great Recession had caused unfair cuts to public services while corporations were reaping record profits. Many, in fact, wondered why it had taken so long for a movement of this type to coalesce in the US. I called up US Uncut to see what they wanted to achieve. "In the UK, it's a wildly successful model for compelling people to organize themselves," said Rizvi Qureshi, an organizer based in Washington. The group called itself a decentralized, horizontally arranged network of people, using US Uncut's website as a messaging hub. It was a grassroots movement "aimed at resisting painful budget cuts by calling for an end to corporate tax dodging". The organizers of the movement hoped to channel the union and worker demonstrations in Madison, Wisconsin to create a wider "progressive Tea Party movement" and shift the emphasis away from an attack on entitlement programs to corporations and banks. US Uncut wanted to turn its protest sites into symbols of public institutions being cut in the latest 2011 budget. "One idea is for people to use props and turn the bank into a school to protest the cuts in funding for the vital Pell grant," said Mr Qureshi. Pell grants help support undergraduate education for students from low-income families. But, after this, the movement seemed to die down, and the precursor to Occupy is all but forgotten. The protests happened, the local media covered it, but then everyone went home.

Then one morning in September, by which time I had moved to New York, I saw a message online about a protest at Wall Street, which hoped to occupy the area and turn it into a democratic place where people could discuss the positive changes the country vitally needed. I told my editor, who again looked confused as to why I thought this was newsworthy. "Sure, go down, but these things happen all the time." So I did go down, as an activist more than anything else. And this was different; the touch paper had been lit. Over the next weeks and months Occupy Wall Street, the movement of the 99 percent, would thrust itself on to the American political scene. I covered every protest in the period for the FT, often with my colleague Shannon Bond, and saw upfront what resistance to the racket in America looks like. It was spreading like wildfire. In Boston, hundreds of demonstrators marched on the state house, while protesters in Chicago beat drums outside the Federal Reserve Bank. In New York, economics Nobel laureate Joseph Stiglitz, actress Susan Sarandon and filmmaker Michael Moore all stopped by Zuccotti Park to lend support. Despite a ban on tents and sleeping bags in the park, protesters had turned the area into a makeshift village. There were separate areas for sleeping and sign making, while free medical aid, clothing, toiletries and food were available. Another area was filled with people working on laptops and video editing equipment.

At Zuccotti Park one day, I got chatting to Victoria Sobel who told me how her parents had worked hard all their lives but were still struggling to make ends meet. That's why the 21-year-old Cooper Union student had been sleeping rough in downtown Manhattan for nearly three weeks and did not plan on going home any time soon. She had been there since the first day. "I'm fed up with the way our financial system is structured," she told me. "My parents work harder than anyone I know, but I've had to watch them really scrounge. That's the reality for me and many people. This is not a hypothetical situation," she added. "This is a critical situation, that is going to continue on past our movement." She told me she is not typical of the growing ranks of Occupy Wall Street protesters – because there is no typical protester. "We have a spectrum socially, ethnically and ideologically," she said. "It's very spread out." People were intent on creating a functioning and equal environment, right at the heart of the most insane system of money and greed the world has ever known. "The morale is high, we're at a crucial point," Victoria continued. "We really need to begin to address infrastructure and sustainability, we want to create an environment that is conducive to getting work done." Aware of how the corporate media usually present anyone who genuinely challenges powerful interests, private or public, Victoria believed that the protesters' image had to be cultivated. "We particularly need to be conscientious of what we are doing because we are being set a high bar," she told me. "I'm in for the long haul."

Some observers, including Van Jones, a former advisor to President Barack Obama, were already calling the Occupy Wall Street protests the start of a "progressive" version of the Tea Party movement. "You are going to see an American fall, an American autumn, just like we saw the Arab spring," Mr Jones said.

As the protests extended into a third week in New York and sparked similar demonstrations across the country, even Federal Reserve chairman Ben Bernanke was asked about the growing movement during an appearance before Congress. "Like everyone else, I'm dissatisfied with what the economy's doing right now," Mr Bernanke said, adding that protesters had cause to be unhappy over the economy and political issues.

Of course, Occupy Wall Street and its spin-offs found little support among Democrats, outside of a few lawmakers on the left of the party. "I think [the movement] reflects an inchoate anger and frustration at the failure of the Bush and Obama administrations to hold people to account for malfeasance over the last few years," Eric Foner, a Columbia University professor who teaches the history of American radicalism, told me. He said that if history was any judge, the fact that the demands of the Occupy Wall Street protesters were so far "unfocused" did not mean it would not develop into a mass movement. "In the 1930s labor had unfocused demonstrations and strikes, dealing with very specific things, then it developed into the modern labor movement." He added that some of his students had joined the protests, many of them enthusiastic supporters of Barack Obama's 2008 presidential campaign. "I think it's a warning sign for the Obama administration that that kind of enthusiasm doesn't exist any more."

"The message of Occupy Wall Street is we think both political parties are owned by the same guys," David Graeber, a former professor of anthropology at Yale who joined in the protests, told me. "If democracy is to mean anything, it means that everybody has to weigh in on this process of how money is created and promises are renegotiated." He added: "I think [Occupy Wall Street] is really promising because people realized after what happened in 2008 that the story we'd all been told is not true. Markets don't really run themselves, the debts aren't sacred."

A MOVEMENT TAKES OFF

People sat in a semi-circle listening to other activists in Zuccotti Park, where the days were punctuated with what the protesters called "general assemblies", forums in which activists discussed political and economic issues and announced plans of action. To amplify speakers' voices, the crowd repeated every phrase, creating a call and response chant that echoed across the park. One speaker announced a march in solidarity with the 45,000 Verizon workers who were on strike. Another called for more people to join an early morning trip to the studios of Good Morning America, the ABC talk show. Over time the unions, representing working people across New York and the country, came out in force to show support for the protesters. The Transport Workers Union, which has 38,000 members, tried to bar the police and the city's transit authority from requiring drivers to transport arrested protesters, after police had commandeered city buses to carry some of the 700 demonstrators arrested on one march across the Brooklyn Bridge. A federal judge struck down the order. After they offered such a heroic helping hand, I called up the union to find out what they thought of this great uprising against the 1 percent. “The protesters have hit a chord with workers and working families,” Jim Gannon, the union spokesperson, told me. “We are expected to pay for Wall Street’s implosion with jobs and wages and benefits. Protesters are putting a spotlight on that. We’re trying to do what we can to grow that spotlight.” Mr Gannon said the union had been in contact with the organizers of Occupy Wall Street about how to help. “They said they don’t need anything right now, they are organized,” he added. “So we are going to provide moral support, and over the next weeks and months there will be material support as needed.”

US labor unions used the momentum of anti-Wall Street protests as a way to amplify their members’ concerns at a time when collective bargaining rights were under attack across the country. In Wisconsin, public sector workers lost collective bargaining rights after a drawn-out fight with governor Scott Walker, while New York’s Public Employees Federation, which represents 54,000 state employees, accepted a three-year pay freeze that would save the state $400 million. It was the latest show of support for the protests spreading across the country from a labor movement that had been hit hard in the aftermath of the recession by job losses, high unemployment, state budget deficits and an often-hostile political environment.

Several hundred members of the SEIU’s local 32BJ, New York’s largest property service workers’ union, rallied near the New York stock exchange in downtown Manhattan to call for better contracts and a “fair deal” for working Americans. The union, which represents 120,000 office cleaners and other property workers nationwide, also organized rallies in Philadelphia and Washington. Faidla Mrkulic, a 60-year-old office cleaner at Pfizer’s midtown office, told me: “I was able to send my kids to school, to put food on the table, to pay my rent. The young generation deserves better. Whatever I had, I want them to have.”

“This is the time to be in solidarity with labor,” Nelini Stamp, an Occupy Wall Street representative, said. “Everyone is going through struggles – losing pensions, foreclosures, student debt.” “The first few days were hard because most of us haven’t experienced true democracy, which is what this is,” said Danny Garza, 26, a student from Sacramento, California, who said he served in the Iraq war. “Everybody has a voice, an equal vote.” Mr Garza said his goals were to “end corporate personhood”, separate government from business and promote the rights of low-income citizens. “People on the outside think we don’t know why we’re here and what we want,” he said. “This is a revolution.” David Good, 24, an artist and Aids activist, said: “This is not about overthrowing the government, this is to bring attention” to inequality and the destruction of the social safety net. He added: “The people that we bailed out are raking in record profits … I would like to see Congress tax the hell out of them. I want the banks and Wall Street to pay their fair share.”

I continued to follow the outpouring of anger against financial injustice as it bubbled up. In a march on Times Square, chants of “Occupy Wall Street, occupy Times Square, occupy everywhere” rang out across the demonstration, as police on horseback blocked off the road and protesters were forced to line the sidewalks. Rebekah, a student from Philadelphia who did not want to give her last name, told me: “I think it’s important that we build a community of discontent about what is happening in US society.” She said she had traveled to Manhattan for the day to join the protests. “I’m here because I am against inequality and the corporate ownership of our society.”

THE STUDENT VICTIMS

In fact, students were flocking to the demonstrations en masse – they were another demographic seen as expendable by the racket. When the financial crisis hit, higher education, some of America’s most vaunted institutions, was thrown under the bus. California’s budget, just before the Occupy protests started, cut $650 million from the University of California’s funding. The brilliant university, which I attended from 2004 to 2005 and comprises ten campuses across the state, was facing a $2.5 billion shortfall. Michigan, which had experienced a decade of declining state funding to its universities, at the same time cut 15 percent from higher education – dropping the proportion of the total cost of education the state covers to 22 percent, a record low. In comparison, in 1987 the state supported 60 per cent of costs. “It’s a prescription for long-term disaster,” Molly Corbet Broad, president of the American Council on Education, an advocacy group, told me. “The types of jobs that create exports are shifting radically, and require skills and educated people. If we lose a generation of college-age students because they don’t have the opportunity to go to college, we will live with the consequences.”

In the aftermath of the recession and resulting high unemployment, many young people in the US had seen university as a refuge from a difficult job market. But the cost of attending public school continued to rise, as the racket saw an opportunity to bring public universities into the “market”. “It’s a massive hidden tax on families,” Michael Boulus, executive director of the Presidents Council of the State Universities of Michigan, told me. At the University of Michigan, the state’s flagship campus, tuition for the current school year was 6.6 percent higher than the previous year. The University of California raised tuition 9.8 percent after an earlier 8 percent rise, and officials have proposed further increases in the future tied to expected cuts in state funding. “The UC system is on the rocks,” Peter McLaren, a professor of education at the University of California, Los Angeles, told me. “It was supposed to be affordable to those who could get in, now it’s not affordable to anyone. It’s a dream that has not just been deferred but extinguished.” Debt loads were also growing. Student loans jumped to $550 billion in the second quarter of 2011 compared with $90 billion in 1999. Faced with a higher bill for their education, many students were changing their priorities away from idealism to getting it over with. “I noticed a big difference in quality at the end,” Victor Sanchez, a recent sociology graduate from University of California, Santa Cruz, told me. “You see a lot of scaling back, which creates a lack of engagement. People have to focus on getting in and getting out.”

Student debt had increased nearly sevenfold from $80 billion in 1999 to $550 billion at the end of June 2011. Other estimates from the Department of Education put outstanding student loans as high as $805 billion. But the unemployment rate for 20- to 24-year-olds was nearly 15 percent – higher than the overall 9.1 percent rate – compromising the ability of graduates to pay off their growing debts. Student loan delinquencies had risen from 6.5 percent in 2003 to 11.2 percent in June 2011, nearly as high as the 12.2 percent rate on credit cards. “The long-run outlook for student lending and borrowers remains worrisome,” Moody’s, the rating agency, said in a report. “Unlike other segments of the consumer credit economy, student loans have not demonstrated much improvement in performance despite some improvement in the broader economy.”

Alberto Gutierrez, a 38-year-old doctoral student at the University of California, Los Angeles, told me he had had to borrow more money and take on a part-time job to cover his expenses, including a $3,000 monthly mortgage payment. He received some financial aid, but not as much as he had hoped. “It’s a public university so they’ve been cut a lot. Resources are pretty slim,” he said. To tide him over, Mr Gutierrez borrowed another $10,000. “I’m going to be about $25,000 in debt when I finish. I’ve never owed that much money.” Mr Gutierrez is not waiting for a bail-out like the banks. He wants to stay in higher education when he finishes his degree, but finding work will be hard. He accepts he could go into delinquency. “In California, there’s no university hiring, I will have to relocate and even then most are hiring for non-tenure track positions,” he said. “I’m looking to end up with a temporary lecturer position, which I’ll have to juggle with other part-time work.”

The burden of rising educational lending has, as usual, fallen disproportionately on the poorest students. While the average family paid 9 percent less for college in 2010–11 than the year before, the amount paid by households making less than $35,000 a year increased 14 percent. To meet rising demand, low-income parents contributed more from income and loans. And while students received more grants and scholarships – funding that does not have to be paid back – most of that increase went to middle- and high-income families. The University of California had seen a jump in financial aid applications for undergraduates as the school has raised tuition to meet a growing budget gap. “Clearly we are also concerned and acknowledge that it’s tougher than it’s been,” Nancy Coolidge, associate director of student financial support for the University of California system, told me. More students qualify as needy, she said, and more families at all income levels have increased borrowing. The difficult job market has affected how readily students can pay back their loans. Ms Coolidge added: “We haven’t yet seen a big drop in those who get jobs but we have seen a flattening of earnings, especially within the first five years after graduation.”

The University of California and California State University systems have even eliminated programs ranging from nursing to computer technology to classics at some campuses, and the University of California, Riverside had postponed opening a new medical school because of funding constraints. “One of our concerns is that college and universities are moving more into a market system rather than producing knowledge for the benefit of society,” said John Curtis, director of public policy at the American Association of University Professors. “These things are pushing higher education in the direction of how much can someone earn rather than what they have a passion for.”

Students were not the only ones suffering. Officials complain that wage cuts, as well as less generous pension packages and fewer available tenure-track positions, make it hard to retain and compete for top faculty. “Most talented faculty members are being recruited away – to their homeland, to other nations or the highly endowed private universities,” said Ms Broad. The gap in salaries between public and private schools has increased in every academic year since the recession began in 2008. “The bottom line is that salaries have been stagnating during the past several years for full-time faculty,” Mr Curtis said. “There seems to be an increasing shift to hiring professors who are off the tenure track.” Increased uncertainty is also damaging the quality of teaching. “When faculty jobs are insecure, it’s a threat to academic freedom. They don’t feel they can raise controversial issues, they don’t have time to work with students .... they don’t have the time they need.” It was the perfect result for the racket – less troublesome critics for the system to deal with.

THE BATTLE NOT OVER

Back at Occupy, in the end, the owners of Zuccotti Park, Brookfield Properties, told the demonstrators to leave so the area could be cleaned. Brookfield asked the New York Police Department to clear the park and the administration of Michael Bloomberg, New York mayor, said protesters must leave temporarily. Occupy Wall Street called Brookfield’s cleaning plans an “eviction” and urged their supporters to come to the park for a “non-violent action”. The group also organized clean-up crews that worked on that day to sweep and mop the park ahead of the deadline. Shortly before the 7am deadline, however, the city said Brookfield had put off the cleaning operation. A statement from Cas Holloway, New York deputy mayor, said: “Brookfield believes they can work out an arrangement with the protesters that will ensure the park remains clean, safe, available for public use and that the situation is respectful of residents and businesses downtown, and we will continue to monitor the situation.” “The fact they backed down is a clear sign that this movement is demonstrating a lot of power,” said Yotam Marom, who had been living in Zuccotti Park.

People kept coming downtown to show support. “Aside from our personal feelings about corporate greed, we found out yesterday that our union had endorsed Occupy Wall Street,” said Richard Addeo, a 60-year-old electrician from New Jersey who had come out with fellow members of the International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers. “We have to honor what they say and we also believe in it.” Some corporate executives have also said they understand protesters’ grievances. Even the racket’s spokesmen were supportive. Laurence Fink, chief executive of BlackRock, said that he was “very encouraged” by the protests and surprised they had not occurred sooner. He said that it would also be foolish to “turn our back on this protest movement.”

In New York, on October 10, we went to the home of Rupert Murdoch, chief executive of News Corp. Protesters stood in the doorway of his building on Fifth Avenue chanting: "Murdoch – pay your fair share!" After 10 minutes, organizers rallied marchers to the next stop, the home of David Koch, the co-owner of Koch Industries and a funder of right-wing Tea Party groups. "Murdoch is one of the worst – but there are plenty more millionaires and billionaires," shouted one demonstrator. Most of the placards and charts called for increasing taxes on the rich and reducing inequality. The Occupy Wall Street movement refers to itself as the "99 percent", in reference to the fact that 1 percent of Americans control 40 percent part of the country's wealth. The march marked a new strategy for the nascent New York movement, which had so far been based near Wall Street. "I think it's an excellent tactic. These people are symbols of a system based on greed," said Ted Auerbach, a 63-year-old activist. "This is not going to stop until somebody with great authority comes and talks to us," said Patricia Malcolm, a member of an inter-faith coalition of clergy that joined the protests. "Let's start with the millionaires, that's why we're going to their houses." One onlooker, Eric Breeding, who worked for an art auction house on the Upper East Side, said he was supportive of the demonstration. "It's a good way to get media coverage. Maybe some rich people will pay attention," he said.

The Occupy Wall Street movement now released a declaration outlining protesters' grievances, which ranged from stripping the collective bargaining rights of workers to the torture of foreign citizens to the perceived influence of corporate interests over politicians. "This is what an actual grassroots movement looks like," Tim Robbins, the actor, told me. "It's a bit sloppy and disorganized but full of passion." The mood was festive with some protesters in costume and groups chanting: "Blame Wall Street, not Main Street." One speaker drew a roar from the crowd by saying: "We have to start by taxing the rich." Most of the participants brought their own signs, with messages ranging from anti-war slogans to condemnation of police brutality. The vast majority singled out the financial sector and rising inequality in the US. One man held a placard that read, "Money talks, 99 percent walks".

On the last protest I attended, helicopters hovered in the sky above the park, while the New York Police Department used metal barricades to direct the heavy flow of pedestrian traffic. More students held up signs calling for relief on their loans. Ani Monteleone, 29, who graduated in 2006 from Oregon College of Art and Craft, said: "Our society isn't creating enough jobs to absorb the people who are graduating from college." "Things have gotten so bad that everyone wants to be a part of this," added Ross Fuentes, a 23-year-old holding a sign from the Freedom Socialist Party. He said he was one of the young people energized by Barack Obama's presidential run in 2008, but was now disillusioned. "Obama ran a great campaign, then he shut the gates," he said. While the protests were largely characterized in the media as a young persons' movement, it attracted older people, too. "It's time people stood up and expressed the need for profound change," said Barbara, a 70-year-old literary agent who declined to give her last name. Her husband, John, a retired publisher, also in his 70s, said he wanted to see higher taxes on wealthy Americans and a return to the Glass-Steagall Act separation of investment and commercial banking that was put in place during the Great Depression and repealed in 1999. "Things have been going downhill for the past 40 years," he said.

THE DOWNFALL OF US WORKERS AND THEIR UNION

One man who had experienced "things going downhill" was Pat Buzzee, a softly spoken 58-year-old, who has spent his working life as a machinist for Electric Boat, a submarine manufacturer near his home along Connecticut's Long Island Sound. Early in his career, in the 1980s, Mr Buzzee was one of 30,000 who worked in southern Connecticut's thriving shipbuilding industry. He now works as an inspector, but the industry has shed 20,000 other workers in the region over the past two decades. Many are still out of work and others have had to accept lower wages elsewhere. Difficulties have persisted even for those who have held on to their jobs. "In the late 80s we were in competition with another shipyard here so the company, in order to stay competitive, would hold wages down," Mr Buzzee told me. "For five years we never got a general wage increase. After a few years that really catches up with you. Costs are going up but your wages aren't." He added: "I see myself as working-class, and the last couple of decades have been very hard for people like me. If it wasn't for the union, I wouldn't have the standard of living I have today. I think everybody should have a right to join a union, if the laws were even on both sides, you would see more people organized."

The economic figures reveal that the downward pressures Mr Buzzee has felt for years had long been spreading throughout the American middle class. Since 2006, median wages have continued to fall across the board in the US, and have never fully recovered from the 2000–01 financial crisis when the dotcom bubble burst. The real median household income peaked at $53,252 in 1999. For male workers in the US, the long-term trends have been even bleaker. “What’s happened to the American man since the early 70s is quite dramatic,” Michael Greenstone, a senior fellow at the Brookings Institution, told me. In 2009, full-time male workers aged 25–64 were earning on average $48,000 – roughly the same as in 1969 in real terms. Meanwhile, in the same 40-year period, the income of the top 2 percent of working-age men has jumped 75 percent. But the average American man has not only missed out on 40 years of wage growth; wages have actually been in free fall. As the labor force has fractured and become more flexible, increasing numbers of men have started working part-time or on short-term contracts. When part-time workers are included, the median wage for the American man has dropped 28 percent since 1970 in real terms. “It’s a horrifying statistic. I think it changes everything,” said Mr Greenstone. “To put that into perspective, in real terms it takes men back to where they were in the 1950s. I don’t think there’s been a period in American history where you’ve seen such a large, systemic, long-term decline.”

Fewer American men are now able to work a steady 40-hour week, and their ability to provide for their family has diminished significantly as a result. “It has changed the character of the American family,” said Mr Greenstone. At the same time the “life narrative” of the working American man has disintegrated. The path whereby a working or middle-class young man would choose a profession, train, join a union and follow in his father’s footsteps no longer exists. In modern America, the foundations of the economic system have shifted, with the advent of computerization, technology and increased global trade. Facebook has replaced US Steel. “This new capitalism – the financial industries, the culture industries, high tech – is very elitist, so people with incomes in the middle who work in this sector stagnate and people at the top as we know get very rich,” Richard Sennett, a professor at New York University and author of The Culture of the New Capitalism, told me. To compensate, he believes, unions need to rethink how they work and become more focused on workers’ life narrative, not just wages. “It’s very hard for men in this new form of capitalism to get much sense of self-respect out of their jobs,” added Mr Sennett. Along the Connecticut coast, men blame their plight on a combination of factors: falling union membership, jobs moving overseas due to the decline in the rate for profit for manufacturing and stagnating wages. The results of this on modern working life have created a new “precariat” class – a proletariat afflicted by endless precarious part-time jobs. There is also the “financialization” of the US economy since the breakdown of the Bretton Woods system in the 1970s which contributes little if anything to the real economy and may even harm it. “I was at church recently and in the parking lot I was talking to a guy and his wife, and he basically said to me, ‘We can’t afford to live anymore’,” recounted Joe Courtney, Democratic congressman for the district, which is home to the shipbuilding industry. “This guy wasn’t on food stamps or anything like that,” he told me. Like many in declining industrial towns, Mr Courtney, who is the major champion of the shipbuilding industry on Capitol Hill, blamed free trade pacts and the steady decline in union power since the era of President Ronald Reagan for killing jobs. “The decline in union membership is certainly attributable to free trade agreements. It has gone from a pretty heavily unionized state to a minority situation.” In the 1950s, about one-third of the US workforce was unionized; by 2006 the figure had dropped to 12 percent.

John Olsen, president of the American Federation of Labor and Congress of Industrial Organizations (AFL-CIO) in Connecticut for the past 23 years, put the blame for the stagnation of wages squarely on decades of attacks on unions. “If you look at the declining lines of wages and union membership, you see they both go down together, they correlate nearly exactly,” he said. “While the rich get richer, we’ve all noticed that we can afford less and less,” said Mr Buzzee, who has an unemployed wife and daughter to support. “Now you don’t have the same discretionary income where you can go out to eat a couple of times a week with the family. Now you might do it once every two weeks.” He isn’t optimistic about the future. When he was growing up, he remembers his parents and two siblings “never going without”. His mother didn’t have to work, and his father made enough in the Coast Guard. “We never seemed to want for food or anything, we had clothes on our backs.” But those days are gone now, he said, maybe never to return. “Nowadays it’s impossible for one parent to support the family, and even with two working it’s a real struggle.”

The aftermath of the financial crisis has also exacerbated the number of men earning nothing at all. Since 1970, their number has increased from 6 percent to 18 percent. In a taxpayer-funded career center in Largo, Maryland, a clutch of men in their fifties are the human face of that statistic. They sit trying to relearn skills they are rapidly losing while unemployed, desperate to find work. Bert Smith, 56, lost his last job in insurance soon after the financial crisis hit after 30 years in the sector. “I’m having difficulty in finding a job, my job skills are a bit rusty,” he told me. “If I want to get back into the job market right now, I will have to accept a significant drop in my wages.” However, the fact he has a wife and children to support may force that decision on him sooner than he would like. “I wish we were doing better but if you dwell on yourself, you’re going to get depressed,” he said. “At least I have the opportunity to find a job,” he added, grateful for small favors in modern America. “There are other economies that are falling apart.”

Soon after visiting the career center, I spoke to John Harris, who at 52-years-old did not expect to be living with his parents. But nearly two years after he lost his $150,000-a-year job at a chemicals company, he moved home to New Hope, a small town on the Pennsylvania–New Jersey border, to save cash. Even with a bachelor’s degree in electrical engineering from Penn State, he had struggled to find work. “Most of the jobs I see, I know I can do, I am qualified to do,” he said. “It’s the employers, they just aren’t hiring.”

Life was about to get even more difficult. For the past two years Mr Harris had received unemployment insurance, regular pay-outs from the multi-billion-dollar joint state and federal program that kept many unemployed people afloat after the recession. But the previous month, he had received his last payment. About 7.3 million US workers collect some form of unemployment insurance benefit, with the average weekly benefit just under $300 a week in 2011. This compares with 2.8 million in December 2007. Typically, state bodies pay benefits for 26 weeks and the federal government pays up to 73 weeks more. But as rising unemployment forced more people to rely on the benefit, both state and federal government increasingly wanted to limit their pay-outs.

Pay-outs totaled $159.4 billion in the year to June 2010, up from $31.1 billion in the 12 months to June 2006, in line with rising unemployment. Now legislators intent on cutting spending had the payments in their sights. “I think that everybody is concerned that this drumbeat about how people aren’t actively looking for jobs is going to impact the program,” Jane Oates, assistant secretary of employment and training at the Labor Department, told me.

In 2011, six states had instigated unprecedented cuts to unemployment insurance programs, trying to reduce the length of pay-outs from the standard 26 weeks. Michigan, Missouri and South Carolina had all cut the maximum duration to 20 weeks, while Florida enacted a sliding scale which can be as low as 12 weeks. Many states also capped the maximum amount of money they will provide through unemployment insurance. Florida's maximum weekly rate was set at $275. "Unemployment claims skyrocketed during the period from 2008 to the present," George Wentworth, an analyst at the National Employment Law Project, told me.

As a result, 30 states' unemployment trust funds – the money that employers pay as a tax on wages and from which unemployment insurance is paid – had become insolvent. "Most states did not save for a rainy day," said Ms Oates. "When they had a few dollars in their trust fund, they eliminated the business tax, for example." Federal extensions to state unemployment benefits were also under threat. During periods of high unemployment, Congress usually extends the number of weeks of unemployment insurance after state obligations finish. There is currently a maximum of 99 weeks of benefits, though it can vary from state to state. The high rate of long-term unemployment forced Congress to appropriate general revenues to cover payments.

Advocates of unemployment insurance argue that it has an important effect on the US economy during downturns, calling it a sort of "working man's bailout". For every dollar spent on the benefit, the economy gets a $2 boost, the Labor Department estimates. "People receiving [unemployment] benefits aren't putting the money in their mattress; it's pumped right back into the local economy," said Ms Oates. From where Mr Harris sits that view may seem a bit optimistic. "It's very hard. I don't spend money on anything," said Mr Harris, who has two children in college. "Things will now get worse, but when I have a bad day, I just think about all the people around the country who are less fortunate than me."

DIVIDE AND RULE

One of the racket's methods of breaking the working class and unions was to negotiate "two-tier" wage structures. In September 2011, the United Auto Workers (UAW) accepted a new deal with General Motors, which put in place two pay levels for incumbent workers and new employees. Soon after, Chrysler, the car manufacturer, reached an agreement with the UAW, which created 2,100 jobs. Although terms of the contract were not made public, it was assumed that some form of "two-tier" wages was part of the deal. The move reflected unions' weakened position in the aftermath of the recession, as companies threatened big lay-offs unless unions agreed to lower the bar in negotiations. This tactic had re-emerged in Detroit in 2007 when the UAW accepted contracts with three automakers implementing the two-tier wage system. New hires earned $14 an hour while established workers were paid nearly double.

The two-tier system began during the Reagan administration in the 1980s, but the new innovation did not last long; wages collapsed into a single tier within years of the contracts being signed. "It was done a lot early in the 1980s. Back then it was considered quite revolutionary," said Gary Burtless, a labor relations expert at the Brookings Institution. "In the end, unions made big concessions." The reappearance of the two-tier scheme reflects a union movement feeling the heat as it struggles to weather attacks from Republicans across the country. "These are certainly challenging times," Thea Lee, deputy chief of staff at the AFL-CIO labor federation, told me. "With the loss of so many jobs in unionized sectors, like manufacturing and construction, it poses a threat to our survival." She added: "When the economy is weak and unemployment is high, it makes it difficult to negotiate a strong contract."

Public sector workers in Wisconsin lost their ability to collectively bargain after a long fight that included an occupation of the state capital and an unprecedented recall election of conservative legislators. "The trend in recent years has been to strip public sector workers of their bargaining power," said Mr Burtless. "My reading is that that seems to have stuck; in other words the unions haven't been able to rebound." It was not just conservative states like Texas that experienced the shift. Even in traditional union strongholds such as Ohio, Michigan and Wisconsin – states with Democratic governors or legislative majorities – unions have still had to make big concessions.

Labor economists contended that, in the short run, the two-tier wage solution is popular with incumbents because it maintains wages for existing workers. "But essentially it's a method of capturing unions," said Mr Burtless. "In the long run a majority of union workers eventually are on the lower tier. The union leaders often get kicked out, or the two tiers merge. The voting members on the lower tier aren't going to vote for getting lower wages for long."

"In the private sector, if companies were on the verge of failing, unions were receptive to opening up contracts to help their employers weather the recession," said Iain Gold, director of strategic research at the Teamsters trucking union. The Teamsters struck a two-tier deal with its largest trucking company, YRC Worldwide, in 2008. As financial markets collapsed, freight volumes fell through the floor, and YRC found it could not survive without significant concessions from its union. “In one context, the last thing we need is for employers to fail. Folks will do what’s necessary, but also required,” said Mr Gold. Membership is also down. Since the beginning of 2008, Teamsters membership has fallen by nearly half due to layoffs and closures. “This is a critical moment in our history,” he added.

While the attack on the public sector appears new and has attracted a lot of attention, Mr Gold argued that there has been a more subtle attack going on in the private sector since the 1980s. “The blatant attack in Wisconsin has shown public-sector workers what those in the private sector have been going through for decades. In the process, it has awoken organized labor across the country.” As part of the Occupy Wall Street protests, the largest private sector union in New York state planned a rally in the financial district in anticipation of negotiations over a new contract to replace one that was expiring. They were joined by workers from art auctioneers Sotheby’s, who had been locked out for more than two months in an ongoing dispute, as well as Verizon workers, who were pushing for a new contract.

More Americans are living in poverty now than at any time since records began more than 50 years ago; the weak economic recovery has failed to lift incomes. In 2010, 46.2 million American people fell below the poverty line, calculated as an annual income of $22,314 for a family of four and $11,139 for an individual, according to the US Census Bureau. The increase lifted the poverty rate to 15.1 percent of the US population, the highest since 1993 and almost 1 percentage point higher than the year before. “To have hit 15.1 percent is truly extraordinary,” Alice O’Connor, a professor who studies poverty at the University of California, Santa Barbara, told me. “We are entering territory which looks like the period before we even started fighting a ‘War on Poverty’ in the 1960s. It’s quite stunning. This is a terrible statement about the depths of the Great Recession but, even more, about the recovery, which has clearly left the poorest out completely.” The aftermath of the recession has seen a “two-speed” recovery for Americans, as the wealthiest maintain their spending habits and lifestyles while a record number of their fellow citizens are mired in poverty. “Income down, poverty up, health insurance coverage down or flat. The news on economic well-being in the US is not good,” Ron Haskins, a senior fellow at the Brookings Institution, told me. Nearly a quarter of American children are living in poverty. In 2011, child poverty was the highest since the mid-1960s. Analysts do not expect a turnaround any time soon. “Given the widely accepted projections that both unemployment and, in particular, long-term unemployment will continue at high rates for the next several years, we can expect this pattern of continuing low income and high poverty rates for many years," Mr Haskins added.

Meanwhile, on the same day as the poverty figures were announced, Ipsos Mendelsohn, the media research group, released figures showing that things were apparently looking up for the top tier of US earners. The group's annual survey of affluent Americans found that the number of households making more than $100,000 a year was 44.2 million in 2011, compared with 44.1 million the previous year. Their spending held steady at $1,400 billion after previously falling. "Their life has stabilized," said Bob Shullman, Ipsos Mendelsohn president. "Everyone feels it when their income falls but, when you have less discretionary income, you feel it more. It doesn't hurt [the rich] as much." The survey, which polled 14,405 wealthy adults, found "almost all affluents are planning a wide range of activities in the next year, with travelling, remodelling, and investing topping this list". But there was a vast majority of Americans who were living from day to day, trying their best to survive in a society that treated them like refuse, to be discarded when there was no money to be made.

DESTITUTE AMERICA

STARVING, WASHINGTON, DC

One of the fallouts from the financial crisis was the inability of millions of Americans to feed themselves for lack of money. In front of my computer in Washington, DC a small news ticker went across my screen that said 44.1 million Americans were, in the aftermath of the crisis, being fed in some part by the food stamp program, which had been rechristened the Supplemental Nutrition Assistance Program (SNAP). That number, the highest in the history of the US, seemed unconscionable to me; it was nearly a third of all adult Americans. It couldn't be right. The next day I went to the social security office in a rundown area of Washington. Just off New York Avenue I found Jamie Cremeans, a 31-year-old California native, smoking a cigarette outside with her boyfriend and waiting for the lifeline that is keeping them afloat. I got talking to them, and she spoke with sadness of their predicament, a narrative familiar to millions across the country, as the poor are made to pay for the financial crimes of the rich. Her boyfriend, Ronald, was partially blind and had been receiving disability benefits for years, but Jamie was new to this. She was receiving food stamps for the first time as she scrambled to find a job. The couple had moved to Washington to find work after she lost her job in the recession, but still nothing was working. "We moved here because there's no work there. I just wanna work," Jamie said, emphasizing the word work. "I probably apply for five jobs a week." Her last job was in early 2010, more than a year before, when she had done seasonal work with the US census. "In California I got paid to look after Ronald, as well," she said. "I don't get that here." Without accommodation, the couple was living with a friend in the northern outskirts of DC, and Jamie said it was nearly impossible to stave off depression. "The money we get, it's not even enough for me, let alone two of us, to feed ourselves. And in California you could at least use the food stamps in a restaurant, you can't here."

The average food stamp allowance is $130 a month to cover food, nowhere near enough to keep a human being healthy. It is enough to keep someone alive – just. The racket does not want the embarrassment of people dying of hunger in the richest country in human history, but to have any sort of life, well, that would require more than $32 a week. "We never have enough food, sometimes we just go without," Jamie told me. "But there are a lot of different programs, lots of churches help out with food." You have to be near destitute to qualify for the program. It is available to anyone under the government's designated poverty level who does not have more than $2,000 in liquid assets or own a home. It is dispensed through a debit card which is topped up automatically at the beginning of the month. I followed Jamie and Ronald inside the office, which is small and decrepit. People were shouting about what seemed like a refused application for food stamps.

As the US continued to reel from stubbornly high unemployment, the number of its citizens using the program has ballooned over the three years to 2011 by almost 17 million, an increase of 61 percent. On top of this, the US Department of Agriculture (USDA) estimates that only 66 percent of those eligible actually claim the benefit, meaning that the true figure of those Americans qualifying for SNAP is 70 million, or just under a quarter of the entire population. In addition, the benefits of SNAP to communities where the money is spent has helped the program escape the eye of deficit hawks. The USDA estimates that every $5 of SNAP money spent in the local community generates $9 of economic activity. Very few people can afford to save their food stamps. In the mid-2000s, the last years for which there are records, 44 percent of SNAP household heads reported their race as Hispanic or African American, though they comprise 29 percent of the general population.

I wanted to speak to the people in government who oversaw this program. It was strange to me. In the rancorous battle over spending cuts, the program, which cost $69 billion in 2010, came out unscathed. This was odd because the Republican Party was adamant about cutting any program that helped the poor to avoid destitution and ruin. Why not food stamps? I found out that, of course, it was all about money. I went to see the undersecretary for food, nutrition and consumer services at the USDA, which administers the program. "The reason it enjoys political support is that it benefits growers and ranchers," Kevin Concannon told me, adding: "It supports areas of the country that are more Republican than Democrat." Food stamps have to be spent on foodstuffs; you can't buy toothpaste or toilet paper or other non-food items, so the big chain supermarkets also benefit from the business generated. Once again, the power of the business community dictates the viability of the program. "The underlying principle is how to meet basic dietary guidelines at the lowest cost," added Jean Daniel, spokesperson for the USDA.

There is no cap on the amount of time a family can receive food stamps, but single people with no children only qualify for three months of benefits. After that, the tap is turned off. "As part of SNAP they know what they are getting when they go in," said Ms Daniel. "They work with social services to get back to work, there's a job training program." But the average time spent on food stamps for those eligible, according to USDA, is nine months, undoubtedly leaving some single and childless Americans with no food for long periods. "As Americans, we like to think highly of the good things in our country. We struggle with acknowledging that in our midst, there are people who go hungry," said Mr Concannon. "In my remarks to groups, I often say, these feeding programs, such as are listed here, had never been as urgently needed as they are right now, in our lifetime, short of the Great Depression of the 30s."

The financial crisis has forced many middle-class families on to the program and sparked a rethink among food companies previously against accepting SNAP payments. Before the financial crisis, for example, warehouse stores Costco and BJ's were not part of the program but have since joined up. Costco was forced to make its new store in New York City SNAP-friendly after realizing its initial mistake in opting out. But many complain that even with these new stores taking part, SNAP entitlements are not enough to sustain healthy nutritional levels. "All the evidence is that it's not enough for a healthy diet, it's enough to keep people from starving, to keep people from very severe malnutrition," said Jim Weill, president of the Food Research and Action Center, which does public research and advocacy. It is not just a lack of funds that can cause malnutrition for those enrolled in SNAP. "They may live in something called a 'food desert' where there's a shortage of healthy food, and if it's available, it's often at a price," said Alexandra Ashbrook, outreach coordinator of DC Hunger Solutions, which helps people process claims.

HOMELESS AMERICA

I walked to the Girard Street Family Shelter (GSFS) in Washington to talk to Juaquina Miller, a 25-year-old single mother of two who was being housed temporarily by one of the public programs under attack by the racket. After a childhood in foster care followed by an itinerant adolescence, this new home was a luxury she had rarely enjoyed. She told me she and her family live on an income of $306 a month. “I don’t know where we’d be without this place,” she said, sitting on a chair surrounded by kids’ toys in her apartment. “I’ve been homeless since I was 17.” The GSFS is one of many housing facilities across the US that provide a lifeline for the homeless population, which had swelled significantly in the years following the subprime mortgage crisis. It provides apartments to 20 homeless families with children, with on-site supportive services from treatment for substance abuse to job preparation. “I have to be quick,” said Ms Miller when we stepped into her living room. “I’ve got a class in a minute!” She said she wants to get a job in law enforcement. Unfortunately, although it felt like home, the accommodation was temporary and she had overstayed the typical six-month stay. She had been on the list for permanent housing since 2007, and was still waiting.

A couple of blocks away from the shelter, lawmakers on Capitol Hill had just passed a budget in which massive cuts were quietly made to the programs that attempt to ameliorate the number of Americans sleeping rough or moving from place to place. “We will see it hitting in a very concrete way,” Steve Berg, vice president of programs at the National Alliance to End Homelessness, which works on federal policy, told me. The situation was made worse by the continuing subprime crisis – there had rarely been a time in American history when social housing was as important as then, but to the Republicans and the capital they represent it was irrelevant.

The most significant cuts for the homeless population are two programs run by the Department of Housing and Urban Development (HUD). The community development block grant funds help cities to pay for staff positions to get homeless people off the streets and into permanent accommodation. The Republicans had proposed 62 percent cuts to the program, while Barack Obama argued for an 8 percent cut. Eventually the budget provided $3.3 billion for the Community Development Block Grant (CDBG), a $650 million, or a 16 percent decrease from the previous year. “The 2011 cuts in community development and public housing funding were significant and will cause real pain for families as the economy is still rebounding,” Robert Menendez, senator for New Jersey and chairman of the subcommittee on housing, told me. The main workers hit have been government employees who oversee different cities’ programs, which will make it harder to organize existing facilities like GSFS.

The second cut hitting hard was the public housing program, which provides publicly owned apartment buildings at very low rent, the kind of place Juaquina Miller would like to move into but can’t at the moment. The latest budget provided $4.6 billion for the public housing operating fund, a decrease of $149 million from 2010 levels. “The 2011 bill returns to long-term patterns of underfunding maintenance and repair work,” said Berg. “Anyone in real estate knows that deferred maintenance means they will have to be boarded up, it means more homelessness.” The problem of homelessness was getting worse in the US as the stuttering economy, the foreclosure crisis and high unemployment bit. It meant many people could no longer afford housing. The number was decreasing between 2005 and 2008, but since the recession the numbers have come back up, mainly because of the employment situation. The federal cuts came at a time when state and local budgets were in dire straits. Traditionally in that scenario, the federal government has stepped in to help out, but in the new fiscal budget, the opposite has happened. “To get an idea of size of the homeless population, we do a ‘points in time count’ that gives us a rough sketch of the amount on any given night,” Mark Johnstone, deputy assistant secretary at HUD, told me. On one night in January 2010, the agency found about 650,000 people living outside in parks and train stations, as well as in homeless facilities like shelters. But this doesn’t tell the whole story. “It’s really about two million people that are homeless, because people are flowing in and out of homelessness all the time, and might have somewhere that night,” said Johnstone. He added that each homeless person can cost states more than $40,000 per year for policing and medical services.

CAPTURED REGULATION

But in a political system that had stopped working, the likelihood of the homeless getting housing any time soon was nil (even if it did make economic sense).

With these cuts, the poorest Americans, those who have never heard of a credit-default swap or a mortgage-backed security, were being asked to pay again.

Another victim from a different part of America, but still prey to the predations of the racket was Jylly Jakes. Over Christmas 2007, she realized she could no longer make her mortgage payments. Eighteen months after losing her job as a corporate bond trader, she was out of options. "I called up my bank servicer [the institution entrusted with collecting mortgage payments] and asked for a six-month forbearance," she told me. The bank said no. Ms Jakes found work at a boutique bond firm a few months later and offered to pay the missing five payments over 12 months and stay up-to-date on her mortgage. The bank said no again and began repossession proceedings. But in late 2008, she seemed to find a lifeline. Ms Jakes signed up for a federal government home mortgage modification program aimed at helping millions of American homeowners facing foreclosure. Three years later – after three trial modifications under the Home Affordable Modification Program (HAMP) – Ms Jakes was still fighting the repossession of her home. The outstanding principal balance is now almost $50,000 more than the original mortgage because of monthly fees "It's designed to fail," she told me. "I think it was put out there as political theatre to make it look like Main Street was going to get a hand after being the victim of an artificially inflated housing bubble."

HAMP was announced with a fanfare by President Obama in February 2009, but it is widely viewed as a failure by those using it. As of October 2011, 735,464 homeowners were in modification programs, about 20 percent of the target. The $29.9 billion program, run by the US Department of the Treasury, was meant to help 3–4 million American homeowners modify their mortgages and avoid repossession. The Treasury reported that in November 2010 new permanent HAMP modifications had fallen to 26,000 from 40,000 the previous month. The Obama administration threatened to withhold payments to Bank of America and JPMorgan Chase under HAMP for a third consecutive quarter, saying neither institution had followed the letter of the law. By 2011, the US government had handed out $666 million in incentive payments to servicers, according to the Treasury. "We are disappointed with our rating, and will continue to work hard to improve our processes and controls," JPMorgan said. Bank of America added: "While we are disappointed with this decision, these financial incentives do not drive our efforts to help our customers in need of assistance."

Meanwhile, the foreclosure crisis showed no sign of abating. "We have 3.5 million first mortgage loans in foreclosure, or pretty close," Mark Zandi, chief economist at Moody's, the rating agency, said. "For context, we have just over 50 million first mortgage loans outstanding, so that's a lot of loans. So it's going to take a good, solid three, four, five years to really work off that foreclosure inventory." US banks are facing mounting pressure from politicians, the courts and regulators over their shoddy mortgage foreclosure procedures. Phyllis Caldwell, chief of the Treasury's Homeownership Preservation Office, which oversees HAMP, says the system in place for managing delinquent loans was not designed to cope with a foreclosures crisis of the present scale. "With the national delinquency spike, you had everything hit at once, there was a big customer servicing problem, people couldn't get through on the phone, lost documents," she said. Homeowners complain that HAMP fails to rectify skewed incentives which make it in the interests of the servicer to foreclose. "Ultimately, major banks responsible for servicing those mortgages have never been committed to the HAMP program in its design and the Treasury department hasn't been willing to enforce the rules," said Alan White, associate professor of law at Valparaiso University and a leading scholar on foreclosure. He believes HAMP has worked in the interest of mortgage servicers rather than looking out for homeowners. "People are incredibly frustrated with the servicers, the four largest of whom are also the four largest banks," he said. "They can't get through on the telephone, they send documents three or four times. It's really just been a performance problem on the part of mortgage servicers." Housing is perhaps the most crucial prerequisite for a human being to prosper. In America, if you are poor, however, you are on your own.

LIVING IN NEW YORK

When I lived in New York I decided to find out what life was like for those who did not live on the Upper East Side, or any of the other fabulously wealthy parts of Manhattan. One housing project in Brooklyn was attracting media attention and according to the press releases its work was going to plan. After decades at the mercy of unscrupulous slumlords, the residents of Noble Drew Ali Plaza housing complex in Brownsville had found themselves a savior in Mo Vaughn, former baseball player for the New York Mets, and his Omni New York LLC. This was the man, so the propaganda went, to transform the decaying five-building project from what narcotics officers referred to as “New Jack City” (after the 1991 Wesley Snipes film in which a drug lord turns a whole building into a crack cartel) into a clean and functioning complex.

Omni New York bought the 365-unit property for $20 million in June 2007 and on the back of the purchase the police arrested 35 residents in an early morning drugs bust. It was a statement of intent. Over the next months, dozens of security cameras started to appear all over the building, peering down at the residents in the plaza, the social center of the project – the target was 400 fully operational cameras. In came the security firm Secure Watch 24 and surveillance moved from an 8am to 4pm shift to 24 hours a day. Mo Vaughn invited the media in and toured them around the crumbling interiors in a pin-stripe suit, signing memorabilia and accepting the adoration of his clamoring fans. But this was where the fairytale stopped and the reality of Omni’s takeover began. For the residents who were allowed to stay in the complex, there were good omens. There were promises of new stoves, kitchens and windows for everyone. The two most run-down buildings – 230 and 240 – were being completely renovated. But there existed another set of residents for whom Vaughn’s arrival was less auspicious. Countless residents were dealt eviction orders and faced the street as their next habitation. Still more were living in buildings 230 and 240 as the whole place was ripped apart around them, dust and debris seeping into everything. This group included two wheelchair-bound men. It was the typical divide-and-rule tactics of rich developers in the US.

The Noble Drew project was built in 1972 in a poor part of Brownsville, surrounded by tenements and empty lots. “It was a wonderful place to be then,” Paulette Jackson-Forbes, 45, the president of the tenants’ association and a resident since its inception, told me. “We even had intercom on the TV so we could see who was downstairs. People were embarrassed if their floors weren’t clean!” The first developer was Joe Jeffries-El, a University of Pennsylvania-trained manager. “There were 20 families of police officers, nurses, bus drivers, teachers – you name it,” said Jackson-Forbes. “It was a utopian place to be.” In the early 1980s the buildings were wrenched from Jeffries-El and the complex started its precipitous decline. In that decade the ownership and management changed hands four times. “We became atrocious then,” said Jackson-Forbes. “People hanging out, crack epidemic, no security, drugs getting a free run – at that time we were really the victims.” Eventually the tenants’ association took action. A lawsuit was followed by a new owner, Lyndon Realty. “They did some decent renovation," said Jackson- Forbes. "They bought in a team of security – the owners were Jewish but they hired Muslim security – all the drugs went away. You could sleep with the windows up, the doors open, that type of thing." Eventually it was revealed that Lyndon Realty was stealing and misusing funds, using one of the buildings as a facade for its claimed renovation and actually funneling money back out of the complex. Arrests were made in 1992 and the building went back to a receiver.

It was then that Abdur Rahman Farrakhan, voted one of the 10 worst landlords in New York City by the Village Voice, bought the property for $10. His tenure ran all the way up until 2006 when the court passed management to West Center Management which still runs the day-day operations of the complex. "Under Farrakhan the place just disintegrated," said Jackson-Forbes. "No elevators, no hot water, no rebuilding, no security." It eventually transpired that Farrakhan and a partner had been swindling money out of the complex by receiving government funds for hostel services. They had emptied two buildings and made an agreement with the Department of Homeless Services to run those buildings as a shelter. The rent they accrued was nearly $3,000 per unit from federal subsidies, far higher than the rent from individual tenants which sometimes was as low as $68. Eventually Farrakhan was caught embezzling money. Legal proceedings brought by the tenants' association, represented by Attorney Mimi Rosenberg, began in February 2002 in what would eventually become a five-year battle. In 2007 they won the case – the defendant was declared bankrupt and the property was put up to be sold. The tenants demanded strict criteria: $28 million rehabilitation, restoration and help to secure Section A, which would guarantee that residents could start afresh in their rent payments and no arrears from the Farrakhan tenure would de demanded. Omni New York was the only company to meet these criteria.

LEAVING THEM TO ROT

When you walk into Noble Drew housing project today you are surrounded by residents angry about the new administration. A project of cleansing the complex has been under way from the police in combination with West Center Management. Certain residents, according to West Center, have not paid rent for the whole West Center tenure – some 14 months. They have been dealt with eviction notices. Dorothy Fields is one such person. A victim of Hurricane Katrina in 2005, she fled with her bedridden husband and was living out of a van next to Noble Drew, before Alicia Allen, assistant manager for West Center, took pity and called her bosses. They agreed to put her up in a room in one of the buildings. The Fields' apartment is in building 240, which has been under construction since Mo Vaughn initiated his regeneration program in July 2007. As you step in past the piles of bin bags, there is scattered debris and dust all over the lobby area. Workmen mill around with large sheets of glass, bits of piping and other construction tidbits. The floor is covered with concrete, collections of brick, shattered glass, plastic bottles – a construction site. The Fields are two of 16 people living in this block as builders are ripping down the building around them. Their apartment inside is in bad shape. Michael Fields, who was shot and cannot walk, lies in bed building a toy car. There is no natural light as the curtains are drawn and a weak yellow light illuminates the room. There's a TV that crackles in the background. "When they gave us this place they said we don't have to pay rent," Ms Fields said. "Now they are trying to make us pay $5,000, how the hell am I going to do that?" "I can't hardly breathe at times," said Mr Fields from his bed. "I'm also vomiting now which is horrible." "There's dust coming through the window, even I have been breathing up phlegm," Ms Fields chimed in. "And because of all that trash there's worms and dead cats all around here." Ms Fields showed me a note from her doctor cataloguing her respiratory problems and their links to her surroundings. On the front of building 240 is a sign that catalogues the asbestos work apparently taking place in the basement as workers remove the piping. It is being carried out by New York Insulation Inc. who have no website and don't return calls when I enquire about their work. When the West Center team come around later they try to take the asbestos sign down before realizing the work is due to finish in December. Jackson-Forbes told me later that under Farrakhan the pipes were going to be changed but he dropped the operation after asbestos was found. She is also convening a tenants' association meeting to discuss the dangers of asbestos.

Inside building 240, Mike Gorney, 28, foreman for DV Group, the construction subcontractors, said: "There's like six squatters in here, they can't kick them out yet." But yet West Center said that only half the 16 people living in building 240 are actually squatters. The other eight are just residents, there by right, with West Center's blessing. A mother and her four-year-old son living in building 240 reported that there was no attempt to rehouse them; in fact they are being evicted. "They didn't rehouse us and now we apparently owe $4,000." Her welfare claim has removed her son so she can't pay the rent. "My little son has asthma, how do you think all this dust is effecting him? I don't even want him in here. I was living in complex 37 but they moved me here."

In building 230, which is across the plaza, there is a sign on the outside which reads: "No tenants allowed in this building. Hard hats only." On a public holiday with no construction I found over 10 people living there, squatting, with the full knowledge of West Center it transpires, although the project manager for DV Group later claimed no knowledge of this. The hard hat regulation was apparently put up after a worker for DV Group had been hit on the head by a falling brick, and now all workers walk around with their heads covered – not the squatters though. One of the residents is Ernest Bethel, 54, whom I find descending a flight of stairs on his bottom and pulling his wheelchair behind him. He has one leg, and obvious mental problems. He tells me that he has to pull himself down and up the stairs every time he wants to go out as only the construction workers use the elevators. It takes him about an hour, he said. Bethel has lived in the complex for over a year, according to West Center Management.

Another resident of building 230 is Rosemary Joiner, 69, who claimed she was thrown out of her apartment in another building and put in a single-bedroom apartment in building 230. West Center agreed this was the scenario, but they claimed she had not paid any rent. She now lives in 230 and is distressed and unkempt. When I was in the West Center office she was complaining that she had been kicked out of the room she was squatting in by her roommate. West Center Management won't give her the key to her old apartment to return her clothes there.

Building 230 is like a bombsite with detritus of every kind – clothes, bottles, garbage, electronics, concrete, brick, wood, metal – strewn over the floors. Every occupied apartment can be identified by the color of the door. Apartments that are being renovated have a new gray door; the doors in which the squatters are living are red because they cannot knock them down yet. There are all sorts of people – mostly old, and, according to West Center staff, drug users. West Center says these people are under eviction proceedings. Jaswinder Singh, project manager for DV Group, was incredulous. "Nobody lives there," he said. Is it safe for habitation? "No, it's not safe," he replied. He said that there is asbestos in the basement like building 240, but there is no sign on the outside detailing any work. Ravi Gukral, the project manager of the whole operation, said: "We follow orders, they have dates to get evicted."

On both buildings, Keish Frith, 29, administrative assistant in the West Center office on location, said: “They should have got the residents out before they started. When you are working with different people they work by their own rules. It may not be illegal, but it’s not fair.” “It’s all for show,” said a man wanting to be identified as Slasher. “They want it to look good on the outside, but really nothing is happening in here.” He was waiting outside the management office to report a suspicious occurrence on the weekend. “They told me that they can’t access the camera records until three days later,” he said. “It’s now three days later and now they say that the cameras inside the buildings aren’t working.” Slasher had spotted a man who he didn’t recognize on the fire escape at 4am looking through his window. “I told security that morning, and they said they didn’t have the ability to rewind!” He added, “I mean, someone died here two months ago, you would hope they had set the cameras up properly. I don’t even think they are turned on.” This lack of respect for the lives of the American poor was because they could not make the racket money. But unfortunately for these same people, before long the racket realized that locking up people was a way to make money off the destitute and hope-starved poor of America. It was called the “War on Drugs”.

LOCK-UP AMERICA

SOCIAL CONTROL

As in Latin America, the domestic version of the Drug War is also a naked effort at social control. It has focused almost exclusively on the black and Latino communities of the US, who make up 60 percent of the prison population, even though they are just 30 percent of the general population. It has also made billions of dollars as the racket works to pull the prison system out of the hands of the American people and run it for vast profit. In fact, the rise of private prisons has coincided nearly exactly with the rise, over the past three decades, of the so-called War on Drugs. One study found that "people of color are represented in private prisons at least ten percentage points greater than in state-run facilities."[1] Nearly half (48.8 percent) of prisoners in the US are behind bars for drugs offenses.[2] The racket, however, never throws its own in jail: just 0.4 percent of the prison population in the US is composed of those guilty of financial crimes.

The move to put hundreds of thousands of Americans behind bars began in the 1980s when "mandatory minimum sentencing" for drugs offenses was introduced. It meant that there was no chance for discretion in drugs cases; if someone was caught with something, anything, they would be going to jail. This was accompanied by a focus on what politicians, eager for votes, called "law and order", which meant more punitive sentencing as politicians vied with each other to prove who was toughest. They were driven in part by the racket, who could smell the money. Private companies pushed further into state prisons from their strong position in the federal system. They began by soliciting speculative prison building projects at the county level, creating what has become known as the "prison bubble". The private companies would go in to a rural county and say, you can build a jail that's much larger than anything you'll need for your own criminal justice problems, but you can lease out extra beds to receive contract prisoners from the federal government. In Texas nearly a dozen counties entered the bubble using taxpayer debt but now can't find prisoners to fill the buildings. At this point the private companies ditch the contracts and the taxpayers are left holding the bag. This is how capitalism works – the risk is socialized, and the profits privatized. The quantity of human misery and waste this system has created is horrifying. In the 20 years to 2007, the national prison population in the US trebled to 1.6 million people, or nearly 10 percent of adults, by far the highest in the world. Nine percent of these are held in private facilities, where the average cost of keeping an inmate housed for a year comes to $25,000. Unfortunately for the private interests making a killing, the bubble now appears to have burst: incarceration rates did not increase as fast in the five years to 2011, and in 2010 fell for the first time in 20 years. But you can be sure that these companies are coming up with ingenious ways of maintaining this lucrative business.

When I was in New York, this move to privatize the prison system was actually picking up again. The racket was using the excuse that state deficits had to be combatted, and that the American people should hand over "costly" prisons to private interests. The racket was using this same excuse to get its hands on all sorts of public institutions, and the prisons attack was working, despite the fact that it was not obvious it would save the states any money. There's a pretty simple rule for these things: once the racket get a foot in any industry or institution, there is an inevitable logic which says it will want more and more. It will never be happy with running just a part of something. So Florida alone was planning to privatize 29 of its prisons. I spoke to one analyst covering the private prison system at an investment bank in Atlanta who said it was "the single biggest privatization program of state or federal prisons in the history of the US". Arizona was also having a string of public hearings on a plan to add thousands of privately operated prison beds, while Ohio had announced plans to raise $200 million by selling off five state prisons. Something was definitely happening here. Others followed suit as private contractors pitched themselves as a solution to cash-strapped states' fiscal woes.

The Florida plan had a new twist. Instead of outsourcing only newly constructed prisons, the state planned to outsource existing beds as well. I called up the Florida state senator who was pushing this reform most forcefully. Elected representatives all over the US represent the racket, not their people, but it's still worth hearing their rationalizations. "Probably 5 percent of prisons in Florida are currently privatized," J.D. Alexander, an influential Republican, told me. "This expansion of privatization will bring it to one-third." As time went on, there was no doubt he, and his allies in the private prison business, were looking for 100 percent "penetration" of the market. The public would own nothing. Of course, this was merely the "American way". "I think competition makes us better, it's an American sort of view: let's create competitive environments, privatize a portion," he added. But it later emerged that the state would incur $25 million in losses from compensation paid to 3,800 workers who would lose their jobs in the privatization program. Corrections officers are already among the lowest-paid employees in the state. "During the privatization process, they will go into unemployment and foreclosure," said John Rivera, president of the Police Benevolent Association, which represents Florida's correction officers and was opposed to the privatization. "They will get their cars repossessed, they won't be able to pay for medical care, and so the state will have to pick it up. And those that have seniority, it will cost the state to relocate them." Lawmakers, largely Republican, and the contractors argue that private companies can run prisons cheaper – largely through savings on wages and benefits for workers. But analysts say the statistics do not match. These saves, for example, are mitigated by the fact you have higher turnover among employees and more lawsuits due to lack of sovereign immunity. Private companies also usually cherry-pick the lowest-cost offenders and leave the state to deal with serious and dangerous offenders who cost more. "A lot of the time when you see numbers for private prison costs to state costs it's not apples to apples because they are not taking most serious offenders," said Scott Henson, an analyst covering the corrections industry in the US. "In Texas the private facilities haven't wanted to take on serious offenders." Private prisons want the healthiest prisoners, not the "hard-core" troublemakers – the ones with misdemeanours or felonies – they want the state to bear those costs. But a lot of states have yet to realize that this is a scam, or have realized but it is making too many people rich for them to stop it. In private prisons you have less experienced officers, and a lower guards-to-prisoners ratio, so you really are running a risk of prison riots and prison escapes. The real reason why private prisons don't want real troublemakers, and want the least violent prisoners, is so they can run it like a college dorm rather than prison.

PERVERSE INCENTIVES

It is also in the companies' interest to keep more and more people locked up as it pumps up their bottom line. If you have a state-run prison there are fixed costs that are there whether it is full or half-full. For privately run prisons – where you are getting paid by the head – there is an incentive in the other direction. It sometimes crosses into overt corruption, such as paying judges to send children to prisons, which is an extreme example of the warped and unhealthy incentives that private incarceration creates. In February 2011, a juvenile court judge in Luzerne county, Pennsylvania, was convicted of racketeering after he accepted money from a private prison operator in exchange for handing down extremely harsh sentences in order to guarantee prisons would be full. "It simply does not save money," said Mr Rivera. "For example, recently they told legislators and the community that they would save $22 million a year yet now they are already $25 million over budget. The private prisons' selling point is they can do it more cheaply. If they are able to do it more cheaply, even though the evidence does not support it, they have to cut somewhere so they tend to cut staff … In prisons understaffing has consequences. In 2010, in Kinman, Arizona, three prisoners escaped from a private prison and the official inquiry found the private company at fault because of lax staff training. There are very real risks. If you understaff a prison the consequences can be very serious indeed."

Of course, the companies in the sector are big political players, being significant campaign donors in elections across the country. In reality, the privatization effort is more driven by political patronage than cost savings. It's quite simple: anytime you have profit as the main motivator for the safety of the public, it is a bad formula. Government's first responsibility should be to its people; a corporation's first responsibility is to its investors. "I'm reminded of the old adage, if it sounds too good to be true, it probably is," David Fathi, director of the American Civil Liberties Union's national prison project, told me, accurately. "The claim that private corporations can do the same job more cheaply and still generate profits for stockholders is pretty implausible on the face of it," he added. "It is in fact not true."

Two companies dominate the US private prison sector: Corrections Corporation of America and GEO Group. Over the past decade the two "big ones" have gobbled up a host of smaller companies and consolidated the industry. In 2010, Geo acquired the third public company that operated in the market, Cornell, for $730 million in stock and cash, creating a “duopoly”. They are faceless, both refusing to be interviewed by me. This monopolization of markets is another feature of capitalism: power and capital centralize. The companies are not run particularly well. They are highly indebted and rapidly accumulating more debt. They both dip into day-to-day operations to service debt payments. But the racket obviously think they will get more business in the future: Corrections Corp’s shares rose 7.5 percent from 2006 to 2011. Wall Street is happy to lend them money at low interests rates.

The politicians are a product of this: they work for, and are probably funded by, the real power in this debate – not the plucky state senator, but the corporate behemoths that are devouring society and all its assets. They already own over 300 prisons nationwide and it’s getting worse. Now there are around 135,000 prisoners in private prisons in the US – 7 percent of all state prisoners and 16 percent of all federal prisoners. Private prison corporations are trying to expand the market for their services. In communications to shareholders they are forthright about the fact that they are looking to expand prison privatization and lobby and provide campaign contributions strategically. They are sophisticated in their efforts to generate business. “We are at a turning point for incarceration policy,” said Mr Fathi. “For the first time in 30 years, the prison population actually went down last year.” There is no question that private prison companies deliberately and strategically support and recruit politicians who will lead to increased incarceration. Just as Eisenhower warned about the military–industrial complex, we now have a prison–industrial complex. Prisons will make more money the more people we incarcerate.

The police, often, themselves see the poor they are employed to control as nothing more than scum. When I took a ride around Brooklyn, New York City, with two white cops, their disdain was obvious. The two partners are regular car buddies and they work the 3.30pm to 11.30pm shift. They had a real disdain for their constituents “More filthy people,” said Officer Cavanella as we passed a housing project. This theme continued as he tried his hand at quack sociology, appropriating shibboleths from extreme conservatism. “These are low-income people who just don’t care,” he said. “They don’t respect us, they don’t respect themselves, they don’t respect nobody.”

CUTTING JUSTICE

While profit was being made from the privatization of the prisons, funds were being savagely cut from the public side of the justice system, in keeping with the racket's priorities. In New York, I met Jimmy Boone Amos waiting outside the arraignment court in downtown Brooklyn for her husband to appear. It was 4pm, but she had been sitting there since early that morning. "I'm tired of waiting," she told me. Her husband was arrested 23 hours earlier for grabbing a woman in the street during what Ms Amos calls a diabetic attack. "I'm really worried about him," she added. "They've had him for ages and not told me how he is. I don't know if he has insulin or anything."

United States law prescribes that anyone charged with a crime must be arraigned before a judge within 23 hours. But cuts at both the federal and state level meant that court budgets had been devastated and that the target is often not met. Over a single weekend in 2011, 57 percent of arraignments in Brooklyn went over the required period. But arraignment times are just one of many problems that cuts to the state budget have created in New York, and the US at large. The poorest and most vulnerable are hit hardest, as is often the case when public services are cut. Ms Amos is one of many New Yorkers who have had to suffer needless pain as the state draws back on its constitutional commitment to properly fund its justice system.

New York chopped $170 million from its $2.6 billion budget for 2011, around 6.5 percent. This had already had a serious impact far beyond arraignment times. Across New York, courts now close at 4.30pm instead of 5pm. The ability of judges to take in all the information they need is now compromised as they rush through cases so they can adjourn at the right time. The state used to have night family courts, where if a woman wanted support or an order of protection she could go after work or at an unsociable hour. These are now closed, putting at risk women who are victims of domestic abuse and other forms of violence.

Small claims courts in Manhattan, the Bronx and Queens used to be open for four nights a week, but that has been reduced to one (and in Staten Island's case, the reduction is from once a week to once a month). Small claims courts are where tenants can take on their landlords and consumers can challenge big corporations. Both those crucial functions are disintegrating. "In Staten Island now, if you wanted to sue Macy's for whatever reason you would have to wait nine months," said Dennis Quirk, president of the New York state court officers' association. "Certainly morale is lower than years past," added Howard Schwartz, a Brooklyn-based criminal defense attorney sitting outside the same downtown court. "There's more work for fewer people." He says it takes longer for clients to get into court, that cases take longer, and that judges now have to give less attention to arraignment cases because of the heavy load. "The system is overburdened," he added. In 2011, the New York court system laid off 441 workers, or about 3 percent, on top of the 2,000 who retired in 2010, swelling the hordes of unemployed in the city. Those still in a job are massively overworked. "The cuts are having system-wide effects," adds Mr Quirk. "Everybody has too much to do and it is having an effect on people getting their day in court and justice being served."

The US prides itself on its adherence to the rule of law, but starving the courts system of money is seriously affecting the ability of ordinary Americans to get justice served. Evidence is being more hastily assembled and analyzed, people are spending too long in cells before being charged, and vulnerable people are losing the slim protections they have against violent and abusive relatives or partners. Moreover, these cuts were not inevitable. In the three years that the emergency "millionaires tax" had been in place in New York, it generated $13.8 billion in revenue. The law raised the rate of income tax for New Yorkers making more than $500,000 by 2.1 percentage points to 8.97 percent. If that tax bracket were raised again, many of the New York justice system's problems could be solved, and the long wait of people such as Jimmy Boone Amos, and many more Americans across the country, could be made shorter. But the racket does not like such ideas. In the ruling ideology, that's "class war". But in many places around the world, the endless and empty propaganda is wearing thin, and people are taking things into their own hands. Here's where hope begins.

PART FOUR

WE’RE LOSING YOU

FOURTEEN

TURF WAR

THE MONROE DOCTRINE

A brief re-cap. The early 21st century has seen the biggest political shift in the western hemisphere since the murderous thug Christopher Columbus thought he had arrived in the Indian subcontinent but had actually “discovered” the (already inhabited) Americas. Since 1823 and the so-called Monroe Doctrine, the western hemisphere has been designated by American planners “our backyard”, a vast resource-rich expanse open for pillage and exploitation for the gain of an elite class in the US and a handsomely rewarded quisling elite in the colonized countries. This dynamic has been constant and unbroken for two centuries. President James Monroe obviously didn’t put it in these bald terms when he made his address to Congress on December 2, 1823, which forms the basis of this so-called doctrine. Monroe said that day that countries in the western hemisphere “are henceforth not to be considered as subjects for future colonization by any European power”, which sounds like a good idea for the subjected peoples – until you realize Monroe instead gives his own country the right to take over from the European powers. “We owe it, therefore, to candor and to the amicable relations existing between the United States and those powers,” he continues, “to declare that we should consider any attempt on their part to extend their system to any portion of this hemisphere as dangerous to our peace and safety.” He was telling the European powers simply, “It’s ours now!” And it was. Under this naked imperialism dressed up in fusty diplomatic language, the US took Cuba from the Spanish in 1898 (the US still illegally occupies Guantanamo Bay today), and Puerto Rico in the same year (which the US still owns today).

As the European empires broke down after World War II, the idea of imperialism became increasingly untenable as indigenous people removed their oppressors at a rapid rate. But while Europe lay in ruins, the US was rising to its superpower status, and the racket wasn't going to lose control of their "backyard" during the ensuing Cold War with the Soviet Union. Occupations were frowned upon now, not least by an American population culturally averse to empire and imperialism. So instead the intelligence services turned to subverting any Latin American government that did not support American business interests, away from the attention of the American people. First went Guatemala in 1954, a coup against the center-left President Jacobo Arbenz who had the gall to redistribute land to landless peasants from the United Fruit Company. The CIA stepped in and installed a military junta and started one of the most horrendous civil wars in history that left 200,000 people dead.

Any country that elected any sort of left-wing politician would incur a terrorist war of anti-democratic aggression. The Dominican Republic in 1963, Brazil went down in 1964, Chile through the 1960s and eventually succumbing in 1973, Nicaragua in the 1970s, and on and on. All the governments I mention were democratic, and in many instances they were replaced with a collection of open neo-Nazis, fascists and other such dregs of humanity. It was all cloaked under the guise of the war against the "Evil Empire": Soviet Russia, much like today's Islamic fundamentalism, gave the US an excuse to do whatever it wanted. Hundreds of thousands of people were slaughtered across Latin America with the support of many US household names: John Foster Dulles starting the Guatemalan bloodbath, Henry Kissinger the dictatorship in Chile, Ronald Reagan supporting the fascist Contras against the democratically elected Sandinistas in Nicaragua. These figures are all hailed as great heroes to this day in mainstream American culture, although not by the rest of the hemisphere, for obvious reasons. John Perkins, who worked as what he called an "Economic Hit Man" for a US corporation for decades, has written a book exposing the type of work he did. He described it succinctly in an interview: "Basically what we were trained to do and what our job is to do is to build up the American empire. To bring – to create situations where as many resources as possible flow into this country, to our corporations, and our government, and in fact we've been very successful. We've built the largest empire in the history of the world. It's been done over the last 50 years since World War II with very little military might, actually. It's only in rare instances like Iraq where the military comes in as a last resort. This empire, unlike any other in the history of the world, has been built primarily through economic manipulation, through cheating, through fraud, through seducing people into our way of life, through the economic hit men. I was very much a part of that."[1]

But even with this tragic history of exploitation and mass murder, optimism swept the hemisphere as the 21st century opened. The western hemisphere – especially Latin America – was finally shaking off the shackles of the imperial bully, and this time they were winning. No longer would democratically elected leaders from Chile to Bolivia to Brazil to Venezuela allow their sovereign nations to be balked by the giant upstairs. When they proposed economic plans to give the wealth of their land to the people who actually live in it rather than to rich corporations and exiles in Miami, they would no longer be resigned to the US trying to overthrow them, they would be ready.

In Bolivia, when the fascist paramilitary groups in eastern provinces like Pando massacred indigenous peasants and the pale-skinned traditional elite tried to start an uprising against democratically-elected President Evo Morales, he didn't stand for the encouragement the US was giving: as we have seen, he kicked out the ambassador. He also brought the governor, who had incited the massacre, to justice. On top of this stern action, all the newly independent center-left leaders of the Latin American bloc came to Morales' aid at the UN, they knew that together they were a powerful force that couldn't be crushed under the boot of the American government.

Hugo Chávez in Venezuela followed suit and kicked out the US ambassador there. And who can blame him? In 2002 when he himself was ousted temporarily by a US-backed coup that put a millionaire businessman into power and suspended the constitution and democracy, the people of the Venezuelan barrios fought back, marching in their hundreds of thousands for the first leader that had ever considered them worthy of their own resources. He had to be reinstated because the people of Venezuela were too powerful and alive to their plight to watch history be repeated.

This particular generation of left-wing leaders has learnt from the past. They know about the CIA, the National Endowment for Democracy and other agents of US government, and they are consciously locked into a battle. In Bolivia, for example, the indigenous communities are equipping themselves to fight back; there is none of Salvador Allende's erroneous belief in pacifism – "if the right-wing try to liquidate democracy we will fight you to defend civility", is now the message. And because there is no Cold War, the US government and its conduits in the corporate media are finding it harder to paint any politician who is vaguely left of center as an agent of Soviet Russia. Having said that, the New York Post did without shame describe Chávez – one of the most frequently elected leaders in the world – as a dictator. In addition, the US imperial project is so bogged down in the Middle East – where support for dictators has been equally obscene – that they have in many ways taken their eye off the ball. It's arguable that without 9/11 the Venezuelan revolution would be history by now, as well as Morales. Further still, when in 1975 the US helped set up Operation Condor – a continent-wide terror network – with their surrogate General Pinochet, they could count on the compliance of the security states they had helped set up. Now the tables have turned. With Fernando Lugo's election in Paraguay the whole continent became a left-wing independent bloc; and although Lugo was unfortunately overthrown in what he called a "parliamentary coup in judicial dress" in 2012, for the first time in centuries, things are looking up in Latin America, and a strong alliance is building. Democracy, economic justice and dignity are returning to the continent and US influence has started to wane.

TAMPER-PROOF DEMOCRACY

In an essay in 2008, the historian and theorist Perry Anderson asked why the capitalist classes, after World War II, allowed democracy to flourish in Turkey but not in Spain. In two short paragraphs he explained the history of "western democracy" in the 20th century. In Spain after the war, he wrote: "democratization was an unthinkable option for [General] Franco because it would have risked a political volcano erupting again, in which neither army nor church nor property would have been secure." For Franco and his business supporters, dictatorship was the only option. But they needn't have feared. After 36 years of the general's nightmare rule "[e]conomic development had transformed Spanish society, radical mass politics had been extinguished, and democracy was no longer hazardous for capital. So completely had the dictatorship done its work that a toothless Bourbon socialism was incapable even of restoring the republic it had overthrown." Now, in other words, Spain was safe for democracy, which was duly established in 1975. "In this Spanish laboratory could be found a parabola of the future," continued Anderson, "which the Latin American dictators of the 1970s – Pinochet is the exemplary case – would repeat, architects of a political order in which electors, grateful for civic liberties finally restored, could be trusted henceforward not to tamper with the social order."[2]

This tamper-proof democracy, sensitive to vested interests but not the will of the population, has been erected throughout the world, pushed primarily by the US government. Any disobedience to the "consensus" is punished harshly. Leaders who don't subscribe to it are vilified in the American and general, western media, and in the event of any particular populations taking democracy too seriously, the US will put in a tyrant to prepare the ground for the right kind of democracy. Historical examples of democracy getting "out-of-control" are legion, from Aristide in Haiti to Mosaddeq in Iran. And the enforcers are notorious too, from the Contras in Nicaragua to Suharto in Indonesia. But history is lived in the present and the dynamics of international relations haven't changed all that much. We are now living through the latest, possibly last, stage of this battle between a global population that wants a democracy that prioritizes the people, not big business and not capital, and a ruling class that wants it the other way round.

This time around, the fly in the ointment is Latin America, the main site of global resistance to tamper-proof democracy. It might not be a coincidence that the fight-back is being consolidated in a part of the world often dismissed as "irrelevant": it's probably the reason the US and its allies haven't managed to stamp it out (although, to be fair, they've tried). This form of democracy so loved by the West and their satraps in the developing world – one of a disengaged population picking between two business parties every four years – is being seriously subverted all over the continent. The great democratic pantomime we are subjected to in the West (and the nations we make in our image) isn't working on the people of Latin America. Their democracies are becoming safer for their people. There are real political parties, like Evo Morales's Movimiento al Socialismo (MAS), with real principles and real objectives that are serious about tampering with the social order for positive change.

This percolation of knowledge into the US mainstream is naturally scaring the gatekeepers of political discourse, who have been able to expatiate on their love of democracy for decades without being troubled by the existence of alternative definitions. Now the pretense is becoming harder to maintain and the reaction is sadly predictable. The almost subconscious contempt for democratic movements in Latin America is the result of centuries of unthinking domination, a similar psychology to that of a schoolyard bully who's had his run of the yard for so long he gets complacent. Suddenly, when he's taken his eye off the ball in order to clobber some other poor kid for his bag of sweets, the first kid decides to finally stand up for himself. It's hard to take.

For Perry Anderson, the template of Spain after Franco's destruction of civil society "has become the general formula of freedom: no longer making the world safe for democracy, but democracy safe for this world". Through a confluence of historical factors, Latin America is the crucible where the last chance to make a world safe for democracy is being fought. The importance of this battle shouldn't be underestimated: if it fails, we might not get another chance.

CARACAS, VENEZUELA

Caracas, the capital of Venezuela, is the focal point of so many of the country's divisions. The center of the city is a mix of bustling street markets and modernist skyscrapers lined along wide avenues. In the mountainous suburbs the city's elites live in tree-lined streets peppered with flashy condos and fancy pizzerias. But Caracas is perhaps best known to outsiders for its barrios – the vast slums in which thousands of makeshift houses cling precariously to the foothills. The barrios have long been the hub of support for Chavismo. It was the people in the barrios who descended from the mountains to the presidential palace in their thousands to support Chávez when he was briefly deposed in a US-backed coup in 2002. When I was in Caracas, I took one of the city's new cable cars to visit the barrios. The cable cars were built to link different parts of the vast slums. The lines to get on the bus at the other end are long. It used to take two hours on the bus through the winding mountain roads that snake through the barrios; the same journey by cable car takes 17 minutes and costs 10 cents. The cable cars that hover over Caracas have transformed the lives of thousands of the poorest Venezuelans. They are state of the art, clean and run without any problems. It appears no money was spared in its construction. As you walk through the barrios, graffiti dedicated to Hugo Frias Chávez, the secular deity of Venezuela since his death, is commonplace. Some of them are stencils, obviously paid for and designed by the Chavista government itself, but many are improvised outpourings of thanks from the people.

Venezuela should be one of the richest countries in the world. With the world's second largest reserves of petrol, it has a natural resource that makes the swathes of ghettoes and palpable poverty in the country an embarrassment. For centuries before Chávez, this petrol had been extracted with the interests of the racket in mind: money flowed to western multinationals and their shareholders, alongside their oligarchical Venezuelan representatives. With Chávez, for the first time, the natural wealth of the country was spread throughout society, focusing as it should on the poorest. Missions of teachers and doctors were sent into the barrios to bring to an end the shame of poverty in such a naturally rich country. As a result, over the period of Chavismo, Venezuela has reduced poverty by more than any other country in Latin America, including Brazil and Bolivia. This is not to say there aren't problems with the country and some tenets of Chavismo. The lack of judicial independence is a significant problem, with Chavista control near absolute. There have been shortages of essential foods and inflation is sky high. Some of this is undoubtedly the fault of the traditional elites in the country who have tried to squeeze the economy to bring down Nicolás Maduro, the man who replaced Chávez after his death, as they tried during the huge strikes early in Chávez's tenure. This "making the economy scream" as Nixon called it, worked wonders in 1970s Chile, helping to create a climate in which General Pinochet could overthrow Chilean democracy. It looks less likely to succeed in Venezuela. Despite the anti-government protests of 2014 which called for "la salida" of Maduro ("the exit"), the Chavista government keeps winning democratic elections fairly. What is the racket to do?

In the frankly embarrassing hysteria that gripped the American media, Chávez was compared to Saddam Hussein, Pol Pot, Idi Amin and even, echoing Donald Rumsfeld's idiocy, Adolf Hitler. "Mr Chávez shares much in common with these former dictators who killed and trampled human rights as a means to their own ends," wrote Douglas MacKinnon in the Washington Post. Chávez had some of the most stellar democratic credentials in the world. Since being democratically elected in 1998 by a landslide victory, he went to the Venezuelan people again in 1999 and won approval for important constitutional changes. He won another general election in July 2000 when he was elected with 60 percent of the votes, which dwarfs figures from the "home of democracy" such as the US and UK. Later, in December 2000, he won a referendum that called for the state monitoring of labor unions' elections. And then, a presidential recall referendum – which was enshrined in Chávez's 1999 constitution – was triggered in August 2004 when opposition groups collected signatures from 20 percent of the electorate, as the constitution stipulated. Again Chávez won: 59 percent of the population voted "no" to the recall in an election overseen by the best election auditors in the world. By my reckoning, that counts as three general elections and two referendums in nine years. It is hard to find a more exercised populace in the entire world. This stands in stark contrast, of course, to George W. Bush, who, and it is now uncontroversial to say this, stole the election in 2000 in a dictatorial putsch more common to a banana republic. And this brief primer also leaves out the most telling part of recent Venezuelan history: the coup attempt by right-wing groups in 2002, which tried to use the military to topple the democratically elected president. The journalist Eva Golinger, in her book The Chávez Code: Cracking US Intervention in Venezuela, assiduously documents, through the revelation of previously secret US government documents, the succor and support that various of its agencies gave to this anti-democratic military coup, which briefly succeeded until hundreds of thousands of downtrodden people from Caracas took to the streets to demand the release of Chávez who had been incarcerated by the new business junta.

So why the lies and misinformation about Chávez? The answer is simple and is deeply rooted in the political and economic policies of the United States. Venezuela under Chávez provided a symbol to the rest of Latin America, and to the wider world, of what a more egalitarian society can look like. In the aftermath of his election, Chávez created what he called "Bolivarian Missions" after Simón Bolívar, the great Latin American liberationist from the 19th century, aimed at reducing the massive and crippling poverty in the barrios around Venezuela. Hundreds of free medical hospitals were built providing healthcare to many people for the first time, and local grassroots committees were established to adjudicate their affairs. The infant mortality rate came down by 18.2 percentage points from 1998 to 2006, while income for the poorest strata of Venezuelan society grew more than 150 percent from 2003 to 2006. For the first time in many decades, the oil wealth of this nation extremely rich in natural resources was redirected back to its people, and not, as history has demanded, passed to rapacious foreigners and their elite lackeys in Venezuela.

This is a dangerous example to set, and the thirst for this kind of justice is likely to spread. Henry Kissinger, in the analogous example of Chile under socialist Salvador Allende in the 1970s, called it a "virus that could infect others". The racket continues to try to destroy it, but in the mountain-speckled skyline of south-eastern Mexico, the battle for survival and a dignified existence burns bright.

FIFTEEN

FREEDOM FIGHTERS

CHIAPAS, MEXICO

Oventik is two hours' drive from San Cristóbal de las Casas, the Spanish colonial town in the highlands of the Mexican state Chiapas. The roads are good apart from the potholes and the small animals that dart in the path of your motorbike. Breezeblock houses with corrugated iron roofs, the accommodation of the world's poor, punctuate the pavements on either side. Oventik is not indicated by anything more than a decaying sign by the side of road, and it's different here. "Estas entrando tierra Zapatista", says the sign ("You are now entering Zapatista land"). To the side is a gate manned by four people, all wearing balaclavas, black socks pulled over their faces with a slit cut in the middle, from which their eyes peer out. These are the members of the EZLN (Zapatista Army of National Liberation), fighting back in the poorest state in Mexico. Looking down the long drive that runs through the community, you can see grand murals on the walls of all the buildings: Che Guevara and Emiliano Zapata are recurring themes. When I put in a request to come inside, the guards take my passport and return half an hour later: "You can come in but no interviews", they told me. Oventik is one of 13 "caracoles" (meaning "snails" in Spanish) that are scattered throughout Chiapas. They were won by armed struggle by the indigenous revolutionary group, the Zapatistas, after they rose up on January 1, 1994, the date when the North American Free Trade Agreement (NAFTA) signed with the United States and Canada came into force. As part of its provisions, the Mexican government had to change its near-century old constitution that granted common ownership of land. This was the straw that broke the back of the indigenous communities, who had suffered centuries of discrimination and oppression at the hands of the latifundistas, or large landowners. The neoliberal program of NAFTA, which quite simply removed Mexican sovereignty, had been edging closer in the preceding years. The ejido system, for example, was consecrated in Article 27 of the Mexican constitution. It's a form of land ownership, created after the revolution, whereby the ejidatarios have the right to the produce of the land that they work. This just and humane law was ended in 1991 with the modification of Article 27 by Washington favorite, President Carlos Salinas, who reformed the agrarian law in line with Bretton Woods dictates. Salinas also started the program of certification of land rights that transformed the lands into smaller properties. This move of sovereignty from the people to foreign capitalists set the ground for the Zapatistas, named after the Mexican freedom fighter and revolutionary Emiliano Zapata, who claimed Mexico back from international capital in the 20th century's first successful revolution.

The long path down to the bottom of the caracol is a muddy track. On either side stand wooden buildings dedicated to the "dignity of women", a hospital, a school, a basketball court. My guide is not interested in talking; the balaclava reveals only the eyes, and the eyes have had enough of questions. The caracol has many different meanings for the Zapatistas. One of their mottos is "caminar al paso del mas lento" ("walk at the pace of the slowest"), meaning that they can wait until the last member of the community is ready before they continue to move forward. There are murals peppered throughout the caracol depicting snails with the slogan "lento pero avanza" ("slow but moving forward") – again signifying that they will move at a snail's pace, but once they are all ready, they will progress. The Zapatistas adopt the tactic of using silence as a way of learning, to listen, not to shout. Rumor has it that they have been slowly preparing themselves and will soon re-emerge. Fuelling these rumors was the announcement when I was there that the Zapatistas would be organizing escuelitas ("little schools") to be held in five caracoles. In these escuelitas seasoned Zapatistas will "give classes on their thought and action on liberty according to Zapatismo: their successes, their failures, their problems, their solutions, the things which have moved forward, the things that have got bogged down, and the things that are missing, because what is missing is yet to come", according to Subcomandante Marcos, one of the Zapatistas' most eloquent spokespersons, who is now back in Chiapas after a stint living in Paris. In the caracol, there is a feeling of empowerment and independence rare in the world, especially in this region. The Mexican military – which has carried out countless attacks on the indigenous communities – is not allowed, in theory, to come into this community, and you can feel the difference. The Zapatistas are the most organized of the indigenous resistance groups. Part of this is because of the hard-fought battles of the mid-1990s, resulting in the San Andrés Accords signed with the Mexican government through which they achieved a degree of autonomy.

ACTEAL

Further up in the mountains, among the clouds and lawns of nature, is Acteal, a small indigenous town partly run by the Zapatistas. In 1996, the most brutal of the massacres committed against the Zapatistas was carried out here, when 45 people were killed by a paramilitary group while praying in the local church. Many suspect the US-backed Mexican government was involved or at least complicit in the massacre. Soldiers at a nearby military outpost did not intervene during the attack, which lasted for several hours. Many of them were seen the next day washing the blood off the walls of the church. The Mexican government had used paid mercenary militias to terrorize the Zapatistas at that time.

I arrived in the middle of one of the many downpours and walked down the main street into a basketball court sponsored by the EZLN. The entire town was gathered to cheer on their local team. As in Oventik, the outsides of the houses and community buildings were decorated with murals depicting left-wing revolutionaries from Latin America; saints wearing Zapatista balaclavas; and children of different races standing hand in hand. A local man approached me and asked if I had seen the monument built to commemorate those who died in the massacre, and he pointed me in its direction. The monument stood a couple of dozen feet high, half covered by the clouds which were quickly descending over the village. The monument is a clay construction in which the 45 faces of those massacred are depicted, merged together in a collective wail. I went down some steps to the site where the massacre took place. No longer a church (it was torn down after the massacre), it is now an outdoor auditorium with painted wooden crosses nailed to the walls in memory of each person killed. Among the dead were a number of children and pregnant women. A man approached me and I told him that I was visiting from the UK. He asked me: “Why didn’t you visit earlier, before they killed my friends?” I had no answer.

Back in San Cristóbal, I sat down with Roberto Chankin Ortega, one of the young activists who had been involved in the struggle from the beginning. We drank coffee in the café in the middle of the town’s main square. “It was a big surprise for a lot of people, the uprising of January 1, 1994. My father said there hadn't been an uprising for 50 years, an indigenous uprising," Ortega told me. "But after there was a lot of sympathy with the causes. The demands they had were very just, it touched a chord internationally." He continued: "I was very young at the time so there was a romanticism about the armed struggle, the communiqués of Marcos, a new language which was very poetic, influenced by rock and roll. A new language of fighting. But it was also heavy at times, you couldn't leave the house many times."

Mexico is in many ways a failing democracy: the political class is divorced from the people and the education and healthcare systems for the poor are in disrepair. It should not be like this as Mexico is a country rich in resources and geographically fortuitously located.

FREE-TRADE SLAVERY

When the Zapatistas burst on the scene on New Year's Day 1994, they garnered a great deal of press coverage and international support. This attenuated the brutality of the Mexican military's fight-back. When the Zapatistas occupied San Cristóbal, many were armed with guns carved in wood, a symbol of resistance. But the Mexican military were too strong and to avoid a massacre they withdrew into the Lacandon jungle after threats. Chase Bank's memo a few weeks later, "Political Update on Mexico", echoed the concern of capitalists across the West and stated: "The government will have to eliminate the Zapatistas to demonstrate their effective control of the national territory and security policy." It was, of course, exploitation and a virulent racism, around since the era of colonialism, against the indigenous people that gave birth to the movement. For centuries the white interloper infantilized the indigenous population as a method of control – it tried to make them into children psychologically, through a racist paternalism. Crushed under the yoke of the white man's guns at first, then as slaves to their economic system, this changed finally in 1994. "They stood up for themselves," said Ortega. "They are more owners of their liberty. For the indigenous, this process has dignified them. The government has of course invested a lot of money to get rid of the movement, which worried the United States, too." The government essentially wants to displace the indigenous people of Mexico, or at least those who happen to inhabit land that foreign capitalists like the look of. The white society in Mexico, in reality, still thinks of the "indio" as poor, destitute and subhuman.

Despite this, the autonomous zones are a big achievement in the face of extreme oppression and pressure from the government and the US-supplied Mexican military, who cannot enter the caracoles. Inside these zones, the Zapatistas have their own driving licenses, hospitals and schools – a real community within a state. “They are continuing to construct autonomy and resist,” said Ortega. “The media don’t give them much coverage any more, but the Zapatistas don’t care too much, they are focusing on working on autonomy and realities.”

“They survive because of international support,” said a university professor I talked to. This may be partly true, but they also survive because they are organized and focused squarely on their true oppressor.

The US has trained the Mexican military for decades, sharing their manuals of counter-insurgency, alongside supplying billions of dollars to aid in the fight against drugs, a cover which is often used to discipline the dissident parts of the population, including the Zapatistas. “All over the world, the US interests make it dangerous for a lot of people,” Ortega told me. “NAFTA was a disaster. A lot of public policies which were enacted as part of NAFTA have brought about privatizing of land, campesinos have been kicked off land, had their land sold or closed down.” That free trade agreement itself has helped to destroy large parts of the previously thriving industrial base in Mexico, giving the narcos even more unemployed cannon fodder with which to get a grip on the country. As the New York Times put it: “NAFTA produced results that were exactly the opposite of what was promised … domestic industries were dismantled as multinationals imported parts from their own suppliers.” But what the New York Times did not say is that NAFTA was designed like that on purpose. The aim was to make Mexico a slave state, even more so than it already was.

The Mexican establishment has presided over an economic model lauded by the Bretton Woods institutions and Financial Times editorials – i.e. high growth rates, big booty for foreign investors, and (this bit is kept quiet) yawning inequality. For example, the country’s growth was 5.5 percent in 2010, the highest in 10 years, but that same year the number of Mexicans living in poverty grew by more than 3 million, putting 52 million Mexicans below the poverty line, or nearly half the population. The Financial Times lauded such a state of affairs in a headline as “bloody but booming”. Bloody for poor people, booming for rich people – a succinct aphorism for the global economy.

“It’s not just the US, it’s international capitalists and their interests,” said Gaspar Morquecho, a Mexican intellectual based in Chiapas who is found most days in the Zapatista café in the heart of San Cristóbal. “In Africa, Asia, Latin America, everywhere, it’s the same, and it’s very hard to fight.” In 1992 Subcomandante Marcos defined this war against the world’s poor as World War IV. World War III had been the Cold War, won by the capitalists, and World War IV was being led by the victors – a war of the markets, the arms companies, the financiers, pushing forth and destroying countries, cultures and economies. In this sense, we are seeing in this the last stage of capitalism, and World War IV is the construction of a different way of living. “The US has many plans of war – they go by names like Plan Colombia, Plan Mérida,” said Morquecho, who describes himself as an adherent of the Declaration of Lacandon which outlined the Zapatistas’ goals. “It’s a project of control of the hemisphere and has been going on for the last 200 years. The interests of the US at the least is to control the region of Latin America, but not just that, they go to war in Middle East, provoke China in Asia. They are introducing their brutal military and billions of dollars per year spent on it. They aren’t weak; it has got worse, more intense in the operations in Mexico. There is no weakness in the empire, opportunities for the EZLN are hard to find.”

He is right, but the Zapatistas have shown the shape of a pocket, a pocket of resistance, an outline of how you can use modern techniques to create such public support that it is impossible for the powers that be to crush it and maintain the façade of nobility they feed on like bloodthirsty vultures. The repression against the indigenous people has been brutal since they took their destiny into their own hands. It has become more complicated in recent years because a lot of powerful economic forces have come to Chiapas to make a quick buck, attracted by the favorable “investment climate” after NAFTA. Mexico was now, like other US satellites, “open for business” as the neoliberals say; more accurate would be “Mexico is up for sale”. These powerful economic forces are now trying to capture the political process completely to bypass resistance to the sell-off. The state-owned oil company Pemex is the latest of the Mexican people’s assets slated for sale.

In the indigenous people’s battle for their land, their enemies are not just governments on the federal or state level. Behind them, steering the ship, is the racket of private capital, the multinationals who want their resources, from water to petrol. In countries like Mexico, the state acts merely as an intermediary between foreign multinationals and the country’s natural resources, giving corporate power a legitimate face as they open up the territory and evict the people. The state, contrary to its protestations, cares not a scintilla for the human rights of its own citizens. Such a state of affairs is the case in all the countries around the world that remain trapped under the US umbrella.

"The human rights situation has actually got worse over the past 20 years, in terms of the violence against the people," said Gubi Chamatus of Frayba, the human rights center in San Cristóbal which has worked closely on issues related to the Zapatistas. "Before all these mega-projects were going forward where they could, there was no resistance, the people just said OK. Now, however, these same people are arriving, and people are saying no, and they are standing in front of construction, so the violations have gone up, because the repression is harsher against these people; they don't want these situations, it's embarrassing, it's given the lie to all the talk of development and modernization." As Rosa Luxemburg put it: those who do not move, do not notice their chains.

FULL-FRONTAL ATTACK

The government of Mexico, like all states allied to the US, preaches the rhetoric of human rights but ordinary people don't see them. Before they stood up and took control, the indigenous people were anonymous, the powerful could call them free with no contradiction. When they took up arms, they became the enemy, they were no longer representatives of the "good indigenous". But the Zapatistas won the war for the hearts and minds of the world, so the Mexican military had to give concessions. The propaganda after the uprising declared "peace" in Chiapas. But 500 years of brutality and savagery will take a long time to rectify. The process for autonomy continues and with it violence. "The human rights of the indigenous, they aren't guaranteed," Chamatus told me as we sat in his office. "When an indigenous group isn't in accord with a mega-project or something like that, the state use the public force to repress it, or to move them." Once again the people of a region are held ransom to the God of Investment. The attack on the poor and indigenous is full frontal, coming from economic, social, political and military forces.

So far, in Chiapas, the Drug War-fuelled violence seen in the rest of Mexico has not arrived. The war started by President Felipe Calderón in 2006 has affected nearly every other state of Mexico. But in Chiapas it hasn't manifested, maybe because Chiapas has been heavily militarized since 1994 anyway; most of the state has seen a constant military presence since the uprising. Since that period, with US training and backing, there have been systematic violations of human rights in indigenous communities. In Chiapas, in fact, the pretext of the Drug War is being used to position more military in the state. "They are fortifying Chiapas," said Chamatus. "In our experience, the violations go up with the presence of the military. There is a strong correlation. One of the things that has changed in Chiapas is that, before, the presence of the military was for the EZLN, now it is more ambiguous, it could be for this or narco traffickers. It gives them license to do whatever they want under the guise of drugs." It was a familiar story, heard from Honduras to Colombia to Peru. It brought about a new strategy applied by the Mexican state, no doubt learnt from their American patron, whereby if a group speaks against the state it is speciously linked with organized crime, and from then on the state has carte blanche to do what it wants. "What they are looking to do is quite simple," added Chamatus. "They want to impugn the legitimacy of the organization, the credibility of the organization, and criminalize social protest, criminalize the defense of human rights, criminalize not being in accordance with state. This is the situation now in Chiapas."

It's a tactic as old as domination itself, and intended to target the EZLN communities because they continue in resistance. For this reason, they live in fear of the multi-billion-dollar military, which is typically the institution entrusted to enforce capitalists' interests when all other methods have been exhausted. In other words, the Mexican people pay tax for a military that is used to enforce foreign capital's interests.

There are more than 70,000 soldiers permanently placed in the beautiful hills and towns of Chiapas, a number that has been steadily rising since 1994, and the same number as in the whole of the rest of Mexico combined. From 1995 to 1999 the human rights situation deteriorated, particularly because the military and paramilitaries were sent in to "discipline" the indigenous people. The situation is not as serious now, but their presence remains strong, they routinely extort money from locals, and disfigure the landscape with roadblocks. The strategy of stamping on dissidence from the Zapatistas has moved to criminalization: they, and the human rights groups that support them, are branded as delinquents. It's an ideological war, too: rumors are spread that the Zapatistas are rich and stealing money. "The conditions of the country are in some ways worse than 1994," said Morquecho. "After 1994, there was a dirty war which had left 10,000 victims dead and many disappeared. In 2002, there was a new war with 70,000 victims, 50,000 displaced, 15,000 disappeared, and the last six years have been worse. Half the population is poor, that's 50 million people, and 15 million are outside of the labor market, in informal work. Half the population lives in extreme poverty, and this reflects in what is happening in the jungle. In this sense, we say the conditions are worse. But the other problem is, the capitalist system in this country is tremendously brutal and any act of rebellion, the answer politically is the military. In this sense, from 1994, the territory has been occupied by the military, and there is a strategy of counter-insurgency, and not a program to combat poverty. The objective is to drain the water of fish, to limit the process of resistance in the Zapatista communities. The Mexican state has the political and military clout to neutralize the EZLN and the bases of support, and it is still trying."

The indigenous still live in extreme poverty, without electricity or running water, in a virtual position of apartheid. But the process of 1994–95 is reversible, the gains of popular movements, whether of the Zapatistas or anyone else, are always vulnerable to being liquidated. When I was there the Partido Revolucionario Institucional (PRI) had returned to power; until 2000 it had been governing for 71 years in the "perfect dictatorship", riven with corruption and behaving as a serial human rights violator.

As usual, the US was on the wrong side of history. When the empire and its racket is long gone, washed up like the rest of the superpowers of history, we will be able to say this. But, for now, when the vast riches of a small number of people depend on its rapacious course, the truth will stay silent, and the Era of the Myth surges on, ripping through society after society.

SIXTEEN

REVOLUTIONARIES

CAIRO, EGYPT

On January 25, 2011 a march was planned for Cairo, the capital of Egypt. There was a lot of publicity on social networking sites, but this had happened before. People knew something was going to happen on the Tuesday but no one really knew what. On that day something started in Egypt that would upset the imperial order set up by the US in the Middle East after World War II. People rose up against the corrupt US-backed dictator, Hosni Mubarak, and demanded real rights for themselves and their country. In the ensuing violence, the military and police murdered hundreds of Egyptians who were fighting for a better chance in life – the so-called "lost generation" of unemployed, terrorized youth. The chants at the start of the uprising that pushed more people to join the protests were all economic. The people were hungry, for food and for basic human dignity, which had been ripped from them by the regime. In the end the people won the battle, if not the war. The military declined to murder them en masse, and for that the Egyptians were meant to be grateful.

I arrived in Cairo just over a year later to see how the revolutionary movement, which had not achieved its goal of overthrowing the regime but had merely diminished its power, had organized and what lessons could be learnt by other people crushed under the boot of a domestic dictatorship propped up by the most powerful country in the world. It was my first time in the Egyptian capital. There was a frenetic element to daily life on the street, with cars and people bursting from all the narrow sidewalks and roads. I met one activist, Sarrah Abdelrahman, who was something of a poster child for the Egyptian revolution, in a café on Talaat Harb Square. Before the historic events of January, the 24-year-old aspiring actress had been apolitical. Now you couldn't stop the self-described revolutionary talking about the struggle for dignity she and her people were engaged in. But 15 months on from those heady days, like many of the young secular left which spearheaded the revolt, she was disconsolate. “It’s conceivable that we might end up with something even worse than Mubarak in a year’s time,” she told me. “I’m not going to lie. I thought the army and military were going to take the side of the people, but it seems now that they forced Mubarak to step down to save the regime, not to break the regime. I mean, the people in power now are criminals, actually they are worse than Mubarak.” She added: “Now, half my generation is blind or limping or dead. The violence is out of control. When people go to a football match and then 70 kids die. They also massacred 25 Copts.” But, she added: “I have hope for my generation because they were completely not politicized before, like me. Before if you asked anyone about politics or current events or wars in the region, they would only know about singers and football players, but now it’s completely different.” They had woken up.

THE BOGEYMAN

The US had gone quite straightforwardly from supporting the dictator, Mubarak, to supporting his replacement, the equally undemocratic Supreme Council of the Armed Forces (SCAF), and then later the coup regime of Abdel Fattah al-Sisi. True to form the US had supported and armed Mubarak to the hilt since he came to power in 1981; his regime scared the US by using the bogeyman of the Muslim Brotherhood, saying they would take over if any moves to democratization were enforced. The regime put dissidents in jail through risible military trials and torture; no one could organize without incurring the wrath of a vicious regime. For that reason, Egyptian society, like so many in a US- designed Middle East, lacked a liberal left party, there was nothing. The one thing the US had feared since Nasser – the Soviet-allied Egyptian dictator – was the rise of independent Arab nationalism, which might see nationalizations and the growth of socialism. They worked actively to destroy it – including by promoting radical Islamists, like Hamas in Palestine. The unions that had not been completely co-opted by Mubarak provided some means of organization, but when the uprising succeeded in bringing on elections, the Muslim Brotherhood took advantage of the destruction of Egyptian civil society that had taken place during Mubarak’s regime and won. The Brotherhood had a leadership, they had access to the media and, perhaps most important, they had God on their side. In a population with such low levels of literacy and education, large swathes of the population were swayed by this pious party, which had little interest in improving their condition. The Brotherhood had never been leaders of the uprising; they had been reticent at first and then became followers. One of the strengths of revolution was that it was leaderless, but this also had its drawbacks.

Ms Abdelrahman for her part said she was angry at the way the US had reacted. “Before the revolution a lot of people in my generation were rooting for Obama actually,” she said. “His hope propaganda was very media sexy and idealistic. But from what I’ve seen, first of all the tear-gas that I’ve smelt was made in the USA, and just the way the statements from Obama and Hillary Clinton which were like, ‘Oh we’re just testing the waters to see what to do.’ They were a complete let-down, they just go after their own interests.” She added: “I mean, that’s different from Hollywood, or the culture or the people, the American people are different from the government. US foreign policy is inconsistent, they just look after their own interests, and they just don’t want anyone else to be the best apart from them.”

The US soon started meeting with the Muslim Brotherhood, seeing them as a bulwark against the extremist Salafis and the Brotherhood had no qualms about selling out: they made deals with SCAF and met with John McCain and any other foreign dignitaries that made it to Cairo to solidify the position of the client state. “Imagine that Egypt is a woman who is covered in wounds and she is kind of bleeding all over but she’s covered,” said Sarrah. “What happened is the uprising kind of unveiled all these things, so you are starting to see all this mold, this pollution, these infected wounds.”

The US gives the Egyptian military upward of $1.3 billion every year, alongside joint military training. In response to the mass murder of Egyptian protesters by the military and police, US Congress passed a law in October 2011 stipulating that Egypt has to prove it’s moving toward democracy, while the $1.3 billion reaches the Egyptian people in bullet form. In addition, the $1.3 billion benefits the racket, creating a demand for American weapons exporters, and in Egypt it subsidizes the military’s economic investments. M1 Abrams tanks, for example, come to Egypt in parts that need to be assembled, and so tank-assembling businesses are created. Many of these are expressly joint ventures with western companies, like for example the joint venture with Jeep to create armored and commercial vehicles. “Because the military are so opaque we don’t know if it’s 15 percent or 40 percent,” Sharif Abdel Kouddous, an Egyptian journalist whom I first met working at Democracy Now! in New York, told me in Cairo. “That being the range says a lot about what we know.”

Foreign policy in Egypt has for decades been merely reflective of US foreign policy – including the enforcement of the siege on Gaza since 2006, when Egypt allowed US warships through the Suez Canal. None of this, of course, reflects the popular will in Egypt. When Mubarak fell, Egypt was one of only three countries – the other two being the US and Israel – which did not have diplomatic relations with Iran. The secretary general of the Arab League was appointed foreign minister right after Mubarak fell and he asked why Egypt had its foreign policy dictated. He said the country would now have diplomatic relations with Iran, and open the Rafah border crossing into Gaza. Within a few weeks he was removed from the position.

The role that the US plays in backing the military was the essential core of the dictatorship. Mubarak had been in power for 30 years but the military had been ruling for 60 years and the military acts as a state within a state. “The US talked the same way as state media – they voiced support for Mubarak then realized it was too late for him, and they said he’s got to go,” said Kouddous. “But once he left, they voiced support for the SCAF, his replacement. The coverage in the US media has been very superficial. It skims the surface of what is happening. They wanted the narrative at the beginning that this was a western-friendly, Facebook-driven, young, cool crowd that led this, and they were at core of it. And they keep calling it a peaceful revolution, but at the end of the day, on January 28, there were 100 police stations that were burnt down, there’s violence all the time. They over-simplify as they tend to do, and have been slow to expose the military’s abuses, starting from the beginning but really in October with the massacre of 17 Coptic Christians in front of Maspero. The New York Times called that, for example, ‘sectarian riots’ when the army killed all those people. That kind of language distorts everything.”

The then Secretary of State Hillary Clinton said initially, “our perception is the Mubarak regime is strong” which was implicit support for the dictatorship in the face of the protests. But as it became so clear that Mubarak could not continue, even the western press changed. Kouddous told me: “People like Anderson Cooper who came at the beginning and did the typical western media stenography – well, the Mubarak government says this and the protesters say this – but on the day the regime sent out thugs on camels they attacked western journalists. Cooper was hit in the head, and the next day, he changed. He was now saying, 'This is a popular mass uprising against a 30-year autocrat', which was the truth."

The Mubarak dictatorship gave the Obama administration no choice but to support the people of Egypt with this kind of violence and eventually President Obama said that Mubarak must step down. But all the time the US were playing behind the scenes too in negotiations to secure what was coming next: first, this took the form of support for Omar Suleiman, Mubarak's spy chief, to replace him. On February 10, 2011, Leon Panetta, then-director of the CIA, even said that Mubarak would step down before it happened. What the Obama administration wanted to see was secular young people who posed no threat to western neoliberal interests taking over the Arab world, but that didn't happen, it was never the Arab Spring. The State Department and White House press briefings from the period very clearly show people in the administration proclaiming their support for Mubarak in the early days of the uprising. It was only when it became clear that this was not going to be viable – and the full story of what happened between the military, Mubarak and the US administration is still not known – there was obviously some kind of deal struck whereby the military decided to sacrifice Mubarak and take power. And then the US came out in support.

US policy toward the Arab Spring was incoherent – they supported protests in countries where the regimes were less friendly and, with the exception of Egypt, tended to be silent on places like Bahrain. A more coherent policy would mean they had to build genuine political alliances with civilian political forces across the region, something the US rarely does. "I think saying Obama was behind the Arab Spring is an insult to all Arabs, it's an insult to my generation, and it's an insult to all the people who were in Tahrir," said Soraya Morayef, an activist. "There's been a lot of rhetoric about how 'they couldn't have done this on their own'. Even Omar Suleiman famously said, 'They're being generated or supported by foreign elements, countries, someone with a political agenda.' The thing is it wasn't. It was organic, it was the coming together of so many different factions of society, not just the youth, not just liberals, it was workers, it was the disenchanted government officials, there were even conscripts from the military that were defecting and joining. It's very insulting to say that any country, especially the US, was behind this. Because one of the chants in Tahrir during the 189 days was chanting against Mubarak and Omar Suleiman being agents of the Americans, and saying 'US, this is what your money is doing, your money is killing our people', and you'd find tear-gas canisters and gunshot canisters with

Made in US on it. The US never supported the revolution, I feel it is responsible in continuing to pay the army that kills its own people."

THE ECONOMICS OF REVOLUTION

In Egypt's case, the International Monetary Fund (IMF) did not impose the traditional strict structural adjustment programs after the revolution, but looked to remake Egypt through more indirect terms. In June 2011, the IMF offered a $3.2 billion loan "without conditions", which no one believed – and it was rejected by the military because it was dangerous politically for them to assume the loan. But Egypt needed foreign currency; they had imported so much that they only had enough to pay for three more months of imports. The government then formally requested the $3.2 billion loan. This time, however, sensing the desperation, the IMF said Egypt had to draw up an economic reform program. The result was an eight-page economic reform package, which included all the same policies of the Mubarak era – the magic words "structural adjustment", the usual "broadening the tax pool", "VAT increases", "sales tax".

In Egypt before the revolution, an extreme form of capitalism was being imposed, in line with Bretton Woods dictates. The rich were getting richer, while the poor got poorer. On top of this, the poor were routinely tortured and the army reacted viciously to strikes. They passed a law soon after the revolution criminalizing strikes and any other action stopping work, resulting in a fine and one year in prison. The Delta bus company had a huge strike for 12 days in December 2011, but the government made promises (which it didn't keep). The workers went back on strike again and this time the army broke the strike by getting soldiers to drive the buses.

It is important to note that the revolution did not occur in a vacuum; it didn't just happen as part of a domino effect after the Tunisian revolution. The Egyptian revolution was 10 years in the making through grassroots organizing. "It took years of coalition building to have grassroots movements behind you to have this thing explode," said Kouddous. "I think its success was the 18 days were seen as this utopia, where we created this Republic of Tahrir, and it had the values and the principles that everyone wanted to see in the rest of the country, or people in Tahrir did. And when Mubarak fell it was seen as this big moment, but I think a lot of people counted their success too early, and let forces in that should have been kept out and fought just as vigorously." He continued: "I think the revolution is really more a state of mind, it's a state of revolution we are living, so it's continuing, it's much more divisive and messy, but I would say that the lesson is that the fight is never easy, and some say never finished, you are always going to be trying to improve it. But when people come together, there's nothing that could have stopped it. I still think nothing can stop it now."

There was actually something unprecedented in history taking place in Egypt: a strike wave that had been going on for seven years without worker organizations. Other countries went through 10 years of strikes but they had unions, they had labor parties, they had revolutionary socialist parties. "Here in Egypt, I believe it's a miracle that you have a strike wave now that has been going for seven years and you don't even have functioning trade unions," Hossam el-Hamalawy, a prominent revolutionary and organizer, told me. In Egypt the structure is very similar to what existed in the Soviet Union and in Eastern Europe: government bureaucrats appoint officials who claim to represent the workplace but in fact they have nothing to do with the workplace. Actually, the state-run unions have been one of the main factors in why several important general strikes have failed; historically, they have always intervened in industrial actions on the side of the police. And yet these strike waves were happening despite the fact there were no worker- run trade unions. Egypt witnessed a rising curve of social struggle between 1968 to 1977, led by workers and students. But it all came to nothing in 1977 when a mini-uprising was crushed. From that point, until 2005, Mubarak managed to destroy every single organization that did anything in the streets. "Mubarak's was not a totalitarian regime, it was an autocratic regime, it was all about him," said el-Hamalawy. "The guy was so paranoid about numbers, to the extent that even one of our satellite sheikhs was forced to leave for Britain a few years ago for nothing, except maybe attracting some following amongst the youth. But in fact he doesn't speak on politics at all, in fact he's very reactionary. But the thing is that he had people around him – that flips out state security." The seeds for revolution had actually been planted in December 2006 with a huge wave of strikes by workers. "Again, the state-run unions are not part of industrial actions unless it's a factory that is being liquidated and the state-run union has not been given their share of bribes, so they are going to be fucked together with the workers. These were the only places I found the state-run unions are the forefront of the strike," said el-Hamalawy. The uprising began with only three independent trade unions, but now in Egypt there is a federation of trade unions that claims to represent 2 million workers.

Nasser was initially affiliated to the Soviets, and the US only really became the major patron of Egypt with Anwar Sadat. But, el- Hamalawy said, Nasser really laid the ground for Sadat's policies later. There was a steady restructuring of the public sector starting in around 1968. The common belief is that the neoliberal period in Egypt started in 1974 with the "intifah" policies of Sadat – in fact, it started in 1968. And in 1970, under the Rogers Plan, set out by US Secretary of State William Rogers to end the Israel–Palestine conflict, Nasser had already recognized Israel and said the 1967 Israel–Palestine borders were legitimate. But still it was Sadat who threw Egypt completely into the American camp, not just in terms of loyalty and affiliation to western imperialism, but in terms of economic policies. Sadat's Egypt and Pinochet's Chile were probably the first two countries to start enacting neoliberal reforms with a vengeance: Egypt in 1974, Pinochet in 1973. But the Egyptian neoliberal program got put on hold in 1977 during the uprising, and the government started procrastinating with the reforms. "They only got the courage and the balls to implement with the outbreak of our War on Terror," said el-Hamalawy. In many ways, War on Terror and neoliberalism always go hand in hand. In Egypt in 1992, the Dirty War started and it was then that Mubarak signed the deal with the IMF and World Bank to implement the Economic Reform and Structural Adjustment Programme (ERSAP), the usual package of neoliberal reforms conducive to the needs of foreign capital and a narrow local elite.

To understand how strange the lack of an organized mainstream left party is, it is necessary to step back from the western media narrative that presents the revolution as a snap uprising inspired by young westernized middle-class Egyptians on Twitter and Facebook. The roots of the current revolution go back to 2004 and involve years of heroic and inspiring actions by working people from Cairo to Alexandria and, in fact, all along the Nile delta. In 2004, the heir-presumptive of the Mubarak kleptocracy, Gamal, was handing out economic portfolios to his thieving friends who instituted IMF prescriptions attempting to privatize further a host of state-owned assets. Workers across the country fought back and started a string of successful strikes outside traditional trade unions, which were basically arms of Mubarak's corporatist state. These groupings greatly upped the number of strikes. In 2004 worker collective actions stood at 202 nationwide. By 2007 it had more than tripled to 614 – often met with severe brutality from the security forces.

THE FUTURE

This heavy history has to be defeated. “I would not say this revolution is successful unless US imperialism and Zionism are defeated in this region,” said el-Hamalawy. “The local and the regional are interlinked, and the international of course, that’s the third dimension. Make no mistake, people like me on the left believe our revolution will be completely destroyed if it is not exported to the rest of the region; you cannot build a democracy on an island in a sea of dictatorships. Egypt is the jewel in the crown of US imperialism in the region, the Americans are not going to leave it, the Israelis are not going to leave it, the Gulfies are not going to leave it, the Europeans are not going to leave it.” In other words, if Egypt falls, the whole Middle East is going to fall – for the imperialist powers. “This current political movement here in Egypt it was all triggered by the Palestinian intifada 11 years ago. I’ve seen the 1990s, there was nothing. You couldn’t pull together anything. The turning point was the Palestinian intifada. For the first time in three decades, you could mobilize the streets, and these mobilizations were over regional issues it is true, but it didn’t take more than 10 minutes to start shifting to deal with local issues. The police turn up, they beat people, then people start chanting ‘Down with Mubarak’. You know the first time I heard ‘Down with Mubarak’ was 2002 and this was unprecedented, you couldn’t chant against Mubarak in the 1990s, it was all about Palestine at the end of the day.”

The West will never stay silent; they will always try to intervene. But the question for the revolutionaries is: are you going to let them intervene? Are you going to organize? It’s been the case all through the history of the racket’s local dictators – from the Shah of Iran to Suharto in Indonesia. No matter if you are a client of the Americans, the most powerful country in human history, if you get the revolution, the Americans can do nothing – the people create a new imagination. Nawal El Saadawi, the most famous feminist writer in the Middle East, was heavily involved with the uprising in Egypt. Hope is power, hope makes me smile, hope makes me live. I am a writer, a novelist, I need hope, I cannot live with a bleak attitude. So long as we have young people here and we go to Tahrir Square I will have hope. We live in a jungle; we don’t live in a healthy society. It’s about power, when the grandfather has money, prestige and power, he rapes the granddaughter, it’s a matter of power. When we finish with this mentality – that it’s not power that dominates, it’s justice, freedom, love, equality – we have revolution, like in Tahrir Square, and we eradicate power.”

In one of Egypt’s neighbors in the Sahel they were close to ending their enslavement to the mentality of domination and power.

SEVENTEEN

SUCCESSFUL DEFIANCE

TUNIS, TUNISIA

I meet Mustafa and Kamal on Avenue Habib Bourguiba, where they protested in January 2011 to get rid of the dictator who had ruled their country with an iron fist for 23 years. Tunisia has changed a lot in the year since then. We ate at the Opium bar-restaurant, one of the many lining the French-style boulevard named after the dictator before Zine al-Abidine Ben Ali. “We couldn’t have done this before, no way,” said Mustafa, a 25-year-old originally from Tabarka in the north of Tunisia. “I mean, the only thing I could have told you is how great Ben Ali is, what a good man he is.” “If you wanted to talk politics in a bar and the police heard you, they will put you in prison,” Kamal told me nonchalantly. “Now I can say what I want to you.”

It was strange coming to Tunis and listening to the scale of repression and police abuse during the Ben Ali era. I had just never heard about it. Before this US/French-backed despot was overthrown, no one in the West seemed to care that we were propping up a police state in one of the UK’s most popular tourist destinations. The US has provided $349 million in military aid since 1987 when Ben Ali came to power in a coup. The tyrant was trained at the former US Army intelligence school at Fort Holabird in Maryland, like so many of the world’s monsters. But the next stage of western connivance in the subjugation of the Tunisian people was the widespread media and political fear over the democratically elected Al-Nahda Party, which was Islamist. The course from actively arming a kleptocratic dictator to pushing for the Tunisians to support “western values” is of course familiar. Franz Fanon wrote in The Wretched of the Earth: “As soon as the native begins to pull on his moorings, and to cause anxiety to the settler, he is handed over to well-meaning souls who … point out to him the specificity and wealth of Western values.”[1] Any right-thinking Tunisian would, of course, see that the most consistent western value in their country is to support dictators. Initially, when people were getting shot by snipers on the streets of Tunis, Hillary Clinton, then Secretary of State, said the US "didn't want to take sides" and was worried about the effect of "unrest and instability" on the US relationship with Tunisia. In the end, over 200 perished. After the revolution won out, Clinton and France's President Nicolas Sarkozy moved on to praising "progress" in the country while also expressing apparent concern that Al-Nahda might impose Iranian-style dictatorship on the Tunisian people. (They didn't care when it was Pinochet-style dictatorship.)

Events followed the typical US imperial modus operandi during a popular uprising against one of its dictator satraps. It goes like this: public ambivalence about the protests alongside private support for the tyrant when it is unclear if the uprising will succeed. Then, when it looks as though the tyrant will not be able to hold on, a switch to public support for the uprising alongside private support for the same regime shorn of its now-discredited figurehead. Such a methodology worked in Egypt: the long-suffering Egyptians now have Mubarakism without Mubarak. Tunisia is different. As Fanon put it: those who were last are now first, while those who were first are now last (or in exile in Saudi Arabia in the case of Ben Ali). The fear of Al-Nahda was misplaced and based on western desire to remain in firm control. There are plenty of clear differences between Tunisia and Iran in 1979 when the revolution overthrew another western-backed torturing tyrant, the Shah. First, Al-Nahda had assembled a coalition including secular socialists and social democrats to form the government. The president, Moncef Marzouki, is a secular human rights activist who spent decades in the wilderness fighting the US-backed atrocities being committed against dissidents in Tunisia.

Second, Tunisian civil society is engaged with the process and will only grow. One of the retrograde patterns you see in a Middle East speckled with US-backed dictatorships is that Islamism is often the only avenue for expressing dislike of the current state of affairs. The space for secular left movements has been crushed since the pan-Arabism of Nasser in Egypt worried the US enough to extinguish the left across the region (helped along by an Israel fearful of the efficacy of the secular nationalism of Fatah in the Occupied Territories). Now that Ben Ali has gone, the lid has been taken off the boiling pot. There was space for young people – in fact, everyone – to breathe here, there were opportunities to engage freely with politics and to think outside of the box. And now outside that box the vista is broader than Islamism. It will take time – perhaps a couple of generations – but the secular left can now grow and will undoubtedly become more significant. Many of the revolutions of the Arab Spring have been led by the tech-savvy young secular left – particularly in Tunisia and Egypt with their large labor movements. Contrariwise, the Islamists – who in many ways had a symbiotic relationship with the brutal US-backed dictatorships they were at war with – will slowly become more irrelevant as these police states fade away. They will have less to feed on, and their policies will now stand the considerable test of governance.

Third, the military acted nobly in Tunisia, unlike in Egypt. Ben Ali fled after the military refused to murder their own people, making them wildly popular in the country. There is also little fear that they will launch a coup against the democracy the Jasmine Revolution created. "They are with the people" is a refrain heard often in Tunis. It is understandable: without them it is possible Ben Ali would still be in place and a river of blood would be flowing down Habib Bourguiba Avenue. In the Opium bar, Mustafa told me he voted for the CPR, a secular left-wing party headed by Mr Marzouki, because he thinks their program is good for the economy and women. But, he said, he doesn't fear Al-Nahda. "I like them," he added. Kamal, on the other hand, voted for Al-Nahda because he thinks they are "good people … They are not extreme. The Salafis are crazy, but they are not very important here."

Clearly, what scared the West more than any Islamist is a secular revolutionary left opposed to the neoliberal order we set up over the past 40 years. That would really hurt the bottom line. Islamists themselves have often been quite welcoming to the Bretton Woods institutions and the neoliberal economic order. With the usual suspects now trying to impose those dictates on Tunisia, it was near impossible for the ruling parties to try something else (even if they wanted to). So far Tunisia has followed US and Bretton Woods dictates to the letter, privatizing many of its state-owned assets (at the same time plumping up Ben Ali's wallet) and eviscerating public institutions and subsidies for fuel and food. Many actually compare Al-Nahda to the Justice and Development Party (AKP) in Turkey, and it is no secret that the AKP has been a dream for business and international capital. In their time in power, the AKP privatized a raft of public assets, including Tekel, the state-owned tobacco and alcohol company, which it agreed to sell off as part of the structural adjustments attached to a $16 billion loan agreement with the IMF. Before Erdogan started acting like the new sultan, the business press was in raptures about the AKP. This was why I worried for Tunisia – not because of Islamists, but because of neoliberals. As Fanon put it: “The apotheosis of independence is transformed into the curse of independence, and the colonial power through the immense resources of coercion condemns the young nation to regression.” Or, in fewer words, take an independent course and starve.

With the period of dictatorship in Tunisia over, the economy is now the big issue, with 45 percent unemployment. It’s what concerns Mustafa and Kemal, both students. “I want the government to help people with jobs,” Mustafa said. “Maybe open some more universities.” Bretton Woods dictates have proved a disaster around the world as a development model. Al-Nahda should look elsewhere, for its own survival. Tunis itself is unrepresentative of the country at large – the further you get from the capital and the coastal tourist regions, the worse the poverty. The government will have to deliver relatively soon – or face more unrest. The spark for the revolution was Mohamed Bouazizi (who now has a street named after him), who set himself on fire in Sidi Bouzid, a poor town 200km from Tunis. This is how it started, and it could erupt again if nothing improves. Expectations are running high. As Mustafa told me: “Before the only thing I could do was eating, drinking, smoking, and sleep. Now there’s more.” The fear has now also drained from the people. “Something in our hearts snapped,” Kamal added as he sipped a beer. “People didn’t care any more. People were telling the military to shoot them.” He added quickly: “WikiLeaks helped people realize how corrupt Ben Ali and his family was.”

As a thank you for helping get rid of this tyrant, the WikiLeaks leaker Chelsea Manning is now facing three decades in prison. Meanwhile, the US politicians and policymakers who propped up Ben Ali for 23 years are talking heads on US cable TV, able to laud the Arab Spring without irony. At the same time, the great liberal President Barack Obama instructed his Department of Justice to launch a case against Julian Assange whose bravery (alongside Manning) helped unleash this unprecedented wave of people power across the Middle East. They are “high-tech terrorists”. The upside-down world.

THE GLOW OF REVOLUTION

In the aftermath of the overthrow of the US-backed dictator Ben Ali, there were immediate successes – committees were established for reform of the media, corruption and human rights. Freedom of speech blossomed: it was now possible to debate the many pressing political, economic, cultural and social issues. For the first time there was an election managed by an independent committee composed of civil society figures, involving people from all social groups; there was also important civil society work, with hundreds of new organizations founded working on human rights issues, and also new issues like citizenship education, media activism, internet mobilization of young people and tolerance.

I went to see Abdel Basset Ben Hassen, the head of the Arab Human Rights Foundation, in the east of Tunis. "I think the revolution was also about questioning what international relations we need for our country," he told me. "This new order should be based on more equality, more respect. I have been working in human rights since 1990. I think that during the dictatorship era the European and western countries had not been very strong against Ben Ali's regime. I think that the Tunisian people have been dignified by the revolution. Human rights were reintroduced in our history – before the revolution our image was really very low. I think that we are giving western countries and the entire world another image of how to be Arab, how to be Muslim, and to fight for democracy and freedoms." The slogans on the streets were now about civil and political rights, and economic and social rights: the right to work, the right to health, the right to education. It was also about equality between social groups and between the interior of Tunisia and the capital, between the cities and rural areas. The revolution put these issues on the table, but they weren't just Tunisian issues, these were global issues. "Working on human rights for the last two years was a kind of resistance," said Hassen. "Human rights work was a way to resist oppression and we trained thousands of Arabs on how to document human rights violations, how to write a report, how to organize a campaign. This was one achievement – how to resist."

What happened in the Arab countries was not just decades of dictatorship; it was centuries of a vertical approach to power. The Tunisian revolution opened an era of revolutions and reform and it will be long. All the social actors tried to redefine their roles after the disappearance of the old regimes. "We were waiting for an era to see that the Arab will claim their freedom, to end these ugly and horrible regimes," said Hassen. "We were waiting to give all this potential locked up in these countries, but at the same time we are conscious that it will be difficult. You know when you open the door to all these changes you will have positive tools to use, but you have all the problems that were waiting."

Maybe what has helped Tunisia more than other Arab countries caught up in tumult was that the civil society in Tunisia was still strong. There was the powerful UGTT union federation, the Tunisian League for Human Rights, the judges' union, the lawyers' union, and the journalists' union. Young people when they graduated and went to work joined a union because it was the only place where you could criticize the government and not get arrested. Tunisia is actually one of oldest countries in the world: for nearly 3,000 years there has been a state in Tunis, Carthage. It was the first Arab state with an ambassador in the US, and it has a history of reformism. In 1846, slavery was forbidden in Tunisia, 17 years before the US, and two years before France. It also had the first constitution in the Arab world, while in 1956 it proclaimed the first law for the family, liberating women and abolishing polygamy. It was also the first Arab country to have a strong workers' movement, formally founded in 1927. Civic engagement and education are deeply rooted in the country and the populace is also educated. In the 1970s the government dedicated nearly 40 percent of the state budget to education: and when you introduce education you introduce criticism.

THE NEW GENERATION

These civil organizations and even the elites suffered a lot under Ben Ali's dictatorial regime. "There was also a big difference between the young generation and Ben Ali's generation," said Mr Hassen. "Those between 18 and 30 years old, and not only in Tunisia, said, 'We cannot accept these kind of old out-of-date regimes. The regimes in the Arab countries were so out of date, and the most stupid and totally closed regime was in Tunisia, and people at some time they cannot accept any more this kind of thing." Tunisians felt that they were not only oppressed by the police state but that their dignity was being attacked by a regime, by a family, that was ruining the country. The Ben Ali family were occupying and stealing everything. In many ways, the first uprising was against this attack on dignity. "You can accept the oppression but at some stage you cannot accept that your dignity is under attack," said Hassen. It started in Sidi Bouzid because the trade union was powerful and the elites were against the regime. "It was possible because all the social categories participated, and it was possible because the slogans of the revolution, it was about dignity, freedom – it was not religion, about tribal issues, about family, about regions, and this made it difficult for Ben Ali to stop this, because it was about universal things."

The internal mechanisms of the regime were very weak at the end; despite the regime's strong appearance, it was a lie. The situation was explosive and when the first demonstration happened in Sidi Bouzid, the police did not try to stop it. It lasted for two days, and then other small cities followed. There was no political reaction, but confrontations were developing all around the country, becoming more and more violent. Then the police supported the protesters. Ben Ali's party did not hold counter-demonstrations, and the dictator was completely isolated.

I spoke to Ahmed Bouazzi whose party was in the resistance against the dictatorship, and worked to weaken the government of Ben Ali. "We were in a long struggle against Ben Ali," he said. "The West is scared of course because Nahda is working for a more independent national policy, more independence for Tunisia; fortunately, they are defending the interests of Tunisia better than under the Ben Ali era, and I am optimistic. I have a big confidence in the Tunisian people; in our history, the people showed that it is a pioneer. It is progressive. The West is scared of Islamism. I think they are still trying in Tunisia to get rid of Nahda and I think it's a big mistake, because Tunisians are pioneers, liberals, they are also very patriotic, they don't accept that someone else makes their politics here, so Nahda will gain from this. Unless there is a coup, and a coup would be a disaster for the country, you have Algeria where 200,000 people died in a civil war." He said further that the revolution had a perceptible effect on the soul of its citizens. "It's very strange to be free. I was thinking about it today when I went to the Ministry of Interior, which is where the torture happened. People changed very fast, they were speaking very freely, and there was no auto-censorship. It is very different now, if I meet plain clothes policemen I am not afraid because they will not arrest me. Before that I was afraid because they could arrest me and I might spend I don't know how long in prison until I got freed. Now it's different, the relationship between citizens and policemen is completely different, there is none of the fear of policemen, it happened very quickly."

The wall of fear had fallen, you could perceive it, and you could feel it in the streets. Tunisians were not silent any more; they didn't respect authority like they used to do. There were sit-ins, protests. The Tunisian mind had been freed.

CULTURE AS A WEAPON OF RESISTANCE

WHAT'S ART GOT TO DO WITH IT?

> "A people's art is the genesis of their freedom."
> Claudia Jones, pioneering political activist, 1915–64

When Soraya Morayef, an activist and budding art curator, walked into Townhouse gallery in Cairo in the aftermath of the ousting of Hosni Mubarak, she expected the usual brush-off. Her friends had previously pitched exhibitions of their passion: graffiti and stencil-based work. Each time they had been turned away. But not now. "When I approached them I really didn't think they would do it," she told me. "I had no credentials, I had no background. But now there is this increasing new interest in graffiti and street art, that's why they eventually took me." Morayef was the beneficiary of a sea-change in the Egyptian art world since the country's revolution sparked an explosion of paint and posters on walls in cities around the country. "The revolution has massively impacted the art scene in Egypt, it's now a lot more diverse and there's a lot of work inspired or based on the revolution," said Morayef.

The same pattern has been seen across the Arab world as people shook their chains in the Arab Spring. Western intelligence officers no longer have to gauge the temperature of the "Arab street" through clandestine interviews; they just have to look at the walls around the cities. In Arabic, it is called "el-fann midan" – literally translated, "art in the square". The mixed experiences of euphoria, mourning and loss have been creatively rendered all over the cities of the Levant.

"Art has played a major role in the Egyptian revolution, for the most part because street art and graffiti as in a western form simply didn't exist, now it's everywhere," said Omar Ozalp, co-owner of the Articulate Baboon gallery on the outskirts of Cairo. "More importantly, each one carries a message, be it political or social, which for once has the Egyptian population thinking." The other co-owner of the gallery, Adam Maroud, added: "Corner after corner after corner was suddenly emblazoned with a battle cry in rushed lettering or a perfect stencil of pop culture political satire and it was beautiful and stirring to watch it spread. Nothing to me personifies creative freedom more than a bold graffiti piece on a very public wall."

And it's not just the Middle East. Art has flourished around the world in this revolutionary torrent – from Haiti to Chile to China – as people fought back against totalitarian governments and tried to make sense of broken societies using brushes as well as bricks. For many young people, street art became the "perfect crime" when living in a closed dictatorship with no free press. If you do not get caught in the act, most of the time there is no way for the authorities to track you down.

"I think the creative output during this unfinished revolution is an integral part in its continuation and the direction it's bound to take," said Ganzeer, the most prominent street artist in Egypt, who was arrested for making posters at the height of the protests. His colorful paintings of martyrs killed by the security forces dot Cairo, as do his montages juxtaposing brutality inflicted on protesters with information about US aid to the military regime. Ganzeer added that the move out of galleries, as artists take their work to the people, also represents a "democratization" of the creative arts. "The streets are for everybody. The gallery is for an art-seeking niche. It's very wrong for the streets to be so open to the brainwashing effects of capitalist-driven advertisers and so closed off to honest art. Galleries need to exist, but it shouldn't be the only way to be able to experience art."

In crisis-wracked Europe, the indignados in Spain, as well as young people in Germany, Greece and France, also used their city walls as canvases to get their message across. Evol is a German artist who had a gallery show in London, but the 39-year-old's main work is stenciling windows on concrete slabs slung out on the street, turning them into drab housing estates. "Life is a reflection of the circumstances I live in," he said. "Whatever happens to me I will try to transport into art." Ganzeer feels something similar: "I feel the core purpose of creative arts lies in its social relevance."

Street art has captured the imagination of the younger generation of artists in the West over the past decade, symbolized by British artist Banksy. But while the anonymous Bristolian has garnered much of the attention, there is now a dedicated phalanx of scribblers working alongside him – and their ranks have ballooned and "globalized". For many of the new generation, the period where the pursuit of money appeared to rule all forms of creativity – viz. the canonization of Jeff Koons and Damien Hirst – is over. The postmodern ironies of the Young British Artists movement have been destroyed by the immediacy of the human crisis happening around the world. Young artists now feel the need to reflect on the chaos of global events through their art. They are not seeking to engage with the world retrospectively but as part of the ongoing struggles, hoping to bring about real, tangible change. In this sense, it is not just the venue that has changed – from the gallery to the street – but the content, too.

"Before the revolution we were falling into clichés and trying to express things between brackets," said Khaled Hafez, a prominent Egyptian artist in the traditional gallery setting. "But since 9/11, more and more political issues are being expressed in art installation practices. The Arab Spring has really accelerated that." Resistance artists are the modern-day heirs to a tradition that goes back hundreds of years and boasts some of the all-time greats, including Picasso and Goya. But even with such a rich and proud history, the prospects today are more exciting than ever. Art has been democratized by the capitulation of the tyranny that the highbrow crowd used to impose on aesthetic pursuits, and a revolution in technology that can put a camera, spray can or paintbrush in the hand of any kid with a thirst for creativity.

YOU CAN'T BUY THIS

The recent upsurge in revolutionary street art has rudely challenged many of the sacred cows in traditional art circles, paralleling the population's political awakening. Since the seminal 1999 anti-World Trade Organization protests in Seattle, there has been a resurgence of forms of art engaged in social and political protest. Ideas of what constitutes art, where art is shown and who does art were all shaken violently. But the fight against the gallery-based model has been largely successful, and the traditional art world is now playing catch-up. More traditional, gallery-based art elites in the West have pushed back – and this is no different in Egypt. "We should remember that the Middle East is still conservative," said Hafez. "Street art is not gallery art, but we are in a revolutionary situation, and it helped mobilize people. There was fabulous graffiti art, and personally, I think change is impending." He added: "I have learnt a lot from the younger generation like Ganzeer." Ganzeer agreed, and said the traditional sectors of the art world in Egypt have shot themselves in the foot by not showing more enthusiasm for the new generation. "I think the majority of the traditional art elite have proven the inability of their art to speak or relate to society via their inability to artistically engage in the revolution," he said. "Many may have engaged as citizens, and protested just like everybody else, but few have been able to engage artistically."

The direct engagement with societal issues in this way is not wholly new in the art world. It relates back to the work of the Russian Constructivists, such as Alexander Rodchenko and El Lissitzky, who wanted to make an art of constructed abstract elements that represented the movements in society and of the Bolshevik revolution. They stopped making one-off art works to produce printed material, posters, pamphlets, and placards that could be used by the Russian people. Their work was later banned under Stalin, who wanted a much more dictatorial form of art, or pure propaganda that didn't engage in more avant-garde abstraction. We don't have Stalin now, but we do have corporations who own all the available space in our public arena to advertise their products.

Political artists following on from the Constructivists include German antifascist artist John Heartfield, who devised a form of photomontage that became a weapon against the rise of Nazism. His work was so powerful that he was high on the Nazi hit list and had to flee Germany. In one of his most famous montages he showed Hitler doing his customary salute and a giant businessman handing him money, highlighting that behind all Hitler's socialist rhetoric it was big business that supported his rise to power. The image wasn't shown in an art gallery: it was on the front cover of the German weekly magazine AIZ. In many ways, "street art" goes all the way back to the caves of Lascaux, where primitive men (and women) decorated their walls with pictures of horses, stags, and bison. Back then, there was no Egyptian security force or Chinese intelligence officers to imprison the artists. There are now.

Of course, art cannot initiate social transformation by itself, but it is increasingly vital in expanding the imaginations of those working toward it. Knowledge of how the world operates that comes solely from newspaper articles and academic books often affects our most cynical and fatalistic impulses; these impulses are pervasive among young people, and they get more frequent, not less, as the bad news comes faster. Looking at an image that connects events in ways you haven't yet conceived, or an installation that reconstructs in visceral form something you've read about, can propel this cynicism felt by the younger generation toward action. And it has. The possibilities for artistic collaboration and the ability to say something about the world without needing to steep it in the depressing banalities of everyday political discourse are providing a sanctuary for the younger generations, fed up with what is often called "mainstream" politics.

Some people say that all art is political. This is like saying that all politicians are political: it's technically true, but in reality the majority tailor their beliefs to the exigencies of their respective political systems and become model commissars. Power is the motivator, and the politics falls into line after. The same goes for art's own commissars whose work is conceived and sold as a commodified product, complete with conscious branding and the related newspaper fanfare about "controversy" or "celebrity buyers". There is nothing "political" about it; in fact, the branding is the antithesis of political because rather than questioning the contemporary situation, it accepts all its presuppositions – no matter how violent or unjust – and seeks to ride on the froth of money and fame that tops this wave. True political art, as distinguished from its banal and transient cousin, is trying to change the world as it is rather than observe it. It seeks to delve into the nightmares of the contemporary consciousness, investigate the deep cavities and expose the most diligently repressed secrets and terrors. It reformulates images and signs and gives us all a means through which to reinterpret the world. Joining the dots becomes revolutionary, which surely says less about the art than the prevailing ideology, which allows us to live happily without making the connections between the violence we unleash and the corpses all over the Middle East, East Asia, Africa and Latin America that are our testimony.

SHAKING OFF THE STRAITJACKET

I interviewed a number of famous musicians and actors who have strident antiwar, anti-racket politics. The lead singer of Massive Attack, Robert Del Naja, has always been extremely political. During the run-up to the Iraq war – with Thom Yorke of Radiohead – he took out a full-page advert in NME denouncing military action. He told me: "How we get our culture, how we get our politics spelt out to us, how the news is read to us, how our choices are laid out, does come through the media. These are the things that people should be more concerned with." Why is this artificial barrier erected between politics and art, then? "It suits a lot of people's business and political interests to try to separate the two when actually they are actually joined at the hip," he said astutely. "I think sometimes when you're trying to present music for music's sake, sometimes you don't want it to be politically charged because you want it to be about a simple music experience, an escape. Other times it is a very integral part of it, definitely."

Gael García Bernal is a Mexican actor who has never shied away from giving political opinions, and speaks with real knowledge about the politics of Latin America and further afield too. The man who famously played Che Guevara in The Motorcycle Diaries film is unabashedly "of the left", and has been an activist as far back as the 1994 Zapatista uprising in Chiapas, Mexico, on the first day of the NAFTA. "I've been told, 'You're an actor, you cannot talk about politics, you know nothing about politics'," he told me. "There still exists that mythology that no one who is not an 'expert' in politics can have an opinion on politics. It's ridiculous because we're such political animals." He added: "As an actor it's about exploring these uncertain areas rather than having a preconceived idea or answer. It's more about provocation and asking the terrible questions. My position therefore is sometimes a bit greyish because I don't buy into the pamphlet. What is motivating is when the audiences ask new questions, get new perceptions, not when you give them opinions digested, the complete answer, that has another shape." Bernal is optimistic about the future of Latin America, especially the "pink tide" of democratic left-wing governments that has swept the region over the past decade, which shows no sign of being turned back (yet). "Like [Slavoj] Žižek says, Bush deserves a Nobel Peace Prize for having eradicated the hegemony of the United States, he singlehandedly completely destroyed it," Bernal said. "Now it's a whole different world. Argentina, for example, most of its business is with China, and Brazil as well. There is a lot of hope in that sense, it's not the world we grew up in, it's a whole different thing. I think that the left in Latin America still have lots of debts from the 1960s, '70s, '80s, things they have to complete, to deliver. Argentina is the only country that has looked back on the people that were part of the military coup and junta and put them in prison, it's the only country that has done that, that is reason enough to support [President] Cristina Kirchner." Bernal is unusual in the world of entertainment – he has a political opinion and can back it up at length and with real knowledge. It's a rare quality in a world where some sort of bland, non-specific “social activism” is now a must for most celebrities, but questioning the PR lines fed to them by their handlers is almost non-existent. “I would love athletes, sports figures, to be more political,” he said. “Remember Socrates the Brazilian player was very critical of the junta there. Or the guys in ’68 here in Mexico City with black power. It adds so much depth to them, it’s incredible when they do it, but right now you don’t see them involved in anything.”

Damon Albarn, the lead singer of Blur and Gorillaz, has been at the forefront of the anti-war and debt cancellation movements. When I visited him at his house in south London, he told me: “The war in Iraq was the result of our inability to express what I think was a consensus that this was a terrifying idea and a very badly thought-out one.” He is particularly scathing about his fellow musicians who showed a shameful cowardice in not joining him and Massive Attack’s Robert Del Naja in speaking out. “It was very difficult to find anyone. And I don’t want to name names because they are people who I respect but for some reason, they were very reticent to stand with us … A lot of people who you would now associate with being anti-war at that particular point didn’t seem to be prepared to do it.”

Tom Morello, the guitarist of the band Rage Against the Machine, once remarked: “A good song should make you wanna tap your feet and get with your girl. A great song should destroy cop cars and set fire to the suburbs. I’m only interested in writing great songs.” When I met Radiohead’s Thom Yorke I asked him his opinion on this seemingly fraught relationship between the political and the creative. “I wonder if you did a Venn diagram of how they coincided, or if you did a straw poll of their sympathies in terms of art what you’d get back,” he said. “I guess it depends on how broad you see the definitions of politics, and how broad you see the definition of art or music. If you see art and music as something that extends beyond this little bit of plastic that goes in your CD machine, and if you see politics as something that’s happening not just in the Houses of Parliament, then I think you can’t use that argument at all – it’s utter bollocks.” But “you’ll never change them,” Yorke said when I asked about the temptation to lobby politicians. “They’re going to get more from you than you get from them, generally speaking.” Despite his evident passion, Yorke seemed reluctant to assume any role as a voice of his generation. “I’d dearly love to not be interested in it at all,” he said. “It is ultimately a very sterile, barren, place to spend your time thinking of things. Even back in college, you get involved in it initially and then you see all the petty wranglings going on, and you think, This is so pathetic, and you want to get the fuck out really." When I asked Yorke about the awareness of the American populace of their country's nefarious actions in the world, he exclaimed: "They have no idea! But I think the Iraq thing has been interesting – the mainstream press took a long time to come around, but when they did come round it was a big thing. When they did start, they were exposing it for what it was."

ART AND POLITICS

The interface of politics and art has always been a tense one, with some of the more conservative elements in the art world accusing political art of being "agit-prop". They argue that when you engage directly with politics, you deplete your sophistication. But things are changing. "There is a very reactionary strand in the art world that says that you shouldn't make work that's overtly political," said Peter Kennard, a senior lecturer in photography at the Royal College of Art in London, one of Britain's foremost political artists, and my father. "You can imply, but that's also to do with the art world being about selling work." He added: "Our understanding of art has become over-aestheticized and I think the only thing that can change that, which is changing it, is the pressure of crisis in the world." If you look at Kennard's work, as well as being eerily beautiful, it is bleak and brutal. The poor and destitute scream out from the financial pages, arms dealers play roulette with million-dollar weapons, and medals are awarded to US and UK soldiers for war crimes. And yet, despite the pathos of his work, he retains a Gramscian "pessimism of the intellect, optimism of the will" type philosophy: the belief that critical art has the power to transform the world and attitudes. "People do think critically about the world through art," he said. "Because they can see the images they get in the news transformed, separate images connected up to give new meaning to them, to show how things connect in the world. So with photomontage you've got actual images of things that happened – someone took that image – and by putting it with other images you can then create the connections to show how the world is actually put together. In the media, we see everything disconnected – the adverts, the news stories – everything is disconnected and all over the place. When you put them together you can then show where the link is and that is very important."

In places like Palestine the use of artistic expression to make sense of the same disconnected world is very common. The most moving and powerful testament to the plight of the occupied peoples in the West Bank and Gaza has come in exhibitions like "100 Shaheed – 100 Lives" which opened in February 2001 and was a reaction to the escalation of Israeli violence in October 2000. The exhibition aimed to celebrate the ordinary lives of the first 100 victims of this violence by featuring everyday objects, gathered by a group of field researchers, that were held dear by each of the dead. This example in Palestine is a symptom of the gradual politicization of creativity, in literature as well as art, all over the world. "I think people are not so ironical and cynical now," Kennard said. "People are trying to work out how they relate as individuals to the world because the world is impinging on our lives so much – we can't deny it any more that there is a crisis going on in the world, so it is impinging on the work they do. It doesn't mean they do very direct images about it, but certainly that anxiety about how to live and what to do in the world is coming through in the work."

Obviously, being politically strident always carries risks, even in ostensibly free societies. Artists have always been regarded with suspicion by those who wield economic or political power – particularly when they are direct and trenchant in their work. Free creation has always been the direct antithesis of the cold logic of power.

A few years ago Kennard was commissioned by Damon Albarn to make a montage as part of mobile phone company Orange's "Light Up London" campaign. His photomontage of the Virgin Mary with the logo of the Campaign for Nuclear Disarmament in place of a halo and the earth for a head never went up because it was censored by Orange who deemed it offensive to "grandmothers and small children". "All big shows now in galleries have to be sponsored because there isn't enough public money going in so they have to sponsor them," said Kennard. "The sponsor wants to get an image across that tallies in with their company so they like edgy Damien Hirst-type things which aren't specific, but if you're politically specific in what you do it's very difficult to get sponsorship and then it's very difficult to get a big public exhibition, so sponsorship does have a knock-on effect. It is much more quiet and insidious than censorship but it means that certain things don't get seen. So there is a façade that they are encouraging dissent but when it becomes too serious they cut it off." Does he think that the need for sponsorship blunts dissent? "Well, people work outside the system – they make their own spaces, they work collectively, they work in the street, and they work in smaller spaces," he said. "So there are lots of different ways to get work out. And there are lots of people working collaboratively." Is this censorship a new phenomenon? "No, it's always been like that. This century, very political work is being kept under covers – a lot of really good work is only allowed to come when the person is dead and the issues they are dealing with are over. It's not new but it's more powerful now in the sense that private money is so vital to the art world now that it's really difficult to work without it." As Kennard wrote in his comment piece for the Guardian: "censorship is something one doesn't speak of in the free-market – it brings back memories of Lady Chatterley and Lord Chamberlain."

The impingement of politics and violence on the everyday lives of artists may be new in post-9/11 England, but in Northern Ireland it has been this way for decades. As the Northern Irish artist Liam Kelly wrote: "In the North of Ireland over the intensive period of political troubles (1968–1998 and the first IRA ceasefire) landscape was not something to be celebrated but interrogated and petitioned." The themes of land and territory come up time and time again as you look at resistance art in this troubled spot. Take Willie Doherty whose 1987 installation piece. In the Walls arranges text to settle over sections of a horizontal panoramic view of the Bogside area of Derry in daylight. This makes it so that, in the words of Kelly, "we/the artist or the colonized/the colonizer take in the view and take up a position".

The collapse of the Argentine economy in 2001 also saw an explosion of artistic creativity. As the middle classes were depleted and 50 percent of the population plunged below the poverty line, many citizens began to use the objects and spaces around them to create art that spoke of their grievances and desire for change. A collective of artists, based in the coastal city of Mar del Plata, began taking over buildings that had become derelict as a result of the economic crash, and creating installations in them.

Similar things are happening in the Chiapas region of Mexico where the Zapatistas are fighting for land rights (as we have seen). Gustavo CP is a famous muralist from the Zapatista-controlled territories of southeast Mexico, and he is often in Europe showing the work he and others are putting together as part of one of the most exciting popular movements in the world. He said: "As in all acts in our lives, the ways of relating to each other, and the ways we make our dreams and put them together, are part of creating our cultural values. And to put them up in the walls, like with these murals, is not an easy job. It is not a one-person job either, or a job for just a specific group of people. It is a job for a whole society that by nature impacts on certain people, who, in return want to contribute to community. In this way a dynamic and enriching relationship of collective creation takes place, which can lead to many other dreams and possibilities".[1]

In places like Afghanistan under the Taliban "photography was to all intents and purposes banned", according to Thomas Dworzak who visited Afghanistan as a photojournalist in 2001. All depictions of living creatures, including animals, were erased from the public eye, and photographic portraiture was illegal. Studio photographers in Kandahar told Dworzak that members of the Taliban would come into the studio when passport photography was allowed again and would pose with make-up and guns in front of garish synthetic backdrops such as gardens full of flowers. These images have now become artworks in their own right, saying more about the narcissism and immorality of Taliban rule than a million words. The indestructible human instinct for art and images is evinced clearly by this vignette, and you hear stories about all kinds of resistance art coming from those who are living under stultifying dictatorships all over the world.

Since the earthquake struck in January 2010, leaving a whole society traumatized, one artist has been out decorating Port-au-Prince with beautiful murals and graffiti pieces as a way of expressing his own hopes and fears for the country. "I was never a big fan of politics," Jerry Rosembert told me, but added that the extent of the trauma in Haiti means he has had to engage. "I am obliged to commentate on my country because things are bad, and for me, it is the best way of giving my ideas worth and value." His art is just another way of communicating a message – a cry to be heard in a society rendered silent by a natural disaster. "Certain people do this their way sometimes in the newspapers or on the TV, but the graffiti, this represents me more, and this is a type of commentary I enjoy a lot."

The Art Spring has stretched to South America, too, with the Chilean student protests inspiring a surge in graffiti and cartoons on the streets of Santiago and other cities. Brazilian political cartoonist Carlos Latuff went to Chile during the protests and said he saw art students and passersby producing cartoons and paintings on the walls in support of the uprising to an extent he'd never experienced in Latin America. The cross-border pollination of art has been huge. Latuff is in high demand in Egypt and across other parts of the Middle East. Even before the January 25 protest that began the Egyptian revolution, Latuff was receiving requests for illustrations from protesters. “This was pretty amazing,” he said. “I usually produce stuff and it will be used, but this was different – they were making specific requests. They felt cartoons and art could help their campaign.”

At the beginning of the civil war in Syria, the most famous political cartoonist in the country, Ali Farzat, was attacked at night in his car in Damascus. “We will break your hands so that you’ll stop drawing,” the thugs told him, before doing exactly that. He was dumped by the roadside. “This is just a warning,” they told him. In China, Ai Weiwei, the iconic artist whose work has bravely taken on themes of repression in his home country, was arrested by the authorities and held incommunicado for months on spurious charges, which still stand. In Honduras, the first two people arrested after the 2009 coup were President Manuel Zelaya and cartoonist Allan McDonald, who had published cartoons in support of the deposed president. In 2003, the US government asked for a tapestry version of Picasso’s anti-war masterpiece Guernica, which is on permanent display at the UN, to be covered with a blue curtain when Colin Powell made his notorious error-filled speech about Iraqi weapons of mass destruction and the need for invasion. It seems counter-intuitive. Why would the most powerful country in the world care about a piece of art decorating a room at the UN? And why would the world’s newest superpower care about one man making piles of seeds in a studio in Beijing? “Artists, especially cartoonists, can make it easy for everyone to understand a difficult political statement,” said Carlos Latuff, whose cartoons have become an accompaniment to uprisings all over the world. “We have the ability to make fun of dictators and, of course, dictators are not fond of humor.”

ART ON THE STREETS

There is some debate as to what the term “street art” actually means. It is an appellation that describes a genre of art rather than work that is done outside. But Swoon, one of the few women in the field, thinks this is wrong. “For me, if I’m working outside, then fine, call it street art, but if I’m working inside, then it’s an installation,” she said. “For me it doesn’t seem useful.” Many practitioners believe the label is another way of demeaning an art form that is encroaching on a nervous elite. “Sometimes it seems that people need a name for something, if they don’t know it by a name they can’t grasp it,” said Evol. “I dislike the expression.” As Proudhon reminded us a century ago, property is theft, and using private property as a canvas to express yourself is a way of reclaiming privatized wealth and rendering it public. In that critical moment, the canvas of some bank building or shop front becomes yours, or ours. Ours because graffiti is one of the most altruistic art forms – colorful and complex pieces are put up for our benefit while we stroll the streets, at considerable financial and sometimes legal costs to the artist. Take, for example, advertising, which is everywhere – all over buildings, walls, transport, schools. This stuff is there purely to manipulate and make money out of us, but when advertising sneaks its way into every nook and cranny of our public and private spaces, there isn't a law enforcement agency to be seen.

Artists like Banksy, meanwhile, haven't been able to resist the zombification of their art by the mainstream. This process was called "repressive tolerance" by Herbert Marcuse and "the society of the spectacle", by Situationist Guy Debord. It is a danger to all artists trying to subvert the racket while working within the racket. Work which started as a critique of war and social inequality can be brought into the mainstream and commodified and sold to the people of whom it was initially critical, emptied of its message. Naomi Klein mentions in her book No Logo, which was published in the weeks following Seattle, that Nike had begun employing young graffiti artists to graffiti Nike posters to give them more street-cred. With these corporate behemoths inhaling all creativity and co-opting any anti-establishment ideas, it's a struggle for the artists who don't want to end up making decoration for Goldman Sach's lobby. When Diego Rivera, the famed Mexican muralist, painted a fresco at the behest of the Rockefellers for their center in Manhattan in the 1930s, he included a May Day workers' parade and an image of Lenin. Rockefeller was deeply angry and asked him to remove Lenin; when Rivera refused, he ordered the destruction of the fresco.

The active repression of totalitarianism and the slow-burn repression of corporate control should be challenged by artists with integrity enough to continue standing outside the mainstream. Art and creative expression, because they exist beyond the normal coordinates of control, have the power to scare those at the top. The art-industry intellectuals and academics who have proposed for so long that political art is merely crude agitprop or literary doggerel are being made to look stupid by a new generation of artists who don't see their role as making pretty pictures and designing clever concepts for boardrooms. They are using creativity as an integral part of a justice movement that is inchoate but growing in substance and definition. They have internalized Brecht's timeless dictum that "Art is not a mirror held up to reality, but a hammer to shape it".

The explosion of technology and social media has been a vital corollary to this movement. Facebook and Twitter have not just allowed activists to organize, but have also provided a key tool for disseminating pictures. They have accelerated this "democratization" of art by making it much easier to circumvent the gallery, which had previously been a prerequisite to building an audience. "Especially in the past year I have been using Twitter and Facebook to spread the artworks, which has played an important role in getting them out," said Carlos Latuff. "If I upload a single cartoon it takes 15 minutes to get sometimes 3,000 hits, depending on the issue. It's amazing how you put up a single cartoon and it spreads like a fire." Moving outside of the gallery also changes the audience. In a revolutionary situation, the aim is often to reach as many people as possible. Street art is in some way inherently political, in a way gallery art isn't. The people who see it have no choice in the matter – unlike those who venture into a gallery on a Sunday afternoon. Now, the wall is the gallery, and the audience has multiplied exponentially. "I use the space for everyone who is living or passing by there, I'm naturally speaking to anyone passing by," said Evol. "No one asked me to do it so I can't ask for a reaction in a certain way."

Krzysztof Wodiczko is a Polish artist who teaches at Harvard University and is famous for his projections, including projecting a swastika on the South African embassy in London during the apartheid era. He has used his art to further the causes he believes in for the past 40 years. But, he said, he's never been this excited. "In '68 there was legitimate criticism that art was being too conservative in its choice of media, and therefore its capacity to reach those who really needed reaching. Artists were indulging in some posters, but what was needed was something to engage the mass media." Now, he said, "the whole cultural geography of resistance benefits from mobile communication. Even though authorities will try to censor it, there will be ways around it with other inventions."

CULTURE OCCUPIED

At the height of the Occupy Wall Street protests in New York, I was on a night march across the Brooklyn Bridge when we all suddenly felt like dissident superheroes. As we looked up, the Verizon building that stands at the foot of the bridge began to be illuminated with projections – exactly like those calling on Batman when he was needed to take on evil in Gotham City. A huge "99percent" was flashed up along with slogans like "Another World is Possible" and "Occupy Earth – we are winning". Cheers went up among the protesters, but no one knew who was doing it. The big, impenetrable corporate office of Verizon – which was under pressure over its treatment of striking workers – was being hijacked and there was nothing the police or the company could do about it. Rumors flew about who the projectors were, but in the following days they were revealed as the Dawn of Man, a production company based in the city, which had been around for years but was only now doing directly political work. Like so many others, the uprisings of 2011 had pushed them into engaging for the first time. "Personally, I have been inspired," said Max Nova, a young artist from Colorado and one-half of the Dawn of Man collective. "Not just to be political, but to do work that is directly focused on making a change, spreading awareness about important issues." The Occupy movement has been synonymous with sign-making and art installations from the beginning. The first thing you noticed when arriving at Zuccotti Park was that everyone had their own signs, some scrawled on pizza boxes, some professionally printed photomontages. There was an evident need to creatively express dissatisfaction rather than just shout about it. Nova said the projections that night were made from a private residence. "We had cops looking into the apartment, but they couldn't get in without a warrant," he said. "It is interesting how art has become a fundamental factor," he continued. "If you look at working groups in New York Occupy Wall Street, the arts and culture one is vastly larger than the other groups. A lot of artists find themselves drawn to this."

Krzysztof Wodiczko actually draws a distinction between two different types of political art – the direct and indirect. "My experience in Poland under the previous regime was that because it had this image of an open system, or a system with a human face that transformed itself into more of democracy, it was in fact, very scared of dissent that may contradict this. So artists were allowed to speak, to deal with politics, as long as they were doing this indirectly, in a metaphoric way. Once they move into more of a direct link, or people recognize them as political activists, at the same time as artists, then they will be in jail, or prevented from speaking or communicating." Latuff is an example of this. He is banned from Israel because he has made cartoons critical of the government's treatment of Palestinians. In Brazil, he has been arrested three times for producing his pieces. "I believe in what Che Guevara called internationalism, solidarity with people," he said. "If I've got a skill, I think it's necessary to put this skill at the service of the social movement. The artist cannot ignore art as a tool for change. Especially not now."

The co-option of culture by the resistance, it seems, is the most potent example of how the fight against the racket is real, global and interlinked. From Occupy protesters to Palestinians resisting the oppression of the Israeli state, the racket is under joint attack from inside and outside its headquarters in the United States of America. The victims of this system – the 99 percent of humanity made into serfs – are seeing that they have more in common with people across national boundaries than they do with the racketeers at the top of their own society. Like these dissident artists, we must use all the available tools for change to smash the racket, crush its criminal syndicate and build a fair future. We all have a role to play. To paraphrase Arundhati Roy, now is the time to stop adoring our oppressors, who are the Living Dead, and learn to love ourselves. You know how it works: arm yourself and join the War of Independence to sever us from the racket once and for all.

AFTERWORD

EMPIRE'S PROPAGANDISTS

Our world is ruled by a racket. This racket is an amalgamation of different players, including transnational corporations, banks, hedge and mutual funds, and insurance companies; in effect, the many different concentrations of private wealth we have in our society. We often don't know the names of the people who run these institutions, but they hold the real power in our world, and are backed by the US government, and as a last resort the US military.[1] But the racket is nothing without the media. They give this network's rapacious actions a moral sheen and maintain the potent ideologies whereby theft from the poor by the rich is translated into altruistic projects for the world's poor. In the aftermath of The Racket's publication, curious people asked me why – if what I was saying was true – this mafia-like elite got away with it so easily, and everyone was missing the real story. The answer is the media, and I will try in this afterword to show how it works in practice.

The most important consideration at the off is that the media is, of course, owned by the racket, so there is no surprise that it reflects the racket's priorities. In the US, six companies own 90 percent of the media.[2] In the UK, Rupert Murdoch's News International media company, even after the closure of the News of the World, still comprises 34 percent of newspaper circulation in the country and, had it not been for phone-hacking revelations, it would almost certainly have acquired 100 percent of broadcaster BSkyB.[3]

Second, everyone arrives at the top thinking the right things. At the Financial Times I learnt quite quickly that the racket and the media are in essence the same thing, and journalists do its bidding without conscious effort. There's no need for an intensive program of brainwashing. As a journalist, by the time you reach the heights of these ideological institutions your editors assume you will already have internalized what you can and can't say. You will know, for example, that the West is not like the rest of the world. The UK and US are noble, even if we sometimes make mistakes we are allowed to criticize. At the end of the day, when all is said and done, we are the Good Guys. That is another facet of how the charade is maintained: the media system in the West doesn't work by active censorship. The beauty of the system is that you don't need to tell journalists what to write – they support the status quo as a reflex. The proprietors work on the ethos that "you say what you like, because we like what you say". If you start testing the boundaries of our "free press" you will know about it – and be out of a job. Rosa Luxemburg, quoted in chapter 15, comes to mind again: those who do not move, do not notice their chains. Very few journalists in the corporate media are moving, so they believe our press is free. I can confirm it is not.[4]

As I saw young journalists coming up in the industry I noticed opinions changing or moderating as they became acclimatized to the institutions. A famous Winston Churchill phrase goes that if you're not a socialist in your twenties, you've got no heart, and if you're not a conservative in your thirties, you've got no brain. Churchill was half right, but he got the reason wrong. In terms of the media, if you're not a conservative by your thirties then it doesn't mean you haven't got a brain, it merely means you haven't acclimatized to the conservative media institutions that have been set up for you to enter. It's no coincidence that people get less idealistic as they get older. That's how the system works to root out ideas dangerous to it, maintaining control of those that sit at its apex. So, slowly, you stop expressing opinions that are different from everyone else's, and you shed any previously held idealism. If you do carry on thinking as before, you quickly become a "maverick" or, even worse, "immature" and "childish". It's hard to go into work every day for a whole career under this kind of groupthink pressure and stay sane. Few try for long. From my experience, it's not Machiavellian – people don't actively think "I'm going to become a neoliberal warmonger so I can get higher up the hierarchy of my newspaper". But people slowly temper their opinions, gradually shaving off their "rougher edges" in order to become part of the institutionalized thinking. If you enter somewhere like the FT, everyone has a very rigid idea of how the global economy works and if you don't share that idea, you'll be out. That's, of course, how all power systems work. They don't work by promoting dissidents or people that think differently from everyone else; they wouldn't last long if they did.

INHUMANITY

Because of the central role the business press plays in greasing the cogs in the economic system, following newspapers dedicated to covering the inner workings of the racket, such as the FT, is probably the best way into understanding the capitalist id. For me, the specialist financial media, especially the less polite parts of it, is the best means to understand the sickness that festers at the root of our world. In his landmark work The Sane Society, the psychoanalyst Erich Fromm wrote: “That millions of people share the same forms of mental pathology does not make these people sane.” A CBS News report from the aftermath of the death of Venezuelan president Hugo Chávez is a perfect example. It reveals so beautifully the inhuman priorities of the racket’s media, and by extension of our whole economic system. After talking about the reaction of the oil market on news of the death of Chávez – the democratically elected leader of Venezuela who had made massive successes in reducing poverty and destitution – the journalist continued (and bear in mind this is not satire): “Chavez invested Venezuela’s oil wealth into social programs including state-run food markets, cash benefits for poor families, free health clinics and education programs. But those gains were meager compared with the spectacular construction projects that oil riches spurred in glittering Middle Eastern cities, including the world’s tallest building in Dubai and plans for branches of the Louvre and Guggenheim museums in Abu Dhabi.”[5]

In the capitalist id, way deeper than all the useful ideology about poverty reduction through economic growth and liberalization, lies this kind of calculation. Free health clinics and education for the poor majority, who for centuries have been locked out of their own country’s mineral wealth, are irrelevant, unimportant. In this understanding of the world, the human being is second-class. What is important is the object, the flashy building where the rich can feel important and puffed up with status. This continues across the board, although the priorities of the racket media are not often so casually exposed. The day after the massacre of 34 striking mine workers in the South African town of Marikana, for instance, I was writing a market report for the FT, and the newspaper posted a blog entry about the company that employed the mine workers headlined “Lonmin: killings cast a long shadow”. The long shadow wasn’t the impact on the families of the dead, or the criminal responsibility of the company that the workers were striking against. Instead the post noted the tragedy that “Shares in Lonmin, the platinum mining group at the centre of the dispute, plunged by 10 percent in Johannesburg early on Friday as details of the shootings at the company’s Marikana mining complex near Rustenburg were revealed.” It continued that, even worse, “A tragedy of this scale will have a political, economic and social impact – which seems certain to affect the investment climate.”[6] Ladies and gentlemen, the highest of crimes in the business press. Murdered workers – well, that’s life. But hurting an investment climate – that’s a crisis! In South Africa’s Business Day journal, concern in the aftermath was similarly focused on what the massacre would mean for investors. “Deadly Marikana shootout could deter investment, economists warn,” they cautioned.[7]

Examples of this inhumanity are legion. The Wall Street Journal, publishing an article on the death of mass-murdering US-armed Indonesian dictator General Suharto, noted that “The positive contributions of the man who made Indonesia a respected member of the international community deserve … emphasis.”[8] This is a man who carried out, in East Timor, one of the worst genocides of the 20th century. He was, though, good for business, which is all we ask of him to qualify for a good write-up. When the conservative Colombian president Alvaro Uribe left office, the Financial Times ran an article with the headline “After the saviour, what happens next?”[9] This is a man who presided over killings on a mass scale and allied with hyperviolent right-wing paramilitaries in his war against the FARC, as well as dissidents on a wider level. “He … leaves a very big pair of shoes to fill,” the FT concluded. Certainly true – if your gauge is how many kills you can rack up as president.

Often you can track the positive reaction of the financial press, and the wider press, too, by how nice leaders are to transnational corporations and foreign capital. Luíz Inácio ‘Lula’ da Silva, the president of Brazil from 2003 to 2010, became the darling of the Western press during his tenure because his social reforms – while good in themselves – did not challenge the rule of capital in his country. Evo Morales and Hugo Chávez, however, as we have seen, took power and gave it back to their people through nationalizations and cancellations of exploitative contracts. For that they were vilified as dictators and terrorists. One of my favorite Wall Street Journal articles, titled “Bolivia’s descent into rogue state status”, noted the country has become “a petri dish in which a culture of organized crime, radical politics and religious fundamentalism festers”. That’s the punishment waiting for you in the racket's media if you put the interests of your people ahead of the bottom line of the 1 percent.

I recently picked up a copy of the Economist on holiday. You might think that having just written a book about the dodgy dealings of the American racketeers I would be used to such examples, but I was still shocked by the lack of any attempt at a cover-up. An article on Angola, the "economic wunderkind that comes a cropper", was lamenting the slowdown in the Angolan economy. The pathologies of the capitalist id were out on show as the magazine stated that "On May 7 the government announced an end to fuel subsidies, which used to consume a whopping 4.5 per cent of GDP. This is generally sensible move – the subsidy distorted markets and encouraged smuggling – will hit the poor especially hard in an already highly unequal society." Unpacked, that sentence says that a policy which "hits the poor especially hard in an already highly unequal society" is "generally sensible". And it is – if you're a rich investor or local oligarch, because the state helping its poorest citizens to be able to afford fuel to run their cars or homes is not important. In fact, the ideology of the free market – which holds that any state intervention on the side of the poorest is "market distortion" – makes such a move not only "sensible" but also necessary. Death for the poor is necessary. In a piece on Egypt in the same issue, with reference to the "successes" of the brutal mass-murdering Egyptian dictator Abdel Fattah el-Sisi, the Economist could barely hide its glee about the killing that had been made not just by his troops – but by investors too! The article was entitled "The lure of Sisi", and stated that Egypt's stock market delivered the best returns for investors in 2014. So, yes, a fantastic year for investors.[10] But according to Amnesty International, the previous year wasn't so great if you were a peaceful protestor. In the six months towards the end of 2013 nearly one and a half thousand people died in protests – most at the hands of Egyptian security forces. Yet the Economist went on to say that "Sisi has consolidated power and ruthlessly crushed dissent. His firm rule and programme of economic development have also attracted much-needed investment. Freedoms must be sacrificed in the service of progress, the president argues. For now, at least, he may feel vindicated." Vindicated.

In some ways I admire the Economist's honesty. The New York Times or Washington Post either ignore that the US is integral to upholding many deeply repressive, mass-murdering regimes, or they find some way of spinning this truth to make their liberal readers feel good about it – in Egypt's case, most likely the "threat" of the Muslim Brotherhood. At least the Economist has the honesty to say what it's really about – investors' ability to make a killing. The Wall Street Journal is similarly honest about which team they are batting for. In an op-ed after the coup in Egypt which bought Sisi to power, the writer claimed that "Egyptians would be lucky if their new ruling generals turn out to be in the mold of Chile's Augusto Pinochet, who took over power amid chaos but hired free-market reformers and midwifed a transition to democracy."[11] That "transition" the Wall Street Journal talks about took a coup d'état against a democratic and constitutional president, Salvador Allende, and 17 years of fascist dictatorship, alongside thousands dead, to implement. But, hey, a lot of people got rich.

THE FIG LEAF

When I left the racket's media and tried to write for other newspapers that I thought would be more reflective of my political outlook, I realized something even more disturbing than what I'd seen on the inside: the racket's stranglehold on the mass media is total. The liberal and left parts of the mainstream media are as compromised by corporate money and private interests as their conservative rivals, perhaps even more so. And it is these progressive outlets that are vital to maintaining the façade of a free and fair media. They give the impression of fighting against the racket when in fact they support it in the fundamentals. I learnt that, in fact, newspapers like the UK's Guardian – probably the most influential left-wing journal in the Western world – are among the most biased and self-righteous institutions around. They are full of private-school-educated Oxbridge graduates who see themselves as crusading liberals fighting against corporate and state power.[12] But if you step a bit to the left of them, you will know about it. They guard their left flank religiously, instructing the world that anyone operating there is beyond the pale. The same is true of the New York Times in the US.

When I started looking into it, I saw that the Guardian is actually intimately involved with the racket, and relies on the racket to run its day-to-day reporting operations. If you click on the Cities section of its website, you will find the whole section is sponsored by the neoliberal Rockefeller Foundation. If you go to the Global Development section, you will see it's sponsored by the equally neoliberal Gates Foundation. And this goes on and on.[13] Corporate power has its claws deep into the Guardian. Delve deeper into the website and you will find the Sustainable Business Zone, where its Social Impact section sponsor is the mining giant Anglo-American and its Sustainable Living section is sponsored by consumer goods giant Unilever. There, these companies are given free rein to publish corporate social responsibility nonsense – an effort to improve their image so they have less trouble exploiting the countries where they make their profits.[14] The Guardian itself officially says that this sponsorship has no impact on how it reports news. But I had my own experience of this maybe not being wholly true when I reported from a town in El Salvador called Nejapa, where many residents could not afford clean drinking water for themselves and their families, despite the fact they lived on top of a huge aquifer.[15]

When I was preparing the story with my colleague, the brewing company SABMiller, when asked for a quote, started getting heavy about what we might be putting in the article. They sent me a joint report on Nejapa they had authored with Oxfam (showing, in the process, how the racket now has its tentacles in NGOs as well). In the end, SABMiller were only briefly mentioned in our article, and one of their spokesmen was quoted in the piece.[16] But just a few days later I noticed that the Guardian was carrying a news article, sponsored by the Gates Foundation of course, on its website. It was a 900-word interview with Karl Lippert, president of the Latin American division of SABMiller, which read like a corporate press release. He was given long spaces to expatiate on his company's commitment to water security, without any pushback at all. Then he responded at length to the criticism in our article over corporate control of water in Nejapa. I thought this was a weird thing for the Guardian to run as a news story. Lippert is completely unknown and in much of the article he spoke about the story we had done. The Guardian, I later learnt, had a "partner zone" sponsored by SABMiller on its website.[17]

The Guardian's analogue in the US is no better; in fact, it's worse. At least the Guardian didn't support the anti-democratic coup against the Hugo Chávez government in 2002. The New York Times did. Two days after the coup it described the overthrow of democracy, suspension of the constitution and installation of a millionaire tyrant like this: "The man in charge in the presidential palace went from a strong-willed populist known for his rambling speeches to a mild-mannered businessman who chooses every word carefully." It continued in another article: "With yesterday's resignation of President Hugo Chávez, Venezuelan democracy is no longer threatened by a would-be dictator. Mr. Chávez, a ruinous demagogue, stepped down after the military intervened and handed power to a respected business leader, Pedro Carmona."[18]

What hope do we have if this is the progressive extreme of the mainstream media in the US and UK?

The racket that rules us is enabled even more forcefully by the Guardian and New York Times than it is by Rupert Murdoch or the Financial Times, because they define what is acceptable progressive opinion, and tell us how far we can go and still be "respectable" and have a mainstream journalistic career. This restricts our imagination, forces us to worship our oppressors, and creates the illusion of fighting for justice while undermining the leaders and popular movements that will bring it about. The racket is deep in every crevice of the mass media, and we won't be free until that hold is broken.

Thankfully that hold is, indeed, breaking. Sprouting up around the world is a media independent of corporate control, unhinged from the fatalities of the racket's talking points. We are living through an exciting time for the media, but not the traditional media. What is happening now is a massive and irreversible shift of power to people. For two centuries, the upper class has owned the means of intellectual production, from the newspapers to the printing presses and everything else you needed to project your views on to society on a mass scale. But now, with the advent of the internet, there are many more ways to circumvent what has become a truly stagnant system. Be in no doubt: it scares the establishment senseless. They've had control over this for so long, and really don't want to let it go.

From Spain to Greece, the birth of people's movements has ushered true progressives into power, and it has been done largely by bypassing the stale old world media systems. Podemos managed to gain 21 percent of the vote in Spain's December 2015 elections – just two years after the party was founded, and in the face of a hugely hostile mainstream media. A few months before, in the UK, Jeremy Corbyn was voted leader of the Labour Party with an overwhelming mandate, galvanizing a long-dormant progressive current in Britain, again in the face of the most intense media political assassination campaign in recent history. Senator Bernie Sanders has similarly scrambled the political spectrum in the US with his hugely successful campaign for the Democratic nomination, even while the corporate media threw as much mud as possible on his self-avowed "socialism". Meanwhile, Syriza, a party of the left, has actually taken power in Greece, and remains popular, again despite the traditional oligarch-owned media being out for its throat. The realm of the possible is being stretched. People are looking outside their traditional outlets for news, and seeing that the truth does not lie in the “respectable” institutions they had previously trusted. The breakdown of the political center in the West is being paralleled by the breakdown of the media center. When both jobs are complete – and they will work in unison – we will be able to stare long and hard at the rotting machine that turns our economy, and dispatch it to the dustbin of history. The center cannot hold.

Introduction

Conservatives, or who should really just be called normal humans who maintain the basic values, traditions, and social norms that individuals, families, and communities have lived by since ancient times, are under attack by a barrage of deeply disturbing ideologies and well-funded institutions that can only be described as insane—or evil.

Instead of being relegated to a fringe group in a dark corner of the Internet or the subjects of a documentary looking into the lives of degenerate weirdos for viewers' entertainment, these insane people and their agendas are being promoted in public schools and Universities, by Hollywood celebrities and award-winning shows and films, and boosted by the algorithms on the Big Tech social media platforms.

Even major food brands and retailers are awash in this new breed of Leftist propaganda. The onslaught of wokeness is even gaining support in the legal system with draconian laws being snuck through Democrat-controlled state legislatures which undermine the very foundation of what America once stood for.

We now have Marxists in our own Congress calling for the removal of American symbols, the erasure of our history, and the systemic demonization of White people. The communication tools our society now relies on are being used to censor those who push back against their agenda too loud, and countless activist media outlets exist for the sole purpose of being attack dogs for the regime and smear its enemies as "racists," "transphobes," "antisemites," and an array of other defamatory labels they hope will stick.

Children, being impressionable and vulnerable, are one of the enemy's prime targets. And in recent years it's become common in public schools across the country for teachers to sexualize their students as young as preschoolers—having kids engage in LGBTQ Pride parades at school, and the mainstream media now promotes pre-teen boys dressing in drag and young girls getting their breasts surgically removed if they feel uncomfortable with their body or unsure of their gender.[1]

Freaks, who in past generations you would only see featured on the Jerry Springer Show, are now credentialed teachers and proudly post videos on TikTok bragging about what they're doing with their students. The U.S. Military is openly recruiting and celebrating gays, lesbians, and transgenders.[2] Kids' cartoons are promoting gender bending drag queens to their young impressionable audiences on Disney+ and Nickelodeon.[3] What had always been seen as an adult form of entertainment at gay night clubs in seedy parts of the inner city is now being performed for small children at schools and libraries across the country.[4]

Many of our cherished holidays are even under attack from those within our own country. Such disgruntled citizens (and illegal aliens) were once relegated to shouting on the street corner, but now their anti-American ideas have taken root and mainstream Marxist Democrats are openly calling for the destruction of statues of the Founding Fathers, abolishing the national anthem, and even replacing the American flag.[5]

They hate the foundation of our country, including the Bill Rights and the freedoms Americans have enjoyed since 1776. And there's not just an ongoing assault on our nation's symbols and founders, but on Capitalism itself with many Democrats continuously nudging us toward socialism. The COVID lockdowns of 2020 and 2021 warmed millions of Americans up to the idea of getting free handouts from the government while they sit at home instead of going to work. And calls for issuing a Universal Basic Income, or UBI—free money to those unwilling to work, are increasing.[6]

Antifa, the Marxist foot-soldiers who show up to intimidate, threaten, and attack attendees at Conservative events, are now commonplace in cities across the country, and they're allowed to act with impunity and face no legal consequences for the violence they carry out, which is either ignored by the media or blamed on Trump supporters for "inciting it" by simply existing.

In their efforts to overthrow the United States and collapse us into the New World Order, our country has been flooded with a steady stream of millions of illegal aliens from third world countries for decades. These people aren't just future Democrat voters, but they further reduce the White majority and erode patriotism in America because most of them aren't interested in becoming Americans and don't care about our history, values, or customs—they just simply want to take advantage of what America has. They'll never assimilate, and instead just further weaken the bonds that hold our cultural fabric together.

To entice the caravans of migrants to continue coming, Democrats offer them free housing, free healthcare, free education, and an endless list of welfare benefits which further stresses our sputtering financial system. We're already so far in debt as a nation that it's impossible to repay, and things are getting to the point where even paying the interest on the national debt may be impossible.[7] The only way out of such a financial hole is to print more money—a lot more. Which means hyperinflation—drastically eroding the value of the dollar and skyrocketing prices, which will likely lead to what some call the Great Reset.

A primary tactic to sow discontent and foment social unrest is the promotion of antiwhiteism (anti-White racism) under the banner of Critical Race Theory, which is a scholarly sounding veneer used to cause racial strife by opening old wounds that healed long ago and blaming White people for all the current problems and shortcomings Black people have today. Critical Race Theory disguises antiwhiteism as supposed "history" and promotes the conspiracy theory that White supremacy is woven into the fabric of America and at the heart of our institutions.

While we've had racial injustices in the past (as with every multicultural country or region throughout history) and struggled to overcome the conflicts between different ethnic groups living among each other, by the end of the 20th century race relations were quite harmonic in the United States—only to begin deteriorating in the 21st century under President Obama who constantly stoked the embers of what was nearly an extinguished fire, reigniting racial and class conflicts and using Black Lives Matter to fan the flames.

They're "woke" they say, which just means they blame others for their own personal failures under the guise of "oppression" which is either imaginary or self imposed so they can portray themselves as victims who insist deserve special treatment. Wokeness is just another synonym for Marxism and is used to gather more supporters for the cause.

And of the Conservatives being targeted in this current culture war, Christians are enemy number one because of their adherence to traditional (normal) family values and customs. The Left's vicious hatred for Christianity has no bounds with Christian holidays, symbols, and businesses now under constant attack.[8]

The forces manipulating our society are more than just social media algorithms amplifying absurdities, perverts, and antiwhiteism; although the Big Tech platforms are a large part of the problem. There's also Operation Mockingbird secretly pulling the strings behind the scenes of the "news" networks, Wikipedia masquerading as an "encyclopedia," Google curating search results and burying websites and articles containing information they don't want the general public to know; and now various artificial intelligence "chatbots" which present just as biased information because their programmers have placed strict parameters on the kinds of answers they can give and the content they can generate.[9]

Of course the high priests of Hollywood are in lockstep, building up false idols whose behaviors and ideologies are modeled by millions of mentally enslaved morons. What most people mindlessly consume as "entertainment" is carefully crafted political propaganda designed to incrementally desensitize the population to various ideas and activities; slowly shifting sensibilities and encouraging radical new notions.

The advent of social media proved to be a powerful tool against mainstream media, ultimately revolutionizing countless industries—from how customer service is conducted by businesses, to how people consume TV shows, movies, and music. Through Facebook, Twitter, and YouTube (the first three massive platforms to become centerpieces in society), various "personalities" and independent media companies organically grew massive audiences by utilizing the new technology which allowed anyone to post and distribute their reports to millions (for free), which had previously required enormous and expensive infrastructure to accomplish.

It wasn't until after Donald Trump's 2016 election victory that mainstream media conglomerates fully realized the average individual in their kitchen on a laptop was now on an even playing field with them, and their information monopoly had slipped through their fingers. What was once seen as a technological novelty that people used to keep in touch with old friends also meant they could share a local news story that may end up being seen by so many others it becomes a national story by going viral.

People also couldn't help but notice how the mainstream media acted as gatekeepers and purposefully ignored crime patterns and other issues that should have been widely covered. So the mainstream media struck back, co-opting the Big Tech social media platforms, partnering with them—and they were soon transformed into extensions of the mainstream media instead of alternatives, and the good old days were over. The brand name conglomerates weaseled their way back into a position of dominance over the flow of information.

Donald Trump winning the 2016 Presidential Election shocked much of the country, if not the world. Hillary Clinton had been expected to win and most of the media portrayed her victory as inevitable—as if it was her "right" to be the next president, which compounded Democrats' disappointment when she ultimately failed. Once the shock began to wear off, instead of coming to grips with the outcome, a vicious war was launched in hopes of destroying the Trump administration by any means necessary. Plans to impeach him were drawn up before he was even inaugurated.[10]

Then throughout his administration, he and his associates were relentlessly attacked by Deep State operatives in the intelligence agencies, frivolous lawsuits in the courts, Operation Mockingbird mouthpieces in the "news" media, and his supporters faced increasing censorship on social media.

Trump would have been banned from Twitter shortly after the 2020 election even if the January 6th protest hadn't turned into a riot because the media and the Democrats had manufactured an image of him as a dangerous monster, and numerous politicians including Kamala Harris had been demanding he be banned from social media even before the election.[11]

But the provocateured and staged false flag "insurrection" was the pretense they were looking for to finally purge him from all the Big Tech platforms and further crackdown on his supporters. Republicans who doubted the outcome of the 2020 election or voiced concerns about Democrats stealing it were now censored on social media, despite Democrats making the same allegations for four straight years prior. But now any talk of a stolen election was "dangerous," and "undermines our Democracy." Only in communist countries and other dictatorships are citizens not allowed to question the legitimacy of the ruling party, and that's what happened in America.

They're also engaging in what's called lawfare (legal warfare), which means using the legal system to harass and persecute one's enemies. Donald Trump, his associates, and his supporters have all been swept up in crippling legal entanglements—while the justice system allows the Biden and Clinton crime families, and Black Lives Matter and Antifa foot soldiers to operate above the law. Many January 6th defendants who weren't even accused of assaulting police or vandalism during the infamous protest at the Capitol that day were denied bail and held in jail for several years until their trials.[12]

Many of these same political prisoners were then sentenced to extremely harsh and unfair prison time for technically just trespassing if they happened to be members of the Proud Boys, or became symbols of the protest like the "QAnon Shaman" and the guy who was photographed with his feet resting on Nancy Pelosi's desk. They were all sentenced to years in prison[13]

One of the first actions the Justice Department took once Joe Biden was sworn into office was indicting a Twitter user named Douglas Mackey for posting a meme five years earlier back in 2016 joking that Democrats could "skip the lines" on election day by "texting" in their vote instead.[14] A common joke posted every election year by people from both political parties, along with the one about the "friendly reminder" that the opposing political party votes on Wednesday.

Nobody is fooled by such posts because they're obvious jokes. And not a single person took the meme about Democrats being able to "text" in their vote for Hillary Clinton seriously, but Douglas Mackey (who went by "Ricky Vaughn" on Twitter) was still indicted for "election interference!"[15] He was later sentenced to seven months in federal prison.[16]

Legal battles often take years and easily cost hundreds of thousands of dollars, even millions to defend. Those found innocent (or not liable in a civil case) usually can't recoup any of those costs. They may win the case, but are still destroyed financially.

The head of Joseph Stalin's secret police force in the Soviet Union infamously said, "Show me the man and I'll show you the crime," and the power of prosecutors to abuse their authority is widely known even in western Democracies. Former Supreme Court Justice Robert Jackson admitted in some cases, "it is not a question of discovering the commission of a crime and then looking for the man who has committed it, it is a question of picking the man and then searching the law books, or putting investigators to work, to pin some offense on him."[17]

He goes on, "It is in this realm—in which the prosecutor picks some person whom he dislikes or desires to embarrass, or selects some group of unpopular persons and then looks for an offense, that the greatest danger of abuse of prosecuting power lies. It is here that law enforcement becomes personal, and the real crime becomes that of being unpopular with the predominant or governing group, being attached to the wrong political views, or being personally obnoxious to or in the way of the prosecutor himself."[18]

The U.S. Supreme Court has found that even though the law may be "fair on its face, and impartial in appearance" it can still be "applied and administered by public authority with an evil eye and an unequal hand," allowing prosecutors to make "unjust and illegal discriminations between persons in similar circumstances," thus violating their civil rights by using the very mechanisms of government that are supposed to protect them.[19]

The FBI used disinformation to get a FISA warrant to spy on the Trump campaign in order to create the false narrative he conspired with Russians to "steal" the 2016 election. After his administration was bogged down for years, the Mueller investigation found no evidence of wrongdoing and when Robert Mueller finally testified about his investigation, he proved to be an embarrassing and bumbling old man who couldn't even convincingly articulate why it was launched in the first place.[20]

But the lawfare continued, with prosecutors ultimately indicting Trump for paying Stormy Daniels to sign an NDA to keep quiet about their alleged affair (claiming it was an unreported campaign expense), then for keeping some documents at his Mar-a-Lago residence from his time in the White House; and soon after that for other trumped up charges (no pun intended) claiming he orchestrated a "criminal conspiracy" trying to steal the 2020 election. All signs of a banana republic and a collapsing society.

And sadly, we aren't just opposed by a matrix of enemies on the Left, but also from within our own ranks. Brand name "Republicans" and corporate "Conservatives" have been too cowardly for years to stand up against what's happening to our culture—afraid of being called "homophobic" or "racist." Only recently since the insanity has boiled over and infected elementary school children's cartoons and soiled advertisements from big box retailers and the U.S. military have they dared say anything.

And it wasn't until censorship of Conservatives had snowballed out of control and swept up mainstream figures (culminating in the seated President at the time, Donald Trump, being banned from all Big Tech platforms) that brand name Conservative news outlets, pundits, and Republican members of Congress finally began speaking out about what many of us independent YouTubers had been shouting from the rooftops about for years.

You've seen what's happening. And even though you may try to keep up with the news, there's only so much time in the day for that among all the other obligations of life. Unless your full-time job is following politics or pop culture, it's impossible to know the full extent of the damage being done to society, but it's clear to anyone that we are facing relentless assaults on numerous fronts. And as the weeks, months, and years fly by, we tend to lose perspective on where things are and how much they've changed. The shock wears off, and the "new normal" sets in.

Like the proverbial frog slowly boiling in the pot unaware of what's happening because of the small but incremental temperature increases, most people won't see the big picture of what the Marxists are doing to America until it's too late. So before we get to the point of no return (which hopefully we haven't already crossed) mute your phone, schedule some quiet time for yourself, and let's take a close look at how the pieces of the puzzle all fit together in The War on Conservatives.

Public Schools

Public schools (which should really be called government schools) were once a place for kids to learn the basic knowledge needed to get through life: reading, writing, and arithmetic; along with history, geography, science, and a few others; but in recent years they have become indoctrination centers where Leftists use the captive audience of young and impressionable minds to shape future generations into the mold of Marxism.

"Give me a child when he's seven, and we'll have him for life," is an old maxim attributed to numerous individuals throughout history from the Greek philosopher Aristotle to Adolf Hitler and Vladimir Lenin. Whoever said it doesn't matter because the statement conveys the obvious importance of early education and how what a child is taught when they're young can shape their character and beliefs for the rest of their lives.

It's now commonplace in public schools across the country for teachers to not just hang LGBTQ+ rainbow "Pride" flags up in their classrooms, but stock their libraries with sexually explicit queer books, and countless teachers are now "coming out" to their students as gay, lesbian, and gender non-binary—even posting the videos on TikTok.[21]

Many schools are inviting drag queens to put on "performances" for the kids and hold "Pride" parades every June to kick off queer Pride Month.[22] Activities that had previously always been contained in seedy gay bars have now been imported into elementary schools across America.[23]

Most LGBT teachers who have infiltrated the schools are openly grooming young students hoping to convince them to question their own gender and experiment with their sexuality. And instead of just teaching history (which contains atrocities, and embarrassing actions carried out by every culture around the world), the woke system is intent on indoctrinating students to think that not much has changed from 1850s until now in the United States.

And even though slavery ended after the Civil War they still insist that America has "White supremacy" woven into the very fabric of our society. Every institution—from the legal system and schools to businesses and sports are supposedly secretly being run by "White supremacists" and keeping Black people down![24]

It's all being done under the cover of Critical Race Theory which is further disguised under the label of "history," but the agenda is the same. As countless proponents of Critical Race Theory have openly admitted, the principles and concepts are the same ones teachers are using to indoctrinate children with while avoiding the term itself in hopes of hiding their motive.

"Critical Race Theory" is really just a code word for antiwhiteism (anti-White racism), and it's now common for teachers to have Black Lives Matter flags hanging in their classrooms. Project Veritas was able to give everyone a close look at the mindset of these teachers when they caught one on hidden camera during an undercover investigation in Sacramento, California where he admitted he was trying to turn his students into "revolutionaries."[25] He had a poster of Chinese communist dictator Mao Zedong on the wall in his classroom as well—not as an educational tool about history or communism, but because the teacher himself is an avowed communist.

When Project Veritas later confronted him while he was out walking his dog to ask about what they had captured him on video saying, he was literally wearing a giant hammer and sickle communist tank top! A school board meeting held the next day was packed with parents who demanded he be fired.[26] Surprisingly he was, but how many other literal communists are working as teachers doing the same thing and go unnoticed by school officials and parents?

During a meeting of the American Federation of Teachers Union, a Colorado teacher boasted that there were fellow Marxists in the crowd and called for a "forceful cultural revolution" in America against "whiteness."[27]

FBI Investigates Parents

After a wave of parents began showing up to school board meetings and telling off the administrators for mandating children wear COVID masks in school all day and subjecting the students to gender bending propaganda and Critical Race Theory (antiwhiteism), the National School Boards Association sent a letter to the Biden administration literally comparing parents who were slightly aggressive or a bit rowdy during the meetings to domestic terrorists.[28]

Less than a week later the Department of Justice sent a memo to the FBI instructing them to investigate alleged "threats" made to school boards by parents, and so the FBI's counterintelligence division began opening investigations. One case involved a mother who told her local school board "we're coming for you" during a meeting, which was interpreted as a threat (when it was an obvious figure of speech about exposing them and voting them out) but an investigation was launched into her anyway.[29]

Another investigation was launched after someone reported a parent to the FBI because he "rails against the government" and "has a lot of guns."[30] Joe Biden's Attorney General Merrick Garland testified to Congress that antiterrorism tools (like spying on their social media activity) had not been used against any of the protesting parents, but seven months later an FBI whistleblower revealed that they actually had.[31]

The New York Times even blamed the Proud Boys (a right-wing men's social club, similar to a Moose Lodge or The Elks) for the increasing turnout at school board meetings by angry parents who got fed up with their children being indoctrinated with queer theory and antiwhiteism. Their headline read, "Proud Boys Regroup, Focusing on School Boards and Town Councils," and the article detailed in horror that "The far-right nationalist group has become increasingly active at school board meetings and town council gatherings across the country."[32]

Others like MSNBC host Jason Johnson suggested the pushback against school boards was being fueled by “white nationalists” as well.[33] Mother Jones, a Leftist online outlet warned, “School boards have long been a tool of White supremacy” and that the “once-innocuous local gatherings have become anti–critical race theory caucuses administered by white people.”[34] The Columbus Dispatch in Ohio echoed this sentiment telling their readers that “racists may be coming to a school board near you.”[35]

“Cultural Discipline”

Some schools are even adopting a practice called “Cultural Discipline” or “Transformative Education Professional Development & Grading,” which means they’re allowing Black students to get away with causing trouble and handing out lesser punishments to them if they are disciplined because of concerns the school may be perceived as being “racist” since more Black students cause trouble than White students (because they statistically tend to come from fatherless homes and don’t grow up with the proper discipline) and thuggery is often glorified and celebrated in Black culture.[36]

The schools adopting this practice are framing it as taking an “equitable” approach to punishment and discipline.[37] Notice the Orwellian change of terms recently from equality to equity. Marxists don’t want people to be treated equally. They want special privileges granted to non-White people (and queers) to supposedly “make up” for past “injustices” they claim haven’t been remedied.[38]

Schools are even adopting policies of not docking students’ grades for missing class, misbehavior, and failing to turn in their assignments on time because those methods “disproportionately hurt the grades of Black students,” they say.[39]

Not issuing detentions and suspensions to Black students who deserve them and letting their bad behavior go unpunished is rationalized by the same ridiculous argument we see from people who claim there must be “systemic racism” in police departments across the country because Black people are arrested for committing violent crime at levels nearly ten times that of White people (per capita).[40] It’s uncomfortable for most people to face the fact that Black men commit astonishingly more crimes per capita than White people, so of course they’re going to get arrested more!

And an important side note about what per capita means, since most Liberals don’t know anything about statistics. Often when people point out the Black Crime statistics and mention the fact that Black people are 13% of the U.S. population, but commit 50% of the total violent crimes, some Liberals will look up the murder statistics in the United States and claim “that’s not accurate.” But it is.

Those who deny the facts about Black Crime are only comparing the total number of murders committed by White people to the total number committed by Blacks, but don’t take into consideration that Blacks are only 13% of the U.S. population.[41] The term per capita means per person, or the average number per group, and is a more accurate way of reporting statistics, but because Liberals are ignorant about most things—they just don’t get it.

Since the White population is still an extremely higher percentage of the overall population in the United States, it would be common sense that White people would account for a higher number of murders, but we’re talking about percentages per group here. And the uncomfortable reality is that Black people make up only 13% of the U.S. population, but commit half of all violent crime as a whole.[42]

And the vast majority of those perpetrators are Black males, so if you really want to get down to specifics, 6% of the US population (since half of the total Black population are males, and they’re the ones who commit virtually all the violent crime compared to females out of the group) the scary reality is that a tiny demographic of the American population (6%—the Black males) are responsible for half of the violent crime in the country!

Nobody would argue that police are being “sexist” because men are arrested far more often than women for committing violent crime, because everyone knows that men commit more violent crime than women! But admitting the obvious facts about Black Crime is deemed “racist.”

And when the figures of students who are punished for misbehaving and causing disruptions in school are broken down by race, it shouldn’t be surprising to find the same patterns that are shown in crime statistics. But the actual reason for such a wide disparity raises uncomfortable questions, so instead of addressing the root of the problem, “racism” is blamed.

Removing Honors Classes

Schools across the country have been ending honor classes along with gifted and talented programs because administrators are worried that they may appear as if they're "discriminating" against Black and Latino students because the programs tend to be dominated by White and Asian students.[43] Proponents of such idiocy are calling it a more "equitable" education, the social justice buzzword meaning there are too many White students in the programs.[44]

In San Diego, the entire school district changed the grading system because Hispanic students' grades were on average significantly lower than White students because of the language barrier since so many of them are illegal aliens or anchor babies born and raised by Mexican parents who speak little to no English themselves.[45] Before the change, 23% of D or F grades went to Hispanics, another 23% went to Native Americans, and 20% to Black students, while only 7% went to White students."[46]

In hopes of making the grades more "equitable" the district stopped docking students' grades for assignments that are turned in late. So now there are basically no deadlines for homework which will just further incentivize students not to schedule their time properly to do it, and they'll just keep watching TikTok videos or playing videogames all night instead.

A Minnesota school announced they were no longer going to be giving students F's in order to "combat systemic racism."[47] And homework doesn't get marked down if it's turned in late anymore there too, and students' grades are no longer effected by tardiness or detentions for bad behavior either.

Standardized tests have been deemed "racist" as well. The National Education Association says, "Since their inception almost a century ago, the tests have been instruments of racism and a biased system. Decades of research demonstrate that Black, Latin(o/a/x), and Native students, as well as students from some Asian groups, experience bias from standardized tests administered from early childhood through college."[48]

Of course the whole point of a standardized test is that all students take the same test! But now the Marxists want affirmative action-style tests so Black and Hispanic students can get different questions (easier questions) in order to artificially and unfairly boost their test scores!

"We still think there's something wrong with the kids rather than recognizing there's something wrong with the tests," said race hustler Ibram X. Kendi, who heads up the laughable "Antiracist Research & Policy Center at Boston University."[49] He says that, "standardized tests have become the most effective racist weapon ever devised to objectively degrade Black and Brown minds and legally exclude their bodies from prestigious schools."[50] During the 2020 election cycle, at a town hall event Joe Biden was asked by a lunatic in the audience if he would promise to put an end to "racist" standardized tests, and he responded "yes."[51]

Teachers Coming Out as Gay to Their Class

Until very recently, teachers would never talk about their personal lives in the classroom. Students didn't know if they were single, dating someone, married, or divorced, because their personal relationships have no bearing on the material students need to learn at school. But now it's commonplace for teachers who are LGBTQ to announce their sexual preferences to their students in hopes of getting the kids to start talking with them about sex or experiment with homosexuality themselves.

The Libs of TikTok Twitter account, which is dedicated to finding videos posted publicly on TikTok by Liberal teachers and other odd individuals who keep coming up with new "genders," has highlighted countless teachers who don't just make TikTok videos talking about how they've "come out" to their students as LGBTQ. Some of them actually record their speech on their phones and then post those videos on TikTok!

One teacher made the announcement she was a lesbian to every class that day so all of her students heard her speech.[52] Many of the students cheered since they've been conditioned to celebrate such behavior.

Another TikTok video posted by a teacher shows her explaining that she took down the American flag in her classroom and hid it because it's an "offensive symbol," but has an LGBT Pride flag hanging in her room and when a student asked what they were supposed to do during the Pledge of Allegiance she told them to pledge allegiance to the Pride flag.[53]

One queer high school teacher posted a video he recorded inside his classroom bragging about how "most days" he comes to school wearing stilettos, "and the reason why is so I can create an explicitly queer space for all my students. That way they know this place is a place for them, by them, and cuz I never had one of these growing up."[54] In the video he showed off his high heels.

It's important to understand that these aren't just a few rare or isolated instances. The Libs of TikTok Twitter account regularly reposts videos that are found on TikTok to raise awareness about just how widespread the problem is and to show how many teachers are talking with their students about their sexuality or trying to confuse the kids about which gender they are.

“Gender Non-Binary” Teachers

But it’s not just gay and lesbian teachers who feel they need to “come out” to their students these days. Libs of TikTok has also uncovered numerous teachers (many of whom are elementary school teachers), “coming out” as “gender non-binary” to the kids (someone who doesn’t consider themselves to be a man or a woman, but neither!)

Blue and green-haired freaks who were once only found loitering in the streets of inner cities or working at adult video stores are now teaching elementary school children and preschool across the country.

One woman (with green hair as usual) explains, “So I’m a non-binary elementary school teacher, and my kids know I’m non-binary, they know I’m not a girl or a boy, I use ‘they’ ‘them’ pronouns in the classroom. We work on it. Not all the kids get it. That’s okay. And I go by Mx. Gray in the classroom, not Miss or Mister—Mx. And today one of the kids goes, ‘hey, we’ve got two boy teachers in the classroom because the other teacher in the classroom at the time was a guy. And I go, no there’s not. I’m not a girl or a boy, remember? And she goes ‘oh my God. Wait, does that mean you’re dead? So, I think that’s my new gender now.”[55]

Of course a three-year-old doesn’t understand what the hell her lunatic teacher means by saying she’s not a boy or a girl. How could any child begin to comprehend such nonsense? And what kind of school wouldn’t escort the teacher from the property immediately after learning that they’re saying they aren’t a man or a woman and trying to confuse the children with such mentally deranged insanity?

One polyamorous gender-fluid witch (polyamorous meaning in open relationships with numerous different sexual partners) who teaches preschool in Florida posted a video on TikTok saying how proud she is to talk with her 4-year-old students about her sexuality.[56] And that’s not a typo, she also identifies as a witch. The list goes on and on of preschool and elementary school teachers who post TikTok videos boasting that they’re teaching children about “transness” and “queerness.”[57]

One preschool teacher explained that she hands out “pronoun pins” to the 4-year-olds she teaches every day so they can choose which “gender” they want to be that day. “We have some that pick, like, ‘she’ / ‘her’ every single day, and we have some that change it up.”[58]

When I was in high school in the 1990s if a teacher put up a gay Pride flag, we would have torn it down every time they stepped out of the classroom into the hallway, and no one would have said who did it. And if they replaced it, the same thing would happen every single day until they gave up. And if a teacher came out as a “gender non-binary” and started talking about they weren’t a man or a woman, the parents in the community wouldn’t have even needed to get involved because we the students would have run them out of town ourselves.

Virtually any community in America would have run such freaks out of town in previous generations (or even hung them in the town square depending how far back it was) if they started telling elementary school children that boys could be girls and girls could be boys or made an announcement that they were queer, but today these creatures are allowed to make children participate in their fetishes and delusions by affirming their “identity” and most schools and parents are doing nothing to stop them![59]

Sexual Predator Teachers Now Allowed

Teachers even vaguely hinting at anything sexual with their students has always been a major red flag that they were a predator, and even the most subtle reference to anything sexual would have immediately been condemned by administrators and a dark cloud of suspicion would have hung over them for the rest of their career. Each year students would pass on word of the incident to the incoming students in the freshman class and such behavior would become part of school lore. The rumors would never stop.

Students with younger siblings would tell them what happened and they would tell their friends, and the teacher would never live it down, and in most cases would have been fired immediately. But now if the teacher is gay or bisexual, they often openly brag in TikTok videos about what they're doing and the grooming agenda has gone full speed ahead. All while the media runs stories defending the practice and accusing Conservatives of being "homophobic" and going on a "witch hunt."[60]

The Government Accountability Office [GAO] published a report back in 2014 warning about the dangers of sexual predator teachers in public schools, recommending administrators be on the lookout for "grooming behaviors" that are "part of a pattern of behavior and are done with the intent to perpetrate future sexual abuse or misconduct."[61]

In 2015 The Washington Post ran the headline, "More teachers are having sex with their students. Here's how schools can stop them."[62] The article noted that the previous year there were 781 teachers or school employees were accused or convicted of sexual relationships with students, and cites social media as the primary method perpetrators use to first start communicating with their victims.

In 2019 the Iowa Department of Education published a guidebook to help teachers and administrators identify grooming in public schools, listing one of the red flags as (obviously) "talking about student sexuality" and having “inappropriate and personal conversations with students.”[63] But now queer teachers grooming students using these exact same methods is widely acceptable behavior.

Gay Pride Parades in Schools

Once something that was always confined to inner city streets in places like New York and Los Angeles, gay Pride parades and "celebrations" are now regular occurrences in public schools across America.[64] They call them "Pride" parades now instead of gay Pride parades, because that name wasn't inclusive enough for the transgenders, pansexuals, and all the rest of the gender-bending degenerates who all fall under the queer umbrella.

And young children who don't yet know what differentiates gay and transgender people from normal people are being deceived about what the events are for. They're told that "Pride" celebrations are just about people celebrating "who they are" and anyone who is "different," or that it's about "diversity," while masking what is actually being celebrated.

Teachers are using classical conditioning techniques to associate the rainbow "Pride" flag with positive feelings—and like new members of a cult, the kids aren't being told what the group actually believes in hopes of incrementally indoctrinating them in order to make them more receptive to what's really going on so it won't appear as a sudden shock, causing them to possibly turn away.

Girls have always loved rainbows, and to innocent children they symbolize magic because they're such a rare occurrence. Most people only see naturally occurring rainbows a few times throughout their lives, but the LGBTQ movement has turned it into a sexual kink fetish symbol.

In 2022 "Pride Month" debauchery went supernova with countless schools across the country holding drag queen events for children. It's not just one or two, or even a handful of isolated instances—it's now a common occurrence. And not just in high schools. Drag queen "Pride" events targeting children as young as two years old are now commonplace.[65]

Schools regularly host drag queen story hour, and other drag queen themed events, like "drag queen bingo" night, and drag queen talent shows.[66] A middle school in New York even welcomed a drag queen to teach boys how to apply drag makeup.[67] There are too many such events to list here.

And many public schools are now forcing kids to study "gay history." As of 2023 at least six states require schools to teach it, including California (which was the first, as usual), along with New Jersey, Illinois, Oregon, Colorado, and Nevada.[68] And not just in high schools, but middle schools and elementary schools too.[69] In one Illinois school, pre-kindergarten children are given an "introduction" to the rainbow flags and gender identity, and third graders are taught that White European colonizers "forced two-spirit people to conform to the gender binary."[70] A Florida school took elementary students on a field trip to a local gay bar to teach them about Pride Month.[71]

Michigan's Democrat attorney general said she wants "a drag queen for every school."[72] But the Leftists aren't satisfied with "Pride" month events now being the norm at schools across the country throughout the month of June so some schools now have "Back to School Pride Festivals" to celebrate queerness as the new school year begins.[73] Some people are now calling summer "Pride season" because they're not satisfied with "just" one month dedicated to them.[74]

Project Veritas caught the dean of students at a Chicago area high school on undercover video bragging that he had dildos, butt plugs, and lube passed around to students (as young as 14) and was excited they were interested in how to use the butt plugs.[75] Of course the dean is a queer himself. It's nobody's business what two consenting adults do in the privacy of their bedroom they used to say, but now the queers won't shut up about it and insist on sharing their lifestyles with children and demand they celebrate it with them.

A math teacher in Huntington Beach, California forced students to watch an LGBTQ Pride Month propaganda video and many of them revolted. One student caught this on video and posted it online showing them booing, making barfing sounds, and asking "Why are you showing this to kids?" The teacher then threatened them with a Saturday detention, claiming they were being "inappropriate."[76]

Drag Queen Story Hour Pedagogy

Drag shows have always been considered adult entertainment because of their inherent sexual nature. And it's always been gay—there has never been a single heterosexual drag queen in the history of the world, with the exception of some men dressing in drag as a joke because of the absurdity of it—something that has always been viewed as such, with depictions in popular films and sketch comedy bits on TV.

But the Marxists are now using drag as a way to indoctrinate children into gender bending and other queer activities instead of making people laugh at how odd it is for men to dress as women. On one hand they try to claim it's just "entertainment" for the kids and there's "nothing sexual about it," while on the other admit that they are strategically using it as a pedagogy, meaning a method of teaching, in hopes of sparking "queer imagination" in the children, "strategic defiance against social norms" and the "destigmatization of shame."[77]

In an article published in the educational journal Curriculum Inquiry they admit, "Drag queens have historically been relegated to the realm of the night. In the past few years, however, drag performers have made their way from the dimly lit bars of gayborhoods [gay neighborhoods] and into the fluorescent lights of libraries and classrooms."[78]

It goes on to say "positioning queer and trans cultural forms" are "valuable components of early childhood education" and they encourage teachers to use Drag Queen Story Hour "as a way of bringing queer ways of knowing and being into the education of young children" and "create spaces for young children and families to immerse themselves in LGBT-themed stories."[79]

It was cowritten by a drag queen who goes by the name of "Little Hot Mess" who was featured in an Associated Press video about drag queen story hour where he is seen asking the children "Who wants to be a drag queen when they grow up?"[80]

Transition Closets

An increasing number of public schools are now offering what are called "Transition Closets" which include clothes, makeup, and jewelry that students can change into once they arrive at school so they can "transition" their "gender" into something else while hiding it from their parents.[81] The idea seems to have been popularized on TikTok (as with nearly all socially toxic tends) and now some schools are receiving grants to fund them.[82]

An organization called Valid USA aims to "support schools interested in creating gender-affirming wardrobe spaces for trans and nonbinary affirming clothing" by donating clothes and makeup in what they call their Schools Affirming Wardrobe program.[83] Their website notes, "We offer a range of complimentary services, including free chest binders, bras, underwear, packers, referrals, and compassionate support from fellow trans peers."[84]

These "transition closets" don't just stock ordinary clothes though. They supply children with binders (not three ring binders, but breast binders to flatten girls' breasts tight against their chests to help them look more like a boy), as well as "tucking" underwear which help hide the penis and testicles of males who want to look like "girls." They also include "packing underwear" which contain prosthetic penises and testicles to give girls who wear them the appearance of a bulge in their crotch as if they have male genitalia.[85]

Many schools are now issuing guidelines to teachers demanding they not tell parents about such activities. A Conservative activist group called Empower Wisconsin obtained a copy of training materials given to teachers in the state's Eau Claire district which says that "Parents are not entitled to know their kids' identities. That knowledge must be earned," meaning they aren't supposed to tell parents if their child starts gender bending at school.[86]

New Jersey's "Transgender Student Guidance for School Districts" says that teachers aren't allowed to tell a parent if their child "comes out" as "transgender" and mandates all school officials use whatever name or pronoun students want.[87]

"A school district shall accept a student's asserted gender identity; parental consent is not required. Further, a student need not meet any threshold diagnosis or treatment requirements to have his or her gender identity recognized and respected by the district, school or school personnel. Nor is a legal or court-ordered name change required. There is no affirmative duty for any school district personnel to notify a student's parent or guardian of the student's gender identity or expression," it says.[88]

"Schools are advised to work with the student to create an appropriate confidentiality plan regarding the student's transgender or transitioning status," it goes on to say. And "a school district shall keep confidential a current, new, or prospective student's transgender status."[89]

Such rules are probably in place in countless districts across the country by now. Parents in Massachusetts sued their child's school after they found out that teachers were secretly encouraging students to change their gender and use different pronouns while keeping the "transitions" secret from the children's parents.[90] And it's up to parents to find out whether their children's schools are engaging in this same behavior. Most parents have no idea because few (normal) people could have imagined such policies would even be considered, let alone actually implemented.

LGBT Children's Books

The first LGBT children's books appear to have been published in the early 2000s, such as King and King (2003) about a prince who's supposed to be marrying a princess, but instead catches the eye of her brother and marries him instead. Another one called And Tango Makes Three (published in 2005) is about two gay penguins who adopt a baby penguin as "their" child, and was written to teach kids about same sex couples. Back then the books barely made any waves with only a few people denouncing them like Bill O'Reilly on his primetime show on Fox News at the time.

And most Conservatives who heard of them thought, while they may be strange, they were no cause for alarm and quickly forgot about them. But these LGBT children's books weren't rare novelties, they were just the start of an onslaught of this kind of material. And the books that would soon follow weren't designed to supposedly help parents explain what gay people are and why some children have "two mommies" or why their uncle has a "special friend." This new wave of LGBTQ children's books teach children it's cool for boys to wear dresses and makeup and that they should try dressing in drag and experiment with homosexuality.

Jacob's New Dress, which came out in 2014, encourages young boys to wear dresses. "Jacob loves playing dress-up, when he can be anything he wants to be," the description on Amazon reads. "Some kids at school say he can't wear 'girl' clothes, but Jacob wants to wear a dress to school. Can he convince his parents to let him wear what he wants? This heartwarming story speaks to the unique challenges faced by children who don't identify with traditional gender roles."[91]

Sparkle Boy (2017) also encourages boys to wear dresses, even if they're not transgender and still identify as a boy. The book's description reads, "Casey loves to play with his blocks, puzzles, and dump truck, but he also loves things that sparkle, shimmer, and glitter. When his older sister, Jessie, shows off her new shimmery skirt, Casey wants to wear a shimmery skirt too."[92]

And so he does, and he also starts painting his nails like his older sister too. The parents embrace his new "gender expression," but his older sister is uncomfortable with it at first, but at the end she accepts his new style and respects it since dresses and "sparkly things" are "for everyone to enjoy."

Julian is a Mermaid (2018) is another book aimed at grooming boys to wear dresses. Big Wig (2022) is another one about a young boy who becomes a drag queen, and was even promoted by Pizza Hut's Book It! program which encourages young children to read.[93]

Others are sexually explicit, and unimaginably obscene. One such book titled Lawn Boy by Jonathan Evinson is so explicit that in 2021 when a mother who checked it out from the school's library and started reading it out loud to the school board meeting they tried to get her to stop. She began, "What if I told you I touched another guy's dick? What if I told you I sucked it? I was 10 years old, but it's true. I sucked Doug Goble's dick, the real estate guy, and he sucked mine, too."[94]

A school board member interrupted her, saying, "There are children in the audience here."[95] She responded that if it's too offensive to read out loud at a school board meeting, then why is it in the school library? Other parents in the audience at the school board meeting cheered her when she was finished speaking.

And others across the country began showing up at school board meetings too and reading Lawn Boy and other books like it out-loud, all of which are also found in the schools' libraries. Videos of the incidents went viral on social media since most schools, like city councils, record their meetings and post the archives online.

A graphic novel titled Let's Talk About It, written by a bisexual man named Matthew Nolan, encourages boys to play with each other's buttholes, saying "When you're starting out, explore your butt solo till you get used to it. Lube up and don't rush," and tells them, "a great place to research fantasies and kinks safely is on the Internet. There are tons of people and communities out there who share your interests and have all kinds of advice."[96] It also recommends sex toys for kids and promotes sexting.

One of the reviews on Amazon reads, “This is NOT appropriate for teenagers. Some of the content had me and my husband absolutely shocked and horrified! Read this book before you let your children touch it! The book starts off great and about half way through it’s extremely inappropriate, things I don’t even want to detail on this review.”[97]

A book called Seeing Gender by Iris Gottlieb, which is aimed at teens, contains a chapter titled “Sex work is not a bad term” (meaning prostitution) and glowingly says it’s “one of the oldest jobs in history” and explains that “A person may exchange sex or sexual activity for things they need or want, such as food, housing, hormones, drugs, gifts, or other resources.”[98] A school librarian at a middle school in Loudoun Country, Virginia defended the book being on the shelf, saying many of the students “are sex workers” and the book “makes them feel validated.”[99] The list of degenerate books aimed at children could fill an entire book in and of itself.

Of course many Leftists these days are furious that Conservative parents don’t want these kinds of books in school libraries, denouncing so-called “book bans,” but these same people would be screaming bloody murder if copies of The Turner Diaries were included in school libraries, the novel that inspired Timothy McVeigh to bomb the Oklahoma Federal Building in 1995.

And if that book was in a school library, it should outrage parents because obviously certain books are inappropriate for children. Would the parents who claim banning LGBTQ books in school libraries is reminiscent of Nazi Germany want copies of The Anarchist Cookbook, the infamous bomb-making manual, available to the students?

What about Playboy magazine or Penthouse? Any reasonable person can admit that some ideas can be dangerous (like books about how to build bombs) and measures should be taken to ensure such materials aren’t planting seeds into the minds of impressionable and irresponsible children.

Anti-Grooming Laws

After the general public became of aware of how pervasive the problem of teachers grooming their students is, discussing their sex lives with them, and encouraging gender bending; Florida passed an anti-grooming bill forbidding teachers from discussing sexuality or gender identity with students from preschool through third grade.[100] Later expanded through 12th grade.[101]

It was dubbed the “don’t say gay bill” by Democrats who falsely claim the laws forbid gay teachers from talking about their partners at all. Similar legislation was then introduced in other states, including Alabama, Georgia, Ohio, and Louisiana.[102] Sixteen states would eventually move to prohibit teachers from talking about sexual orientation or gender identity with students in the early grades.[103] Word finally got out about what the LGBTQ teachers were doing, and parents and state legislatures knew they had to stop them.

A major reason Florida’s legislature introduced the bill is because of the Libs of TikTok Twitter account which simply searched TikTok for publicly available videos posted by teachers who were openly bragging about discussing their sexuality with their students and then reposted them on Twitter, bringing them to the attention of others.

These videos of the fluorescent-haired freaks often went viral and caught the attention of Florida Governor Ron DeSantis and others who decided to draft legislation to stop the groomers. The Washington Post admitted, “Libs of TikTok has become an agenda-setter in right-wing online discourse, and the content it surfaces shows a direct correlation with the recent push in legislation and rhetoric directly targeting the LGBTQ+ community.”[104]

Media Matters, the George Soros funded Leftist smear merchant, told the Washington Post, “Libs of TikTok is shaping our entire political conversation about the rights of LGBTQ people to participate in society…It feels like they're single-handedly taking us back a decade in terms of the public discourse around LGBTQ rights. It's been like nothing we've ever really seen."[105]

Cameras In Classrooms?

In 2020 and 2021 when word spread about the extent of the child grooming and Critical Race Theory (antiwhiteism) in public schools, some parents started pushing for cameras in all classrooms that would livestream what's happening so they could check in and listen to what the teachers were doing. Conservative lawmakers in Florida and Iowa even introduced bills to mandate them, but so far none of the bills have passed.[106]

Of course, Leftists are opposing the idea, but why shouldn't parents have access to a password-protected livestream of the classrooms? Many parents set up nanny cams in their house to monitor their nanny and baby sitters so they can see what they're doing with their children when they're gone. Even many dog kennels have livestreams so people can have some peace of mind by checking in on their pet when they're out of town if they have to put them into a doggie daycare center. So why shouldn't parents be able to see what's happening in their child's classroom?

Homeschooling Makes Big Comeback

Once seen as fringe or something only extremely religious parents did, homeschooling is now seeing widespread acceptance by many Conservatives who don't want to turn their children over to government schools to be indoctrinated by some crazy leftist who's going to incorporate Critical Race Theory into their math class somehow. If you live in a small town or a city in a Republican state and know the teachers and people in the community, the schools might be somewhat safe, but if you live in a Democrat controlled region, then God help you!

Of course putting your kids in a private Christian school is a great idea, but not everyone can afford that. If you're just starting a family, these are things to consider, and you need to plan ahead. Start investing for your children's education in a private school, or move to a different town or even a new state to raise your kids so you won't plant any roots in a Liberal community and then get stuck there.

MSNBC deemed this growing trend racist (of course), saying, "It may seem harmless, but the insidious racism of the American religious right's obsession with homeschooling speaks volumes."[107] Actor Kirk Cameron, who has been a vocal Christian and critic of Hollywood's war on our culture, has been attacked by the media for encouraging more parents to start homeschooling their kids.[108] And if the Liberal media is against something, then you can be sure that whatever it is—it's the right thing to be doing.

Author's Note: Please take a moment to rate and review this book on Amazon.com, or wherever you purchased it from if you're reading the e-book, to let others know what you think. This also helps to offset the trolls who keep giving my books fake one-star reviews when they haven't even read them.

Almost all of the one-star reviews on Amazon for my previous books are from NON-verified purchases which is a clear indication they are fraudulent hence me adding this note.

It's just more proof that Liberals are losers and can't play fair, so if you could help me combat them as soon as possible since you actually bought this book, that would be great! Thank you!

The Family

Since the beginning of the human race, families have been the foundation of our species' survival. Mothers, fathers, grandparents, aunts, uncles, cousins, and siblings have helped feed, protect, and educate their fellow humans who they share common ancestry with. Families maintain cultural norms and customs, and offer emotional and even financial support if one of their members falls on hard times. Families have been the center point of civilization and everyone instinctually knows they are the most important thing in life.

But now our modern society is plagued by broken families missing tight-knit social structures, which is causing a cascading failure that is having devastating effects emotionally and financially that reverberate throughout the entire country. It's largely due to single mothers, many of which were raised by single mothers themselves, compounding the problem. Working mothers, who turn their children over to strangers at day care centers so they can go sit in a cubicle behind a computer for eight hours a stretch only contributes to the breakdown, a situation which is impossible to avoid for most families because of the current cost of living. The ideal single income family with a stay at home mom of the 1950s is sadly a bygone era in America.

Parents used to be able to trust leaving their children alone in front of the television when Sesame Street or Barney and Friends were on to keep them entertained while mom did laundry, cleaned the house, or got dinner ready, but today the major brand name television stations are cultural poison and toddlers are given Internet connected devices to play games and watch cartoons which are being covertly used to indoctrinate them with enemy propaganda before they can even talk.

Political science professor James Kurth wrote, “The great movement of the second half of the nineteenth century was the movement of men from the farm to the factory…The greatest movement of the second half of the twentieth century has been the movement of women from the home to the office…[This] movement separates the parents from the children, as well as enabling the wife to separate herself from her husband. By splitting the nuclear family, it is helping to bring about the replacement of the nuclear family with the non-family.”[109]

TikTok stars, teachers, and traditional Hollywood celebrities have mostly replaced parents as the primary influence on children’s lives. And now that we’re into the third generation of nearly half of all children growing up in broken homes where the parents have separated (or were never married in the first place) perhaps out of spite from being raised in dysfunctional families, many Liberals today are vehemently anti-family and despise what was once the cultural norm—like Edward Norton’s character in Fight Club who “felt like destroying something beautiful” because of his nihilism.

The official website for the Black Lives Matter movement explained one of their goals was to “disrupt the Western-prescribed nuclear family structure.[110] Not to preserve, protect, or restore it—but to disrupt and dismantle it.

At a TEDx talk, a popular forum for “experts” to present their ideas, feminist Merav Michaeli detailed why she wants marriage to be abolished. “We must cancel marriage,” she begins. “Not only religious marriage. Marriage is not an issue of religion. Also civil marriage. I want all secular states to totally eliminate all registration and regulation of marriage. I want to cancel the very concept of marriage.”[111] And she certainly isn’t alone.

Feminist activist (and lesbian) Masha Gessen once admitted that the Left’s goal of legalizing gay “marriage” was to eventually eliminate marriage and monogamous relationships altogether. “Gay marriage is a lie,” she said, back in 2012, three years before the Supreme Court mandated it be legalized in all 50 states. “Fighting for gay marriage generally involves lying about what we’re going to do with marriage when we get there. It’s a no-brainer that the institution of marriage should not exist,” she concluded.[112]

She’s a contributor for The New York Times, The Washington Post, The Los Angeles Times, and numerous other mainstream publications, so she’s not just some fringe queer on TikTok. She is one of the establishment’s LGBTQ activists (who now uses they/them pronouns).

There is a relentless assault on intimate and committed relationships (not to mention gender norms and heterosexuality in general), and aside from the moral decay in society, technology is making it easier than ever to shop around for one-night stands and swipe through dating apps to see if the grass appears greener elsewhere.

Tradwifes

As a reaction to modern Liberal society, the term “Tradwife” has emerged in some Conservative circles to refer to a traditional wife who chooses to be a stay at home mom and take care of the house and kids instead of turning them over to a daycare center and heading off to be stuck in a cubicle all day in the corporate world. They’re not gold diggers who don’t want to work—they’re traditionalists who seek to restore the kind of family culture that was the norm in previous generations. Often this involves modest living since the families are supported by only one income. But these lifestyles are under attack by the very Liberal Establishment they are trying to avoid.

In response to a story by the BBC about a tradwife named Alena Kate Pettitt who runs a YouTube channel called The Darling Academy with just a few thousand subscribers where she encourages other women to embrace the lifestyle, Becca Lewis (who published the infamous “YouTube Alternative Influence” report in 2018 complaining about how popular many Conservative YouTubers had become), said the tradwife featured in the story was “radicalizing” right-wing extremists.

“Who needs YouTube rabbit holes when you have the BBC broadcasting literal white supremacist propaganda,” she said.[113] Yes, a woman who chooses to take care of her kids at home while the husband goes off to work and prefers the traditional gender roles is considered to be “white supremacy” to Liberal lunatics.

The New York Times is also upset over the rise of Tradwives. They published a story titled “The House Wives of White Supremacy” which started, “Over the past few years, dozens of YouTube and social media accounts have sprung up showcasing soft-spoken young white women who extol the virtues of staying at home, submitting to male leadership and bearing lots of children—being ‘traditional wives.’” It goes on, “These accounts pepper their messages with scrapbook-style collections of 1950s advertising images showing glamorous mothers in lipstick and heels with happy families and beautiful, opulent homes."[114]

The article focused on one particular woman who goes by Wife With a Purpose (Ayla Stewart) on YouTube and attacked her as "the most prominent and certainly most openly white supremacist of the women who call themselves tradwives, but she is not an anomaly."[115] Ayla Stewart caught the eye of the Liberal Media Industrial Complex when she posting a video with the tongue in cheek title "The White Baby Challenge," saying she had made six—and challenged other women to match or beat her number of kids.[116]

But while Black and Latino women can boast about making more brown babies to quicken the demographic decline of White people into a minority group in the U.S., if any White person expresses interest in boosting the White population, they are denounced as a "Nazi."

CNN complained that "Though the numbers of self-identified tradwives are low, social media has allowed them to reach sizable audiences. The 10 to 15 largest tradwife accounts have tens of thousands of followers across Instagram and YouTube."[117] CNN also decried that some of them "nod to White nationalist ideas such as Replacement Theory" and don't support LGBTQ people and use phrases like "the natural order" when talking about relationship dynamics and gender roles.

They're especially concerned that, "Some promote homeschooling to avoid exposing their children to progressive ideas about sex education and gender identity."[118]

The New Statesman, a radical Leftist publication founded by the Fabian Society—a British socialist organization whose original symbol was literally a wolf in sheep's clothing, openly supports "abolishing" families, saying, "Family is a terrible way to satisfy our desire for love and care, according to the writer and academic Sophie Lewis. The solution? Abolish it."[119]

The article sung praises of Sophie Lewis's insane ideas which are detailed in her book titled Abolish the Family: a Manifesto for Care and Liberation, where she compares families to prisons.[120]

Cooking is “Sexist”

Marxists work to attack and undermine every custom and social norm in order to sow chaos and destabilize the culture in hopes of being able to push their agenda through as a replacement for the “old” ideas. And aside from trying to stigmatize stay at home moms, they’re also trying to portray women who cook for their husbands and families as “oppressed” and embarrassingly “old fashioned.”

Every time surveys come out showing how many people still believe all women should know how to cook, feminist bloggers fume. “Good grief. It turns out gender stereotypes are just as bad today as they were 30 years ago,” reports Women’s Health magazine.[121] Saying “women should know how to cook” shouldn’t even be a controversial statement. It’s like saying all accountants should know how to add. Of course they should! There’s something wrong with them if they don’t. (And yes, all men should know how to use a variety of basic tools. I’ll get to America’s masculinity crisis later in this chapter.)

The Today Show in Australia (another hotbed of liberalism, particularly in Melbourne) did an entire segment attacking a stay at home wife after she posted something on Facebook about how she makes her husband breakfast and coffee in the morning, saying it was “sexist” and like living back in the 50s. “Has he hypnotized her or something? Who does this stuff?” asked one of the hosts. “I mean, I like my husband, but make your own bloody breakfast,” said another.[122]

Feminists even claim that the standard specifications of kitchens are sexist, because the height of countertops and sinks were set in order to be an ideal height for the average-sized woman.[123] And why shouldn’t they be?

A viral video of a girl cooking on a Twitch livestream showed the pan catch fire and she didn’t know what to do so she literally started asking her viewers in a panic hoping they would type something in the chat to help her.[124] It was a grease fire, but the first thing she did was take the pan off the stovetop, turn on the sink, and pour running water all over it, so the fire then got even bigger!

If she would have taken HomeEc class in school (like all girls should), or learned how to cook from her mother like she should have ever since she was little, she would have known to smother the fire by putting the lid on the pan (if it was a metal lid, not glass), or pour baking soda all over it (which releases carbon dioxide when heated so it smothers the flames), or take the pan outside and set it on the driveway where nothing else will catch fire.

But Home Economics (or HomeEc) classes have been deemed sexist and mandating that all girls enroll in them is "sexist."[125] For generations while boys were in auto shop or wood shop class learning about how to fix and maintain vehicles and use tools to build things; girls took HomeEc and learned about cooking, sewing, child care, home management, and interior design so when they entered the real world they would know how to take care of sick children and cook healthy meals for their families—things every mom needs to know, but now learning the essential responsibilities that people need in order to have a productive and well balanced life are shunned, thanks to feminism.

Feminist Poison

Feminism isn't about "equal rights" for women anymore, and hasn't been for generations. It's about disrupting the social order, the divisions of labor, and partnerships between the two sexes and is attempting to suppress the natural instincts of women and turn them against men (or the Patriarchy, as feminists say) and even against the idea of being mothers.

Feminism has meant different things depending on the time period and has gone through four different phases, or waves as they're called, since the early 1900s when groups of women banded together to demand the right to vote (called women's suffrage), resulting in the 19th amendment passing in 1919.

The 1960s and 70s marked the second wave, where groups of women demanded they be given more political positions and worked to legalize abortion (succeeding in 1973 with Roe v. Wade). But many feminists still weren't happy, so they continued complaining about things which led to the third wave in the 1990s where they demanded even more women be given leadership positions in the government and business—while simultaneously complaining about men "objectifying" them as they boosted their sex appeal through every possible means in order to use their sexuality to their advantage since they know men are innately suckers for any beautiful woman's requests.

Then around 2012 the fourth wave of feminism arose due to the advent of social media which allowed angry and ugly women from across the country to connect with each other online and affirm each other's maladjustments and abnormal ideas, culminating in new "causes" like celebrating abortions, obesity, and their periods.[126]

Stuck in online echo chambers, most fourth wave feminists (who are usually queers with blue hair which is used to signal to others that's who they are), these women usually find themselves trapped in a downward spiral and hating normal women (especially beautiful ones and White women) for existing, and are so spiteful of their happiness, marriages, and motherhood that they are determined to tear down every institution and social norm that embraces such lifestyles.

The "Women's March" held every January isn't about "women's rights," it's a feminist parade. This is where Madonna voiced her fantasies about blowing up the White House after Donald Trump beat Hillary Clinton for the presidency, and where actress Ashley Judd did her famous rant about her period and having to pay sales tax when she buys tampons.[127]

The feminists today who constantly whine about imaginary problems—like men supposedly making more money than women, fail to acknowledge that men often work jobs which involve much higher safety risks and are exposed to greater physical and health hazards. Not to mention they regularly work jobs that involve backbreaking labor (like construction, pouring concrete, laying brick, roofing, etc.) and also jobs that involve getting dirty every day (like a mechanic or garbage man).

A Sex and the City writer, the famous show that aired on HBO following the exploits of a group of women living in New York City, later said she regrets choosing a career over having children because now she is "truly alone."[128] She's worth nearly twenty million dollars, but now says she regrets where she placed her priorities when she was younger. Most feminists eventually find themselves in the same position (minus the wealth) realizing that once their looks fade and guys stop paying attention to them, they have no purpose in life and nobody loves them.

Not having children has other implications aside from future loneliness for most people. And it doesn't just raise the difficult question of who will help look after you when you become elderly, or who will make sure the nursing home isn't taking advantage of you or abusing you. But also who will visit you in the hospital when you get sick or need surgery? Who will inherit your "stuff" when you die? Who will clean out your house? Who will organize your funeral? Who will even know that you died?

Relationships in Shambles

Online dating was once seen as something only computer geeks did. Even when Match.com first launched in the early 1990s many people thought it was odd, and "online dating" was often ridiculed. But today when most people never leave their phone more than an arm's length away, apps like Tinder have turned online dating into a game. Swiping through potential matches is like looking for a new shirt or someplace to eat.

With the new apps to find dates while sitting on your couch at home instead of having to leave the house to go anywhere like a party or even a bar, people feel if a relationship ends they can just pick up their phone and find another date later that day. And like ordering dinner, they scroll through the menu looking at photos and listed interests until they see something they like. It's almost strange now to ask a girl out on a date in person at school, the gym, or at the store.

These "dating" apps have cheapened relationships, leading to others being treated as if they're disposable.[129] They've caused a hedonistic hookup culture, and virtually ruined dating dynamics. Facebook and other social media sites make it easy for old classmates or just friends of friends to contact people privately. And prior to social media and cellphones, if a married person wanted to cheat on their spouse, they couldn't just have their lover call the home phone which sat in the kitchen because it could be picked up by the husband/wife or the kids and blow their cover.

But now everyone has their own phone, and if you don't have their number you can message them privately on Facebook or Instagram. These endless options combined with the moral decay of the culture has caused long term relationships (and especially marriage) to dramatically decline, which will have disastrous consequences further down the road. Facebook is actually cited in one-third of divorces as a major contributing factor.[130]

One survey of Tinder users found that two-thirds of them were already in a relationship, and many of them were even married.[131] But not all of them are looking to cheat or find someone else to dump their partner for. Many of them, it turns out, just crave the attention of others like those who obsess over their Instagram "likes." They're seeking validation through matches on Tinder, even though they never intend to actually meet up with anyone.[132]

Normalizing Porn

People once had to go to a seedy adult bookstore or gas station to buy a Playboy or Penthouse magazine, or find where their dad hid his pornos, but now endless porn is just a couple taps away and with few parents using restrictions on their children's tablets or smartphones, it's fully accessible for anyone of any age. For decades since the proliferation of Internet porn the only "safety" mechanism in place is a button users click to "verify" they're at least 18-years old, which is just a self-certification with zero actual verification of their identity or age.[133]

Producing porn, whether explicit photos or a sex tape, used to be completely taboo and something that only extremely vulnerable girls from broken families or those with drug problems would succumb to, but slowly the Left has been normalizing that as well. In 2016 a new "social media" platform launched called OnlyFans which is basically Instagram for adult content where girls post sexually explicit photos and videos of themselves behind a paywall for their subscribers.

It's not even an underground or fringe platform. OnlyFans is so huge that it's now part of American pop culture and boasts three million "content creators" (virtual prostitutes).[134] And tabloids like The New York Post regularly publish stories about women who quit their respectable jobs as nurses or scientists, and then "get rich" from their OnlyFans accounts.[135]

In 2021 OnlyFans reluctantly announced they would no longer allow sexually explicit content (which is the only reason it exists) due to banks and credit card processors threatening to refuse to do business with them anymore after a letter signed by 100 members of Congress demanded the Department of Justice investigate them because the site "has become a major marketplace for buying and selling Child Sexual Abuse Material (CSAM) in the United States, as well as soliciting sexual activity with minors."[136] But six days later, the credit card processors changed their mind about severing ties with the “social media” amateur porn giant, so it continues to thrive.[137]

YouPorn and Pornhub are other user generated porn platforms for explicit homemade videos, which have been used to host not just revenge porn (recorded or published without the consent of one of the participants) but also child sexual abuse material as well.[138] These platforms allow turn-key porn production anyone with just a webcam or cellphone can make, all from the comfort of their own bedroom.

In the past, girls would have to respond to postings from porn companies (usually disguised as “model agencies” looking for vulnerable girls to exploit) and travel to their studios because the infrastructure to produce and sell it was expensive and required a degree of technical skills to run a whole website and setup payment systems for credit cards, but OnlyFans and the other “do it yourself” porn platforms have made it just as easy as being an Instagram influencer or YouTuber.

Perhaps equally shocking is that Twitter also allows hard core porn to be posted and shared.[139] Elon Musk didn’t ban it after he purchased the platform, and it’s the only major social media platform that allows it. Facebook and Instagram have strict policies against just nudity, but Twitter allows hard core porn. That alone should have caused it to be banned from the Apple and Android App Stores, which both have strict policies against sexually explicit content, but they mysteriously allow Twitter to operate as an X-rated app.

And while Democrats whine about “hate speech” on the platform (speech they hate), none of them have a problem with Twitter hosting countless hardcore pornographic videos and allowing accounts by porn stars to promote their explicit content.

Many people who get addicted to porn eventually need more hardcore videos in order to become aroused and get off, so they start watching fetish porn involving all kinds of perverted acts hoping to satisfy their growing sexual appetites. It literally rewires the pleasure sensors in their brain making them less aroused by “normal” porn, and sexual encounters with (actual) women.[140]

Many porn addicts experience what’s called porn-induced erectile dysfunction when they try to have sex with a woman because the reward centers of their brain have been desensitized from watching so much porn, and like a drug addict who needs larger doses in order to get high, they have artificially caused a tolerance to build up in terms of sexual arousal.[141]

Promoting Prostitution

Watching porn, and producing amateur "social media" porn isn't just being normalized in the New World Order through OnlyFans, PornHub, and YouPorn. An increasing number of Liberals are boldly supporting the normalization and legalization of prostitution. The slogan for their plan is "sex work is real work."[142] It used to be virtually impossible to find anyone except some odd libertarian eccentrics who would call for the legalization of prostitution, but now the idea is gaining popularity in Democrat circles as the next frontier of "civil rights."[143]

Congresswoman Alexandria Ocasio-Cortez has openly endorsed prostitution as a profession, parroting the mantra that "sex work is real work."[144] Ana Kasparian, cohost of The Young Turks—one of YouTube's most popular "news" channels, says, "it's totally fine if someone's working as a sex worker, something that we're supportive of," and equates prostitution "rights" with abortion rights.[145]

Teen Vogue magazine supports it too, with articles like "Why Sex Work is Real Work" which endorse prostitution to their young teen readers and recommends prostitution apps be created in the same vein of hookup apps, and says there shouldn't be any stigma attached to it.[146]

George Soros' Open Society Foundation (the largest private donor for Leftist causes) also endorses it, and recommends people call them "sex workers" rather than "prostitutes" because "The term 'sex worker' recognizes that sex work is work. Prostitution, on the other hand, has connotations of criminality and immorality."[147]

Their official stance on the issue is "Sex workers sell sexual services in order to earn a livelihood. The vast majority of sex workers choose to do sex work because it is the best option they have. Many sex workers struggle with poverty and destitution and have few other options for work. Others find that sex work offers better pay and more flexible working conditions than other jobs. And some pursue sex work to explore and express their sexuality."[148]

The TEDx forum also promotes it, giving a platform to a woman for her talk titled "Sex Work is Real Work" in 2022.[149] The ACLU also supports legalizing prostitution, posting their official stance on the issue in an article titled, "Sex Work is Real Work, and it's Time to Treat it That Way."[150]

The Democrat Supervisor of the City of San Francisco, Hillary Ronen, introduced a resolution in early 2023 urging state legislatures to decriminalize prostitution in California.[151] And it likely won't be long before this is a major Democrat Party platform for future congressional or presidential candidates.

Abortion

The messaging behind supporting abortion went from “safe, legal, and rare” to women wearing t-shirts that read “I Had An Abortion” (sold by Planned Parenthood), and Hollywood actresses proudly proclaiming that without getting abortions when they were younger, they wouldn’t have been able to become “stars.”[152]

An organization calling itself “The Satanic Temple,” which exists solely to hate and troll Christians, has wealthy financial backers and lawyers who help them file lawsuits against Christians—including challenging states which have restricted abortions, claiming that banning or restricting abortions violates their “right to practice their religion,” and literally refers to the practice as a “Satanic abortion ritual.”[153]

After the Supreme Court overturned Roe v. Wade in 2022, the ADL [Anti-Defamation League, a Leftist Jewish secular organization] issued a statement denouncing the decision and called abortion a “Jewish value.”[154]

In my previous book, Hollywood Propaganda: How TV, Movies, and Music Shape Our Culture, I detail how Planned Parenthood has a special department dedicated to lobbying Hollywood studios and writers to encourage them to insert pro-abortion messages in their projects.[155] For the last decade now they even host a special reception with hundreds of producers, directors, and writers to celebrate films and TV shows that promote abortion.[156]

In 2017, the dating app OkCupid partnered with Planned Parenthood to integrate a special profile badge on users’ accounts to show if they “Stand with Planned Parenthood” as a way to signal to potential matches that if those women get pregnant, guys could be at ease knowing they would kill the baby so they wouldn’t have to become fathers.[157]

When the new Roe v. Wade draft decision was leaked showing the Supreme Court had overruled the previous 1973 decision, a move that would now allow each state to decide whether they want to ban or restrict abortions, Democrats had an even bigger meltdown than usual. Congressman Eric Swalwell warned “The Republicans won’t stop with banning abortion. They want to ban interracial marriage. Do you want to save that? Well, then you should probably vote.”[158]

Chelsea Manning, (born Bradley Manning before “transitioning” into a “woman” who had been convicted of espionage after leaking classified documents to Wikileaks during the Obama administration), encouraged “her” Twitter followers to buy guns and start training in teams to “protest” the court’s decision.[159]

Chicago mayor Lori Lightfoot echoed this sentiment, saying, “To my friends in the LGBTQ+ community—the Supreme Court is coming for us next. This moment has to be a call to arms.”[160] She and others were concerned the Supreme Court may also reverse their decision on gay “marriage,” which hopefully they will someday, which is what she meant by they’re “coming for us next.”

After the stunning overturning of Reo v. Way Vice News published a story about how people can make “DIY abortion pills” from horse medication, saying “Misoprostol is relatively easy to acquire from veterinary sources, since in addition to medically inducing abortions, it’s also used to treat ulcers in horses.”[161] The fury unleashed by the Democrats over them not being able to kill babies at will, even up until just before the moment of birth makes them look no different than the ancient Canaanites who used to sacrifice their infants to Molech.

To add some perspective, it’s a crime to damage or destroy the eggs of a Bald Eagle, and many other animals that are considered endangered species. It’s a felony, in fact.[162] It’s even a crime to harm various plants if they’re located on designated Wetlands.[163] So quite literally, plants and bird eggs are considered more precious to Liberals than unborn human babies.

The Masculinity Crisis In America

Aside from most women not knowing how to cook anymore (or sew, or properly keep a house clean), the majority of men are also failing in their social responsibilities. They don't know how to check or change the oil in their cars, or even know when it should be done. Lucky for them, newer cars have oil change monitors which notify drivers when it's time, but that's beside the point.

Many don't know how to use basic tools (and don't even own any). They wouldn't even know how to stop a squeaky kitchen cabinet (hint: you lubricate the hinge). This is because they're raised without fathers, so they never learn the basic knowledge or skills that have been a standard part of boy's lives since the beginning of time.

So many turn to online role models in hopes of learning what being a man is all about, but unfortunately many of those men are preying on the vulnerable and lost in order to take advantage of them financially and use them to boost their own out of control egos. Countless young men came to look up to Andrew Tate, a former kickboxer turned camgirl kingpin who made his fortune as a pornographer exploiting women (and the lonely gullible men who paid to interact with them online).[164]

He later hired a team of social media managers to promote his new scheme of teaching men "how to be men" through his "Hustlers University" online course—which also offers an affiliate program to entice his fans to promote it to others in hopes of making a commission and make some "easy money" themselves.[165]

He is an entertaining guy, like a heel in professional wrestling (the bad guy) playing the part to a T, always wearing sunglasses indoors like some rock star and posting pictures of himself standing in front of fancy cars or seated in a private jet with his shirt halfway unbuttoned, but Andrew Tate is a complete failure of a man. He is a misogynist in the truest sense, but a broken clock is right twice a day.

Sure, some of the cliché truisms he says are valid critiques of society, but the guy is a complete scumbag which was clear from the moment he first started going viral (due in large part to financially incentivising his young teenage fans to spam video clips of him across social media through an affiliate marketing scheme).[166]

It's amazing how so many Conservatives came to see him as some kind of inspiration and sage especially when there are so many clips of him and his brother in their past openly bragging about their camgirls cashing in on suckers.[167]

He'll never know what love is or be in a healthy relationship, let alone a marriage, because he has no conscience and his entire schtick is a money-making charade that compensates for the deep insecurities he is desperately trying to hide.

The so-called manosphere, which is the online community of pickup artists, men's rights activists, and hyper anti-feminists is full of phonies and frauds. A prime example being "Jack Murphy" (whose real name is John Goldman) who became a popular "guru" selling online courses claiming he'll teach guys how to be "real men" through his "Liminal Order." He was exposed as a literal cuck (who enjoyed having his wife getting screwed by other men) and sticking dildos up his butt (and talking about having sex with other men) while he was working as the male equivalent of a camgirl.[168]

Other desperate young men look to psychologist Jordan Peterson as a parasocial father figure who is best known for his advice to "clean up your room" which is a metaphor he uses to encourage people to take control of their own lives instead of allowing their environment to dictate their behavior. But despite him building his reputation as a self-help guru with all the answers to life's questions, he had a mental breakdown, becoming suicidal and addicted to benzodiazepines, an anti-anxiety drug, after he couldn't handle the pressures of his wife's kidney cancer diagnosis.[169] A psychologist who couldn't even handle his own problems and emotions, yet became a social media celebrity by dispensing what is seen as profound wisdom to everyone else on how to manage theirs.

Former Rolling Stone music critic Neil Strauss wrote an interesting book called The Game: Penetrating the Secret Society of Pickup Artists in 2005, back when online dating was still seen as something only for nerds and before dating apps, which detailed his experiences learning how to develop the courage (and strategies) to actually walk up to women in person and talk to them and get their numbers and schedule dates. Aside from being an autobiographical story about his own journey and personal transformation, the book also conveys how anyone can use the same techniques as he did to dramatically improve their dating life.

His sidekick “Mystery” (Eric Von Markovic) later published his own how-to guide titled The Mystery Method, which despite occasionally recommending using some unethical tactics (like lying or stretching the truth) actually does have the social science down pretty solid regarding early stage relationship dynamics, and contains proven strategies to start conversations with girls and get dates the old fashion way—in the real world—face to face, not through some app.

The biggest problem most single and lonely guys face is illustrated by NHL star Wayne Gretsky who used to say you miss 100% of the shots you don’t take, and all strategies and tactics aside, if books like Neil Strauss’s or Mystery’s just convince young men to take action and actually ask out women they’re interested in instead of being afraid of rejection, that alone would make a world of difference.

Learning the art of the pickup shouldn’t be about bringing girls home from the bar and getting laid (which is actually a terrible idea). It’s about developing the skills and confidence to ask the cute bank teller or receptionist at the dentist office for her number if you feel a connection instead of walking away and thinking “what if” on your way home.

While feminism (and all other forms of Liberalism) have thrown relationship dynamics out of balance, and created monsters, there are still plenty of girls who haven’t fallen victim to the new culture, and will feel as though they’ve been rescued by Prince Charming from it once they find a guy whose interests, values, and goals align with their own.

American Symbols and Holidays

The enemy hates America, our past, our present, and everything we stand for—including symbols of our country like the Founding Fathers, the American flag, and even our national holidays. They're trying to change the meaning of America from a place of freedom, prosperity, and ingenuity, to one of exploitation, racism, and oppression in order to weaken the foundation of our society so it will collapse into a socialist / communist revolution.

This is the same strategy China's dictator Mao Zedong used by directing his student-led paramilitary group of faithful followers called the Red Guards to target the "Four Olds"—old customs, old culture, old habits, and old ideas; to have them eradicated so the "new" China could emerge with a bureaucratic superstructure controlling all education, art, and entertainment to facilitate the communist society he had envisioned.[170]

A country's holidays not only preserve its culture, but help each new generation carry on traditions, reflect back on important events, and enjoy the benefits a country has to offer. But now nearly every American holiday from fairly small ones that don't cause much of a celebration like Columbus Day, to big ones like Mother's Day, Father's Day, Easter, and Christmas are attacked every year by the ungrateful and spiteful rejects in our society—just like Mao Zedong's Red Guard did in China, hoping to eliminate patriotism in America and pride in our culture.

Many of them can't even enjoy Martin Luther King Day because it just reminds them of what White people did to the poor Blacks generations ago. I'll detail the attacks on Christmas and Easter in the next chapter because those are the two main targets of the American Marxists, but their list is long, so here's just a brief overview:

Independence Day

Every year when the 4th of July comes around now countless Black people and self-hating Whites cry about how Blacks weren't free when the Declaration of Independence was signed in 1776, so they can't be grateful for the freedoms they enjoy today as a result of living in this country. Their opposition to the holiday is like clockwork, and every year there are columns published in mainstream Liberal outlets about how the 4th of July makes Black people feel bad, and lists their grievances about why they shouldn't celebrate it.[171]

The holiday causes disgruntled "African" Americans to blame "the White man" for their own personal failures because of what happened to ancestors of theirs whose names they don't even know. Many dream of one day getting reparations, and think they're entitled to millions of dollars each.[172] Marxist Democrat Congresswoman Cori Bush from Missouri says "When they say that the 4th of July is about American Freedom, remember this: the freedom they're referring to is for white people. This land is stolen land and Black people still aren't free."[173]

Vox, a well-funded Leftist "news" website published an article titled "3 Reasons the American Revolution Was a Mistake," which argues that declaring independence from England was "a monumental mistake" and "We should be mourning the fact that we left the United Kingdom, not cheering it."[174]

It goes on to say that the United States should have remained a British colony because fewer Native Americans would have been oppressed and slavery would have supposedly ended sooner! They even claim our form of government would be better since Britain has a parliamentary system instead of our three branch separation of powers system. (Britain doesn't have a free speech amendment in their constitution, by the way, and instead have strict laws that criminalize "hate speech.")

Of course Vox couldn't conclude their screed without distain for White people, saying, "The main benefit of the revolution to colonists was that it gave more political power to America's white male minority."[175] It's always the White man's fault!

On the eve of Independence Day a few years ago, The Washington Post declared, "It's time to reconsider the global legacy of July 4th 1776," and denounced American independence saying it "helped further colonialism and white supremacy."[176] The article goes on to lament how after freeing ourselves from the British empire we went on to build an empire of our own, acquiring Hawaii, Puerto Rico, the Philippines, and Guam—and that America reinforced "black and indigenous lives did not matter."[177]

The Associated Press published a story on Independence Day in 2023 about how the word "patriot" is now often seen as a negative word because "Today, the word and its variants have morphed beyond the original meaning. It has become infused in political rhetoric and school curriculums, with varying definitions, while being appropriated by white nationalist groups."[178]

That same year Ben and Jerry's, the over-priced "super premium" ice cream tweeted, "This 4th of July, it's high time we recognize that the US exists on stolen Indigenous land and commit to returning it," and linked to a petition demanding South Dakota give the land where Mount Rushmore stands back to the Sioux Indian tribes as part of the Land Back movement, which demands that "traditional territories" of Native American tribes be given back to them.[179]

But it turns out that the Ben and Jerry's factory in South Burlington, Vermont sits on land that used to belong to the Abenaki tribe until British colonists arrived in North America and forced them out.[180] They probably didn't even know that, and surely don't care, because if they meant what they said about supporting the Land Back movement they would turn the deed to their property over to the tribe.

Thanksgiving

Thanksgiving offends Liberals too because it reminds them of how the pilgrims “stole the land from Native Americans.” But if someone is dumb enough to trade Manhattan for $24 worth of beads and trinkets (which is purportedly what the Native Americans did with the early settlers), then that’s their loss. Many Liberals go so far as to say Thanksgiving is a celebration of “White imperialists” and the supposed “genocide” early settlers committed against the natives.[181]

But it’s not just a few thousand crazies on Twitter. Such insane ideas have institutional support, and as usual, that of Hollywood celebrities.[182] Marxist media outlets now publish editorials from Native Americans every year about how Thanksgiving hurts their feelings because it reminds them of their ancestors’ failings. The official YouTube Twitter account even posted an animated GIF showing a group of Native American girls tipping over a dinner table filled with the traditional food in protest of the holiday.[183]

They also tweeted a link to a video by Francesca Ramsey (best known for complaining about White kids wearing certain Halloween costumes) titled “5 Comebacks For Your Racist Relative During The Holidays,” because Leftists obsess over non-White people who suffer from inferiority complexes.[184] Previous years’ tweets had been about helping non-profit organizations feed homeless and needy people on Thanksgiving, or “Thanksgiving Fun Facts,” but that was before YouTube went full libtard.[185]

When the NFL’s Washington Redskins were scheduled to play Thanksgiving one year, it added extra “insult” according to those triggered by holiday because they considered the team’s very name to be a “racist slur.”[186] A few years later the team’s name was changed to the “Washington Football Team” (after 87-years as the Redskins) as an interim name, and then later to the Washington Commanders in order to appease critics who kept harping about how the team’s name was “racist.”

Marxist media outlets now even ring the alarm about the supposed "environment impact" of Thanksgiving, claiming that it increases greenhouse gas emissions and is contributing to climate change.[187] Vice "News" calculated what they claimed to be the CO2 emissions for preparing a turkey, writing, "cooking a typical Thanksgiving dinner contributes 80 pounds of CO2 to the planet's decline. That's equivalent to the carbon emissions of driving about 100 miles in your average American car."[188]

Others echo these concerns, including The Huffington Post, which published an article titled "The Environmental Impact Of Your Thanksgiving Dinner," and suggested "alternative ingredients that cause less environmental damage," going so far as to say people should consider not serving turkey at all, and use plant-based foods instead.[189]

Many of the White people who hate Thanksgiving are just spiteful since they grew up in dysfunctional families that probably don't even get together for the holiday, or if they did when they were growing up, it was an utter disaster and regretful. But instead of trying to break the cycle by starting their own family to restore the tradition, they just invent reasons to complain about the holiday and try to spoil everyone else's fun.

A new form of virtue signaling has arose in recent years called a "land acknowledgement," where people openly apologize to ancient Native American tribes which used to live in the region where an event is occurring. For example, at the Oscars in 2020 just before actor Taika Waititi presented the nominees for an award, he did a "land acknowledgement" by saying that the Tongva, the Tataviam, and the Chumash used to live in the vicinity where the Oscars ceremony was being held.[190] It's a way of apologizing for White people modernizing the region, or as the Leftists say, "colonizing" it.

Such a ridiculous practice isn't just done by Hollywood actors who often embrace fringe causes hoping to look like they're helping ordinary people. To kick off an online Microsoft training seminar in 2021, the hosts began by saying, "We need to acknowledge that the land where the Microsoft campus is situated was traditionally occupied by the Sammamish, Duwamish, Snoqualmie, Suquamish, Muckleshoot, Snohomish, Tulalip, and other coast-Salish peoples since time immemorial. A people who are still continuing to honor and bring to light their amazing heritage."[191]

These ridiculous land acknowledgements even occur before some city council meetings and board of supervisors meetings.[192] A growing number of schools even hold land acknowledgment ceremonies, and some have put up plaques inside of schools as a form of their "acknowledgement" as well.[193]

The idiots who engage in such a ridiculous practice never mention that Native American tribes were at war with each other, long before the European settlers arrived in North America (not to mention they committed genocide against each other as well, and enslaved those from other tribes who survived).[194] But as usual, all the problems other ethnic groups have experienced throughout all of history, are blamed on White people.

Halloween

"Progressives" can barely enjoy Halloween anymore either because some stores might sell costumes the snowflakes think are "cultural appropriation." These same people don't have a problem letting kids dress up as psychotic mass murderers for Halloween, but if they happen to wear a rasta wig or sombrero, then it's the end of the world.

Megyn Kelly was famously fired from hosting NBC's flagship show Today after saying she didn't see a problem with White kids dressing up as characters that happen to be of another race.[195] The following day she even issued a dramatic apology on air, starting the show by saying how sorry she was—how she was "wrong," and it's "not okay." But that was the last time she would appear on the show.[196] From the media outrage over her comments, you would have thought she shouted out the n-word on air, but she just dismissed the insane controversy over White kids wearing certain Halloween costumes.

Disney pulled a costume for their animated film Moana after morons complained that it was "brownface" and "cultural appropriation," thus offensive.[197] In the film, a demigod named Maui (voiced by Dwayne "The Rock" Johnson) is a Pacific Islander, with his arms covered in tattoos and he wears a grass skirt. But if that style of clothing is worn by a White kid who loves the movie, then that's "offensive" to Pacific Islanders. So the costume was recalled and banned.[198]

There were even complaints about White kids wearing the Black Panther costume in some promotional pictures advertising the sale of the costume on Walmart and Target's websites.[199] Their grievances are obviously absurd, but imagine the backlash if White people complained that a Black kid was pictured modeling a Superman costume! The Democrats in Congress would pass a resolution denouncing the complaints and the Justice Department would launch a Civil Rights investigation!

Mother's Day

Mother's Day is offensive to many Liberals too now since gay men who are raising children are confronted with the reality of the horrifying and unnatural environment they're forcing "their" children to grow up in, so there's a push to make Mother's Day "more inclusive" for LGBTQ people.[200]

For Mother's Day 2022, clothing company Calvin Klein released an ad featuring a pregnant transgender "man" wearing only underwear with "his" belly sticking out where the poor unfortunate baby is growing.[201] The person's breasts were surgically removed, so the mother won't be able to properly feed the baby once it's born and will have to resort to formula instead of breastmilk.

Some transgender "women" are even posting photos online showing them "breastfeeding" babies, who they abuse by having the babies suck on their fake "breasts" despite not being able to produce any milk.[202]

There are now even transgender "women" who post TikTok videos about how they're deciding to celebrate Mother's Day despite actually having fathered children because now they identify as "women."[203]

The "Human Rights Campaign," a Leftist queer lobbying organization, has a guide for teachers called "Welcoming Schools" which encourages them to "develop more inclusive practices around celebrating Mother's and Father's Days" and recommends a book called Stella Brings the Family which is about a girl whose school is having a Mother's Day celebration but Stella has "two daddies" and doesn't have a mom to invite to the party so the book is designed to "help" kids "acquire the vocabulary to talk about LGBTQ families."[204]

An increasing number of schools are just canceling Mother's Day celebrations altogether. The madness seems to have started in 2017 and has since spread.[205] The Washington Post complains, "For some gay parents, Mother's Day (or Father's Day) is awkward" and features numerous gay couples who call them "Hallmark holidays" that "don't merit a celebration."[206]

GLAAD—the Gay and Lesbian Alliance Against Defamation lobbying organization, has a "Mother's Day Resource Kit" that provides "potential story ideas and suggestions on how to make coverage of Mother's Day more inclusive." Some of their recommendations are to, "Include a lesbian or transgender mother as part of a composite profile of how mothers in the region enjoy the holiday. Profile a lesbian couple's journey to adopt (either locally or abroad). Report on the legal difficulties faced by lesbian couples as they try to become parents. Profile a mother who has come out as lesbian, bisexual or transgender to her children, spouse/partner or extended family. Profile a child who has come out to his or her mother or grandmother."[207]

In 2018 Fortune magazine published an article titled "Making Mother's Day More Inclusive" and shows two gay Black men with a baby. It starts off saying "Mother's Day can be fraught for many reasons for many people," and repeats the same Leftist complaints about how gay men raising children together are uncomfortable with the holiday.[208] Some lunatics are even upset that Mother's Day leaves out women who don't have children and say it should be a day "for all women" and "there's no need to feel left out" if a woman never had children![209]

The British Medical Association, the equivalent of the American Medical Association in the United States, issued new "guidance" in 2017 recommending doctors and other health care providers not refer to pregnant women as pregnant women, and instead call them pregnant people.[210] While laughable at the time, the insane trend has caught on and now the Center for Disease Control in the United States,[211] Planned Parenthood, and other organizations recommend using the same term.[212] That or birthing person.[213]

During her confirmation hearing after being appointed as Supreme Court nominee, Ketanji Brown Jackson (who was chosen by Joe Biden simply because she's a Black woman) couldn't even provide a definition for the word woman when asked by Republican Senator Marsha Blackburn. "I'm not a biologist," she responded, which proved the point the senator was trying to raise by asking it.[214]

Liberals are afraid to say what a woman is now, because they don't want to ostracize transgender people who "identify" as women. And admitting that trans “women” aren’t real women would derail the Marxists’ gender bending agenda, so when asked the basic question “what is a woman?” they freeze up, and avoid answering the question, or provide a nonsense response like “a woman is whoever identifies as a woman.”

Father’s Day

Father’s Day reinforces cisgender heteronormative patriarch stereotypes of men controlling the grill and so Liberals are upset about that, and they also feel it’s offensive to single mothers whose children don’t have fathers in their lives—and lesbian couples who have adopted children or purchased sperm from a sperm bank and had themselves artificially inseminated since their poor children don’t have a dad.

And since most Black kids don’t have fathers in their homes and Father’s Day is an uncomfortable reminder of that fact, the holiday is also deemed racially insensitive.[215] The average Black woman has children by two or three different fathers (baby daddies as they call them), none of whom they’ve ever married and on average none of them even live in the home with her and the children.[216] Another uncomfortable fact about the Black community you’re not supposed to mention, which has also been the inspiration for some very politically incorrect jokes you’re not supposed to tell either.

The Huffington Post published an article titled “Three Reasons Why Father’s Day Should Be Abolished,” and complains that dads are often the “secondary parent” because the mother is usually the primary caregiver since men typically work longer hours while moms are in charge of childcare and housework, and even calls the holiday a waste of money.[217]

Others who have no children, along with those whose fathers were abusive or absent, are also upset about Father’s Day, prompting The Chicago Tribune to ask “Is Father’s Day Outdated?” They say since the holiday triggers bad memories for some it should be abolished. Others have been calling for it be renamed “Special Person’s Day” instead.[218] For these same reasons some schools are now doing away with acknowledging the holiday at all.[219]

LGBTQ groups are upset that Father’s Day is about normal men (straight men) and not homosexuals or transgenders, so GLAAD published a “Father’s Day Resource Kit” (just like they did for Mother’s Day) to encourage their allies in the media to make sure they include queers in their Father’s Day news coverage and television show plots.[220]

“The lives of gay, bisexual and transgender parents and their families are often absent in Father’s Day coverage since print and electronic press reports often focus solely on straight parents,” they complain. Their “resource kit” even provides story ideas and other suggestions on how to make Father’s Day more “inclusive” which are just as ridiculous as you could imagine.[221]

Valentine’s Day

Valentine’s Day upsets these same crazies too because it “perpetuates heteronormativity,” a Leftist buzzword meaning that heterosexual couples are the norm (which of course they are) but that upsets them because all the commercials throughout the entire history of the holiday (until the queer Pride pandemic) featured couples consisting of a man and a woman celebrating the holiday and that reminds LGBTQ people that they are a fringe minority (despite efforts to artificially amplify their representation in media).

It used to be just feminists who get upset about Valentine’s Day because they’re perpetually single and have nobody special in their lives to celebrate it with, so they lash out every February 14th when it comes around, publishing a slew of blogs, YouTube videos and TikToks complaining about it. But now with the Marxist’s cultural insurrection underway, Valentine’s Day is under attack for not being gay.

The ADL complains, “Be aware of how some holidays can reinforce restrictive social norms around gender identity and sexual orientation. For example, as students get older and Valentine’s Day becomes more focused on romantic relationships and not friendships, celebrations may reinforce heterosexist notions that all relationships are between a boy and a girl and marginalize LGBTQ youth, or youth who simply are not interested in romantic relationships.”[222]

University student newspapers are usually the most upset about Valentine’s Day being about normal (heterosexual) couples, and every year publish articles spewing their heterophobia. The University of Utah’s paper complains, “For individuals that identify outside of the gender binary, this heteronormative depiction of Valentine’s Day presents other problems—not only does it exclude any potential relationships they might be involved in, it also dismisses the existence of their gender identity altogether.”[223]

One student interviewed for the article said, “I perceive Valentine’s Day as a huge piece of heteronormativity. While having good intentions, it really pushes the norm of cis[gender] male and cis[gender] female romance. For instance, pretty much every movie and TV show's portrayal of this day is between a cis[gender] man and cis[gender] woman. It makes me a little upset, especially because I feel like my ideal relationship is never shown onscreen."[224]

"Cisgender" if you don't know, is a cultural marxist term meaning someone whose genitalia matches their gender identity, or as they say, whose gender identity "corresponds" to the sex they were "assigned at birth." Cis is Latin for "on this side of," which is the opposite of trans which means "across from" or "on the other side of." Or as comedian Norm MacDonald used to say, "It's a way of marginalizing a normal person."

The student newspaper at California State University, San Marcos whines that, "The holiday perpetuates a fixed depiction of couples and romance as primarily held between a man and a woman," and blames "the media" for heterosexual relationships being viewed as the norm.[225]

Some elementary schools are canceling Valentine's Day celebrations which involve arts and crafts and forbid students from handing out Valentine's cards to their classmates. One such school sent out a notice to parents saying, "While we acknowledge the celebration of Valentine's, and are mindful of the popularity of that day, it is not celebrated by all students/families in our community. It is essential that all students feel welcomed and reflected at school, and that our celebrations do not negatively impact our families and students."[226] It also explicitly told parents not to let their children bring any Valentine's cards or candy.

The principal of an elementary school in Saint Paul, Minnesota who canceled Valentine's Day celebrations said he was concerned that kids doing arts and crafts or exchanging Valentine's Day cards may "suppress" some students![227] Elementary schools in an East Lansing, Michigan district also canceled Valentine's Day celebrations, saying they can cause "unintended consequences" such as "drama and teasing."[228]

A Rutgers University psychology professor is urging all schools to cancel Valentine's Day celebrations because it's about "romantic love" and so it "does not have a place in school."[229]

It Never Ends

Columbus Day is another annual reminder of how the early European settlers treated the natives which sparks the usual rounds of complaints, so progressives have been pushing to not just cancel Columbus Day, but to replace it with a new holiday they call Indigenous Peoples' Day to honor and commemorate Native Americans.

In 1992 the city of Berkeley, California symbolically renamed Columbus Day to Indigenous Peoples' Day and nobody really noticed or took the move seriously and just wrote off the idea as coming from a bunch of hippies, but as the years went on more and more cities began officially replacing Columbus Day with Indigenous Peoples' Day.[230] In 2017 the Los Angeles city council voted to do so, becoming the largest city to make the change.[231]

Two years later Washington D.C.'s city council did the same thing.[232] And as president, Joe Biden issued a presidential proclamation in 2021 declaring October 10th (Columbus Day) to be "Indigenous Peoples' Day."[233] Now on the iPhone calendar it marks the "holiday" automatically as such, and the notification cannot be removed.[234]

At some point they'll probably fully cancel Columbus Day, purging it from all calendars like the toppled confederate monuments were removed from public display and the confederate flag banned, claiming it's disgraceful to commemorate the "violent colonization in the Western hemisphere."

But if the European settlers hadn't colonized North America, instituted our form of government—bringing with it law and order, and designed and built the infrastructure of modern society; then the Native American tribes may still be living in tepees, warring with each other, and doing rain dances hoping to get their crops to grow so they wouldn't starve instead of having the luxuries of grocery stores and other modern conveniences.

And without the Europeans establishing colonies here, the African Americans wouldn’t be Americans at all, because if their ancestors weren’t brought here as slaves then they would have been born and raised in any number of the third world countries in Africa, many living in dirt huts and walking around barefoot not owning any shoes. But because of what their ancestors went through, they get to enjoy everything that the United States has to offer.

American Monuments

When there's a revolution in a country, the old flag and monuments are torn down and replaced by symbols of the new regime. There is a famous video of a gigantic Saddam Hussein statue being toppled during the War in Iraq showing Iraqis celebrating and hitting it with their shoes once it fell to the ground (a sign of disrespect in their culture).[235] And in the 21st century United States, countless monuments were toppled in a similar fashion as the attempted Marxist revolution began heating up.[236]

Since Leftists hate America's history, culture, and customs, it only makes sense that they would focus that hatred on American monuments. But not just the old "racist" Confederate monuments, which have stood in the South for a hundred and fifty years. They also want statues of the Founding Fathers torn down, and ultimately the American flag that flies on top of the U.S. Capitol building.

During a discussion about numerous Confederate monuments being torn down across the South on CNN, one of their contributors named Angela Rye called for statues of George Washington to be torn down too because he owned slaves, saying, "To me, I don't care if it's a George Washington statue or Thomas Jefferson, they all need to come down."[237] Race-baiting grifter extraordinaire Al Sharpton agrees.[238] And so did the city council of New York, which had a statue of Thomas Jefferson removed from City Hall which had stood there for over 100 years.[239] Later they considered removing more statues and artwork of Jefferson, and those honoring George Washington too.[240]

A few years before the height of the anti-Confederate monument hysteria (which succeeded in removing nearly 100 monuments across the South in the year 2020 alone), protesters in Atlanta vandalized a Peace Monument that was set up in 1911 to symbolize reconciliation between the North and the South after the Civil War, thinking it was a Confederate statue of some kind.[241] A statue of Abraham Lincoln (who freed the slaves) was vandalized in Chicago with graffiti saying "colonizer."[242]

Mount Rushmore is also a target of frequent protesters and even threats to blow it up.[243] Vice News wrote an article originally titled "It's Time To Blow Up Mount Rushmore" and then quietly changed it to "Let's Get Rid of Mount Rushmore" after controversy grew about them trying to incite violence.[244]

Speaker of the House Nancy Pelosi responded to the rash of vandalism and angry mobs toppling confederate monuments in the wake of the George Floyd riots by saying, "If the community doesn't want the statue there, the statue shouldn't be there," adding, "I don't care that much about statues."[245] One reporter pressed her, asking "Respectfully, shouldn't that be done by a commission, or the city council—not a mob, in the middle of the night throwing it into the harbor?" to which she responded, "People will do what they do," and shrugged off the mobs as if what they were doing was no big deal.[246]

Interestingly, George Orwell foresaw this kind of cultural erasure in his novel Nineteen Eighty-Four, writing, "One could not learn history from architecture any more than one could learn it from books. Statues, inscriptions, memorial stones, the names of streets—anything that might throw light upon the past had been systematically altered."[247]

They're engaged in a cultural genocide (not to be confused with an ethnic genocide, which is the deliberate killing of a large group of people from a particular nation or ethnic group with the purpose of eradicating it). Cultural genocide is defined as "acts and measures undertaken to destroy nations' or ethnic groups' culture through spiritual, national, and cultural destruction."[248] This is done through destroying cultural artifacts like books, artwork, and monuments (or even buildings).

Destruction of such artifacts is actually a violation of numerous international treaties which aim to protect such objects even in times of war. The Treaty on the Protection of Artistic and Scientific Institutions and Historic Monuments (also known as the Roerich Pact), which was signed by 21 different countries reads, "The historic monuments, museums, scientific, artistic, educational and cultural institutions shall be considered as neutral and as such respected and protected by belligerents. The same respect and protection shall be due to the personnel of the institutions mentioned above. The same respect and protection shall be accorded to the historic monuments, museums, scientific, artistic, educational and cultural institutions in time of peace as well as in war."[249]

The National Anthem

For generations the National Anthem had been proudly played before nationally televised sporting events to signify how fortunate we are to live in the United States where citizens can enjoy such entertainment at their leisure, but that tradition too came under attack by anti-American forces within our own country.

That battle became part of pop culture in 2016 when the San Francisco 49ers quarterback Colin Kaepernick (who was adopted as a child by a nice White family since his Black biological mother and father abandoned him) started kneeling (or sitting) during the song instead of proudly standing with his hand over his heart in order to "protest" against supposed "police brutality" and to show solidarity with the Marxist Black Lives Matter movement.[250]

It sparked a national debate with the usual leaders of cultural decay—Hollywood celebrities and Liberal "journalists," siding with Kaepernick and painting him as some kind of civil rights hero. Then the tradition itself was attacked, with many calling for the song to stop being performed at sporting events all together.[251]

Mark Cuban, owner of the Dallas Mavericks NBA team, quietly stopped playing the national anthem before games at his stadium in November 2020, but then resumed the tradition after pushback from the NBA three months later.[252]

New Orleans Saints quarterback Drew Brees apologized for saying that he would still stand during the National Anthem and thought people kneeling were disrespecting the flag.[253] The following day after his initial comments he posted a video on Instagram saying, "It breaks my heart to know the pain I have caused. I would like to apologize to my friends, teammates, the City of New Orleans, the Black community, NFL community and anyone I hurt with my comments yesterday. In speaking with some of you, it breaks my heart to know the pain I have caused."[254]

All that for just disagreeing with those who refused to respect the National Anthem at the games! To appease the crazies, the NFL started having a singer perform the "Black National Anthem" before games in the 2021 season, which is a song that some Black people feel "better represents" them.[255] Many disgruntled Black people think the National Anthem itself is racist, and it's a celebration of "White supremacy."[256]

The NAACP, the National Association for the Advance of Colored People, says it's one of the most racist songs in America, and have lobbied legislatures to remove it as a our national anthem.[257]

Democrat Congressman Cedric Richmond of Louisiana, who is the head of the "Congressional Black Caucus" (a group of Black congressmen who work to promote the interests of Black people over other Americans), supported a petition posted on Change.org calling for it to be abolished, saying it contains "racism, elitism, and even sexism."[258]

The American Flag

The American flag obviously symbolizes our great nation (or at least what a great nation we used to be), and since the Marxists hate everything about the United States—from our Founding Fathers, to the Bill of Rights, and every aspect of our culture, it should come as no surprise that the very sight of Old Glory sends them into a hissy fit as well.

A survey conducted in 2018 by the non-profit Foundation for Liberty and American Greatness found that 1 out of 5 millennials see the American flag as "a sign of intolerance and hatred."[259] In 2015, I posted a YouTube video showing me asking random people walking along a boardwalk by the beach in southern California if they would sign a petition to "ban" the American flag and issue a new flag featuring rainbow stripes for "diversity," and many people gladly supported the cause.[260] While it was slightly funny at the time, it was an early indicator of the declining patriotism in America and the growing hostility from within.

Nike canceled the rollout of a limited edition shoe that was scheduled to be released in 2019 to commemorate Independence Day because it featured the Betsy Ross flag, a flag that represents the original 13 colonies.[261] The cancellation came after complains by Colin Kaepernick who had become the face of Nike, landing a multi-million dollar contract with them the previous year.[262]

In the past, athletes like Michael Jordan and Andre Agassi were the face of the sneaker giant, and they never engaged in divisive political rhetoric or got involved in political causes. Instead, they strictly stuck to sports, knowing it would be bad for business to ostracize half of their fans by publicly aligning with either political party or anything having to do with politics at all. But today, promoting Liberal political causes is put before profits and most of corporate America is now in a competition with each other over who can best use their resources to promote "social justice."[263]

A group of students at a California high school were sent home after they came to class on Cinco de Mayo (the Mexican holiday, meaning May 5th) wearing shirts with the American flag on them. The school considered their shirts to be "cultural disrespect" and forbid the students from wearing them.[264] They sued the school for violating their first amendment rights, but the Ninth Circuit court ruled against the students![265] Their lawyers wanted to take the case to the Supreme Court, but in 2015 (when it was still dominated by Liberals) they rejected even hearing the case![266]

The Sigma Chi fraternity at Stanford University was told by a school administrator that the American flag flying on their frat house could be seen as "offensive, intimidating, aggressive or alienating" to others.[267] In response, the frat bought an even larger flag the very next day and hung that one outside as a "silent but visible protest."[268] They didn't get a letter from the school because they were flying a Confederate flag or one with an expletive or offensive imagery. They were just flying an American flag!

Comedian Sarah Silverman, best known for being Jimmy Kimmel's ex-girlfriend from many years ago, said in her now defunct Hulu show that the American flag makes her "scared" and "shaken" because she's a Jew, and "nationalism is innately terrifying for Jews" because the Nazis were nationalists, meaning they were highly dedicated to their own nation and it formed a central part of their identity.

And so Americans saying "We're number one" and posting a flag outside their home is too nationalistic for her, because it's "really like an old bed buddy of racism and xenophobia."[269] So, she's worried that some Americans (the patriotic ones) like America too much, and they remind her of Nazis because of their national pride.

MSNBC contributor and New York Times board member Mara Gay says she thinks it's "disturbing" that so many Donald Trump supporters fly the American flag because it sends the message that this is "their" country.[270] And now every year around the 4th of July numerous TikTok videos go viral of Black people complaining about seeing all the American flags everywhere, and insisting that anyone who has one flying outside their house must be "some racist ass White mother fuckers."[271]

The Coming Collapse of the United States?

The polarization between Red states and Blue states has never been more intense, aside from the Civil War era. The coronavirus lockdowns in 2020 and 2021 clearly showed the vast disagreement between different states regarding mandates for masks, vaccines, and forced school and business closures. And with such dramatically different views regarding abortion, school curriculums, transgenderism, reparations, and other irreconcilable divides, many wonder at what point do we have a "national divorce" and split the country in two, or numerous different Republics.

When the Soviet Union collapsed in 1991, various regions broke off into independent republics. And the borders of many countries have changed throughout history as they rose and fell. So it's not unforeseeable that at some point in the future the United States could break apart into various regional republics. Nearly a dozen Conservative counties in Oregon have been trying to secede and be annexed into Idaho, in what's called the Greater Idaho Movement.[272]

For decades fringe voices have been calling for Texas to secede, but nobody took such people seriously; although now many have been wondering what possible solution is there to America's growing cultural divide other than a national divorce?

If the Supreme Court gets stacked with a Liberal majority and keeps passing draconian laws that businesses and teachers would have to legally follow or get sued into bankruptcy—like the "Equality Act" that Democrats keep hoping to cram through, which would force everyone to recognize dozens of different "genders" and allow anyone to declare themselves a man or a woman (or neither), and let them to participate in any activities which had been exclusive to that sex—including giving them access to locker rooms and showers (and competing on girls sports teams if someone self identifies as a "girl")—then what recourse would normal people have at that point?

Businesses would lose their license and be shut down and sued by left-wing activists or the Justice Department for violating the "civil rights" of the gender benders. Employees would be fired if they refused to play along with a transgender customer's "identity," or if they referred to a co-worker as a he/him or a she/her if that person "identifies" as "gender non-binary."

What do we have in common with today's Democrats? Our moral values, political interests, and economic models are completely polar opposites. The old days of trying to find common ground on various issues or compromise on certain things in order to win other concessions are over.

The debates about what to do politically with the country are no longer about which group of people should get tax cuts or which communities should get federal funding for infrastructure or social welfare programs. They're much more personal, and the differences are so much more extreme than anyone in previous generations could have ever imagined.

Every day more Conservatives want nothing to do with Democrat policies (and vice versa). And not just economic policies, but policies in schools and the workplace. We even have drastically different views about what entertainment we want to watch since many long-established shows, sporting events, and even television commercials now bombard audiences with divisive political propaganda using once-great brand name products like Bud Light, Gillette, and Hershey's to normalize drag queens, celebrate gay "marriage," and promote transgenderism to children.

Our national debt is economically unsustainable, the lack of patriotism and open resentment and hatred for the United States from many of our own citizens is unprecedented. The floods of countless millions of illegal aliens who will never assimilate into American culture and instead are only diluting it by importing their own are forever changing the social landscape. Many historians (and ordinary Americans) see the warning signs flashing that we may be in the late stages of an empire—one that appears to be approaching a complete collapse.

Christianity and Churches

People who love sin always hate God because His existence and moral code is offensive to their debauchery, deception, and destructive lifestyles. And while many Liberals hate God, they specifically hate Christians because Christianity is very clear about God's principles. Instead of some generic and nebulous "god," Christians believe in a very specific Deity who has laid out very clear codes of conduct in the Bible. And this conduct is often directly opposed to the way Liberals live their lives.

Muslims mostly avoid scorn from the Left because they're seen as a non-White minority group and thus "oppressed." Liberals rarely if ever criticize Islam or Muslims, but love to espouse their hatred of Christians. Even fewer people criticize Judaism or Jews because they know they'll instantly be branded an "antisemite" and have their career destroyed.

You hear about how terrible "Islamophobia" and "antisemitism" is all the time, but never about Christianphobia. It's not even seen as a real word. But Christians are the most hated group of people in America, and contrary to popular belief, the most persecuted religious group in the world.[273] And not just in the Middle East or 3rd world countries in Africa, but also in Europe and even the United States.[274]

When Evangelist Franklin Graham, Billy Graham's son, planned to give a series of sermons around the UK, every venue he had booked (including in Birmingham, Liverpool, and Sheffield) canceled on him over what they said was his past "homophobic and Islamophobic" comments for preaching that homosexuality is "something to be repentant of, not something to be flaunted, praised or politicized," and for calling Islam a "wicked and evil" religion.[275]

The city council in San Antonio, Texas voted to ban Chick-fil-A from their new airport, claiming the restaurant has a "legacy of anti-LGBTQ behavior" because it's a Christian owned company and famously stays closed on Sundays, the Lord's Day.[276] Shortly after, another airport in Buffalo, New York did the same thing for the same reason.[277] New York Magazine then published an article celebrating the ban and listing a bunch of other restaurants that sell chicken sandwiches, recommending people eat there instead, so they're not "supporting our nation's hate mongers."[278]

The New Yorker (different from New York Magazine) complained that Chick-Fil-A was "infiltrating New York City" when they expanded there, and called it "creepy" that their corporate mission statement mentions God.[279]

The Left hates Hobby Lobby, the mega arts and crafts store for the same reason. They've donated to various Christian causes supporting pro-life legislation and opposing gay "marriage."[280] And they're also closed on Sundays, an old tradition many businesses followed until around the 1980s. So Hobby Lobby is often the target of rabid Leftists online who would never even shop there anyway because they don't have an ounce of creativity in their brains so they would never even think of going to an arts and crafts store.

One of America's largest Christian legal defense groups, Alliance Defending Freedom, was banned from Amazon.com's charity fundraising program Amazon Smile after the Southern Poverty Law Center branded them a "hate group" because they defend businesses in court which are bullied by LGBTQ extremists trying to force them to engage in practices that violate their religious beliefs—like baking gay "wedding" cakes and catering gay "weddings."[281]

At the Jersey Shore, a large pier in the Ocean Grove community that has two sections, one which extends perpendicular to the main walkway near the end, has been interpreted to look like a Christian cross from the air, so it came under attack by LGBTQ extremists who complained it was a religious symbol.[282]

In one of Project Veritas' undercover investigations they caught an assistant principal in Connecticut on tape saying that he wouldn't hire Conservatives or Christians.[283] If someone said the same thing about not hiring Jews or Muslims it would have caused a national scandal with

Democrats in Congress and the Justice Department launching an investigation, but this story went virtually unnoticed in the media.[284]

When a group of Christians were spotted hanging out in a coffee shop in Seattle by the owner (who is a queer) he started yelling at them to leave and said he would "fuck Christ in the ass," and then sexually harassed them by talking about how he has sex with his boyfriend.[285] As the group left he told them to tell their friends (other Christians) not to come there.[286]

The entire incident was captured on video and posted online but the business owner faced no consequences. If he went on a rant about Jews or Muslims and kicked them out, it would have been one of the top stories in the country and Jewish groups like the ADL would have ran him out of business by suing him for discrimination. But discriminating against a group of Christians is accepted. And sadly this isn't an isolated incident. It's a growing trend.

A man wearing a "Jesus Saves" shirt in the Mall of America in Minnesota was told by a security guard that he needed to take it off or leave because it was considered to be "soliciting," which is a violation of the mall's rules.[287] Just wearing a shirt promoting Jesus was deemed the same as if he was handing out flyers, which is what the ban on soliciting is actually in place to prevent—which is a reasonable policy and one that nearly every business has, but now just seeing the name Jesus on a t-shirt is offensive.

A Christian group in Virginia called the Family Foundation had their dinner reservations canceled after the owner learned that they oppose abortion and gay "marriage."[288] The owner proudly posted on his Instagram about it, and this sort of thing likely happens a lot more than people know because most of the time such discrimination isn't going to make the news since the business owners aren't going to brag about what they've done on social media.

Leftists tried to get the husband and wife team Chip and Joanna Gaines fired from their HGTV home renovation show in 2016 because they go to church and their church—like any real church that believes in the Bible—doesn't support gay "marriage."[289] But despite the controversy they kept their show and they'll be safe as long as they don't voice their opinions about gay "marriage" themselves.

Other Christian HGTV hosts, the Benham brothers (not to be confused with the "Property Brothers," a different pair of twin brothers on the network), were going to help people renovate their shabby homes in a new series until they got caught up in a news cycle that smeared them as "anti-gay" and "anti-choice extremists" because unlike Chip and Joanna Gaines who remain silent on the issue, the Benham Brothers denounced gay "marriage," so HGTV dropped them.[290]

After Donald Sterling, the owner of the Los Angeles Clippers NBA basketball team was caught on tape making "racist" remarks about his "girlfriend" (nearly fifty years his junior) having sex with Black guys, the league forced him to sell his team—and then some people began arguing that "homophobes" (i.e. Christians who don't support gay "marriage") shouldn't be allowed to own an NBA team either, and wanted to start a witch hunt to force them to sell their teams as well.[291]

Christian schools are even under attack by Liberal attorney generals who claim they're "discriminating" against LGBTQ people if they don't hire them.[292] Similar lawsuits and threats have been made against churches and pastors who refused to host same sex "weddings."[293]

CNN host John King insinuated that Mike Pence's wife should have her Secret Service protection revoked after she decided to volunteer as an art teacher a few days a week at a Christian school that doesn't allow gays or lesbians to be teachers, saying taxpayers were "subsidizing her life" even though every vice president (and their wives) receive secret service protection.[294] After word first broke that Karen Pence would be teaching at the school, which like all (real) Christian schools, doesn't celebrate homosexuality like most government run public schools do, the hashtag #ExposeChristianSchools trended on Twitter from so many Liberals venting their hatred and Christianphobia.[295]

Singer Lady Gaga even chimed in on the issue, attacking Mike Pence during a concert—calling him the "Worst representation of what it means to be a Christian."[296] CNN then declared that "Christianity's future looks more like Lady Gaga than Mike Pence."[297] It's amazing that a bunch of people who hate Jesus are always telling Christians what Jesus would do. Because of the publicity over the controversy, another school in the district announced that they were now refusing to play any sports against the teams at the one Mrs. Pence taught at.[298]

A Catholic club at Georgetown University—America's oldest Catholic college, was labeled a "hate group" by LGBTQ activists on campus because they believe (correctly) that marriage is between a man and a woman, so a student senator filed a complaint with the school claiming the Catholic club's beliefs violated the school policy against "fostering hatred or intolerance."[299] Why a Catholic school would even allow LGBTQ students to attend is another question—one you're not supposed to ask. Shouldn't Catholic and Christian schools be allowed to expel students who openly celebrate what the Bible condemns?

Texas Christian University added a course called "Queer Art of Drag" to their curriculum in 2021 as an elective, where students create a "drag persona" and a "lip-sync portfolio" consisting of videos of them singing and dancing in drag. They also have to perform at the school's annual Night of Drag.[300] The fact that a supposed "Christian" college would allow and encourage drag shows is ridiculous, and having a course dedicated to it which gives students credit for it is blasphemous and the school should be forced to remove the word Christian from its name.

Angry queers tried to get the St. Louis Cardinals baseball team to cancel their annual Christian Day, which is a post-game event that has been held for over 30 years where fans who wish to remain in their seats after the game can enjoy speakers (often current or former Cardinals players) who talk about Jesus and the Christian life.[301]

A Marxist LGBTQ extremist group called Stonewall Militant Front organized hoping to shut down a mega church in Austin, Texas and doxxed the pastor and his son causing them to be flooded with death threats because the church doesn't support gay "marriage."[302]

Conservative social media personality and former Congressional candidate Laura Loomer was banned from Twitter (under the leadership of Jack Dorsey) for "Islamophobic" comments about Democrat Congresswoman Ilhan Omar, where Loomer just pointed out that Islam oppresses homosexuals and women.[303] At the time she had over 250,000 followers.

But a simple search any day of the week brings up countless profanity-filled vicious and hateful anti-Christian tweets, but nobody is suspended or banned from social media for hate speech against Christians. (Loomer's account was restored four years later along with many others after Elon Musk bought the platform.)[304]

If you look at how much the morality of America has been degenerating, it appears as if we're living in the End Times and the prophecy of the Antichrist doesn't seem so far-fetched. We're seeing the open worship of Satan and not just the corny heavy metal band type of satanic antics, but a more sophisticated, organized, and funded form of satanism. It probably won't be much longer until an admitted satanist is elected to Congress (who will be a Democrat, no doubt).

After Democrats took control of the House of Representatives in the 2018 midterm election, they proposed removing the age-old "so help me God" line from the oath taken before key committee hearings.[305] Leftists want the government to be God, but our rights come from God, not the government.

In the New World Order, however, identity politics has become a new religion. Queerness and intersectionality is their faith. And it follows most of the same tenets as a religion, including having its own rituals, path to atonement, and excommunication of "heretics" who stray from the dogma.

Christmas Under Attack

The Left often mocks the War on Christmas while they wage war. It's a gaslighting tactic. And like most fronts in the culture war, the Left's attacks on Christmas started small and weren't seen as a threat that would have any effect, but they relentlessly persisted and the trickle turned into a flood. Now the "Satanic Temple"—an anti-Christian hate group, desecrates Christmas displays set up on public property by installing their own satanic-themed displays right next to them every December under threats of lawsuits against local and state governments if they're not allowed to, claiming that forbidding their "Christmas" displays would be a violation of their First Amendment.[306]

If they targeted Jewish holidays, the ADL would freak out and get them banned from social media, payment processors, and apps like Venmo and PayPal to cut off their funding for being a "hate group," but it's acceptable to hate Christians and attempt to desecrate our holidays.

As part of the Marxist agenda aiming to destroy American culture, Leftists are working to undermine almost every national holiday, but since Christmas is a Christian holiday despite it being mostly secularized for generations, they are extremely upset about it because of its origins and underlying meaning. The name itself is derived from Christ's Mass, marking the celebration of the birth of Jesus Christ, but despite the holiday being more about Santa Claus than it is about celebrating the birth of Jesus these days, Leftists still hate the holiday because its Christian roots will never be forgotten.

It's not "inclusive" enough they say, and it's "offensive" to Jews, Muslims, and atheists (although mostly Jewish secularists who are Liberal atheist non-practicing Jews, also known as JINOs—Jews in name only, in the same vein as RINOs—Republican in name only, but you're not supposed to notice that, let alone say it out loud).

Many Jews throw around the word "antisemitism" more than Black people call others "racist." But the "antisemitism" label has much more power and often proves to be extremely damaging to people's careers if it's hurled at them.

An anti-Christian screed in The Washington Post starts off, "Please don't wish me a Merry Christmas…It's impolite and alienating to assume I follow your religion."[307] She complains "it is everywhere, for over a month…in a way no other holiday is—not even Easter. It is in every ad, in every window and doorway, and on everyone's lips." As a Jew, she says, it's "uncomfortable," "weird," "exhausting," and "makes me feel like a stranger in my own land."[308]

She goes on, "Despite the movies and the shopping, despite the Germanic decor, Christmas is still, at its core and by design, about the birth of Christ…Whenever I hear the name, I hear the 'Christ' in it," And she doesn't want to be "reminded a thousand times every winter."[309]

Most atheists enjoy Christmas, decorate their homes each year, buy presents for their loved ones and gather for Christmas dinner. They're not the ones complaining about Christmas (except for a few rare militant ones who are actually just satanists in disguise and hate everything about life). Buddhists aren't offended by being told "Merry Christmas." Neither are Hindus, Sikhs, or Zoroastrians.

An NBC News op-ed complained that, "December in America is a constant onslaught of Christmas culture: Every store gets decked out in Christmas finery and puts carols on full blast, seemingly believing that it encourages shopping. Television shows that normally avoid any discussion of anything approaching religious observance suddenly get into the spirit, devoting extra-long episodes to stories about the generous spirit inspired by this time of year."[310]

It went on to complain that "Ostensibly secular offices and schools are suddenly awash in Santas and sleighs and reindeer…It would be bad enough if this aggressive Christmas assault were purely the domain of the rabid right wing…But the truth is that liberals—even ones who ostensibly embrace religious diversity—can be just as bad as their conservative counterparts when it comes to enforcing the oppressive Christmas climate."[311]

What she means is Christmas is "oppressive" to the Jews (which she herself is one, including the typical JINO preface "as a Jew" in her tirade). The report concluded that we should "take a long hard look at the way

Christmas is used to send the message that America is a nation primarily for Christians."[312]

A former producer for Tucker Carlson's show on Fox News sued him and the network for what she claimed was a "hostile work environment" and said in her lawsuit she faced "antisemitism" because there were "noisy" Christmas decorations in the office, and when she complained about them, she was called a "grinch" and a "scrooge" by a coworker.[313] That's "antisemitism" she says!

But the War on Christmas gets much worse than a small but vocal demographic of non-Christians getting offended that the holiday is an intricate part of American culture. Santa is now seen as a symbol of White supremacy and White privilege by many Liberals, who say it makes Black children feel ostracized.[314] So there are increasing calls to depict Santa as a penguin instead of jolly old Saint Nicholas, to be more "inclusive."[315]

In a webinar put together by the Jewish ADL aimed at public school teachers, they complained about arts and crafts projects where teachers have students draw pictures of Santa Claus! One of the panelists admitted "Santa Claus is not considered to be a religious symbol, for Constitutional purposes, so asking students to draw a picture of something that's not deemed religious is Constitutional," but then he turned the conversation over to another panelist to explain "even though this is technically Constitutional, an assignment like this is none the less—problematic."[316] It's a problem to them that kids draw pictures of Santa in school!

In 2017 a children's book titled Santa's Husband was published which depicts Santa as gay and married to a Black man—a book written by a Jew who, of course, doesn't celebrate Christmas.[317] He just wrote it to denigrate the holiday. CNN praised the book when it was first released as a "fresh new twist" on the story of Santa Claus.[318]

After a political activist named Jacob Wohl recommended that Jews should assimilate into American Christian culture by putting up Christmas lights in December, he started trending on Twitter from so many people attacking him, calling him an "antisemite" (not realizing he himself is Jewish) and his comments even made headlines. Publications like Newsweek even twisted his recommendation by reporting that he "demanded" Jews do it.[319]

After The Santa Clauses TV mini-series staring Tim Allen came out on the Disney+ streaming service, a Jewish film critic named Scott Weinberg complained that Tim Allen (who plays Santa) has a line where he laments, "Saying 'Merry Christmas to all' has suddenly become problematic," thus proving the character's point. "It just struck me as a truly weird thing to put in a kid's series," Weinberg said. "'Someone wants to stop us from saying Merry Christmas!' is not some random campaign. It's a low-key effort to vilify anyone who doesn't celebrate this holiday," he concluded.[320] After he was widely mocked on Twitter, he then cried that he was the victim of "antisemitism."[321]

Christmas represents everything we're trying to preserve in America: family, tradition, capitalism, and most importantly, Christ—all things the Left vehemently hates. And they deem it a "microagression" to even say Merry Christmas to someone.[322] Starting in 2017 the DC Metro (the government agency that oversees public transportation, such as busses and other rapid transit services) banned any Christmas ads on or in Washington DC busses that mention Jesus, God, or Christianity.[323] So no more "Jesus is the reason for the season" or "Keep Christ in Christmas" posters allowed.

And now each year numerous Universities across America struggle with allowing faculty and students to hold Christmas parties out of concerns they'll offend non-Christians who think the holiday is "oppressive." They post sections on their websites urging people to be "culturally sensitive" in December, and saying things like, "Displays that feature exclusively single-themed decorations [meaning Christmas] may be well intentioned, but they can marginalize those who celebrate other religious and cultural beliefs during this season."[324]

Many schools suggest not doing a "Secret Santa" gift exchange either.[325] The Universities don't want the faculty to put up any Christmas decorations that have any religious connotations either (so no baby Jesus in a manger), only secular ones like snowmen. They also request faculty not hold celebrations that even "indirectly" celebrates "religious holidays."[326]

Would Indian or Chinese people who emigrated to a predominantly Muslim country like Saudi Arabia or Pakistan send out memos encouraging people not to celebrate Ramadan or Eid al-Fitr because it might not be "inclusive" enough for them? Would British or Irish people who were working in Israel ask colleagues in that country not to celebrate Jewish holidays or avoid using any religious symbols during popular celebrations there because it wouldn't be "inclusive" enough for non-Jews? Never!

Would Christians living in India complain about Hindu symbols being displayed for the celebration of Diwali (the Festival of Lights), one of the most popular celebrations in the country every year? Of course not! But those who are hostile to Christmas are aided by brand name Liberal media outlets every year which amplify their attacks on Christian celebrations in America—and it's time people stop giving into the demands of a small minority who don't want to assimilate and enjoy the biggest holiday around the world.

Most people, out of ignorance (or fear), just point to "Liberals" as the ones who oppose and attack Christmas, and very few people will mention that there is usually a very specific group of Liberals who oppose Christmas—Liberal secular Jews—or Liberal non-practicing Jews (not to be confused with the conservative religious Orthodox Jews, who believe in God and don't just identify as Jews ethnically or culturally).[327] While Orthodox Jews don't celebrate Christmas either, they're not usually hostile about it like many Liberal JINOs and tend to be friendly with (and respectful of) Christians,[328] despite their differences about Jesus, because Orthodox Jews share many of the same values as Christians, whereas JINOs are typically Leftist atheists.[329]

A lot of people get confused when they hear about Jews who don't believe in God because most non-Jews don't understand that "Jewish" is also an ethnicity aside from a religion, but because Jewish ethnicity has been historically linked with Judaism (the religion) most non-Jews don't know that ethnic Jews who no longer follow the religion of the ancient Israelites still identify as Jews because the word has dual meanings.[330]

During a speech at Texas A&M University, Ben Shapiro, one of the most famous Orthodox Jews in America, remarked why so many (ethnic) Jews are Leftists, saying, "This is one of the questions I get most often from non-Jewish audiences, is why are Jews so disproportionately to the left. And the answer is the vast majority of Jews don't go to synagogue, don't believe in God, [and] don't believe in the Bible…Jews are the single most anti-religious, quote unquote 'religious' group in the United States."[331]

And to understand why Jews don't celebrate Christmas and why so many of them actively oppose it being an integral part of American culture, one has to understand the history of Christianity and how Jews rejecting Jesus as the son of God and the Messiah has caused an ongoing division between Jews and Gentiles (non-Jews) for over two thousand years.

Few Christians are aware that Muslims actually believe Jesus was a prophet, they just don’t believe he was God in the flesh or that his death atoned for mankind’s sins. Muslims believe Jesus was born of a virgin though (which Jews do not), and that he performed miracles—including restoring a blind man’s vision, healing a leper, and raising the dead.[332] All of this is written in the Koran, which contains some of the same stories as the Christian Bible.[333]

In Judaism on the other hand (and among JINOs—Jews in name only—who no longer follow the Jewish religion or even believe in God but still identify as Jews culturally), Jesus is viewed as a fraud and a false prophet, and because of the events that led to his crucifixion and being rejected by the ancient Israelites as the messiah—many Jews and Christians have had an often tense opposition between each other ever since.[334]

Easter Under Attack

Even though Easter has been covered with a secular veneer similar to Christmas, the Christian roots are far more visible because the resurrection of Christ is at the core of Christianity and it's seen as a far more religious holiday than Christmas. And since most Liberals hate Jesus and Christianity, Easter Sunday causes them to flip out and spew their hatred every year, usually on social media which is where Leftists prefer to live their lives and air their every grievance as soon as they come to mind.

Anti-Christian posts don't violate the terms of service on the Big Tech social media platforms (unlike criticism of Jews or Muslims) and most Leftists wouldn't even think of criticizing Muhammad, the revered prophet of Islam—or any Muslim holidays, beliefs, or practices; but every Easter the Christianphobes vent their hatred of Jesus and Christians online.

A single post criticizing a Jewish holiday or tradition (like the eating of hamantaschen, a pastry which symbolize the cut off ears of Jewish enemies during their holiday of Purim)[335] or mocking their ritual of swinging a chicken around their head while saying a prayer—thinking it transfers their sins to the chicken, which is an atonement ritual many religious Jews engage in for Yom Kippur,[336] would cause a national outrage and make headlines across the country, but attacking Christians is so commonplace it's now central to mainstream American culture.

Recently, every year when Easter comes around, cries of "antisemitism" come from the Liberal media which continuously work to smear the Christian holy day as an attack on Jews for the crucifixion of Jesus. But shockingly these smears aren't just from the usual media outlets, they're also now coming from some heretical "Christian" or "Catholic" ones as well.

America Magazine, a publication put out by the Jesuits of the United States (a Catholic group), published an article titled "The Gospel of John has been used to justify anti-semitism—so we should stop reading it on Good Friday." It starts out saying, "Over the weekend, I saw a number of comments from Jewish Twitter users expressing concern about the week to come. The Christian celebration of Holy Week brings with it increased anti-Semitic comments, threats and violence, and it has for over a thousand years."[337]

It continues, "Reading John's Passion [meaning the Book of John from the Bible] on Good Friday causes real harm. And our practice is far more a matter of tradition than any theological necessity."[338] The writer suggests avoiding some of the specifics about the events that led up to the crucifixion of Jesus because certain historical facts have been deemed "antisemitic" by Jews.

The Book of John is seen as more problematic than the other Gospels (Matthew, Mark, and Luke) because of the verse found in John 8:44 which reads, "You [the Jews who want Jesus to be killed] belong to your father, the devil, and you want to carry out your father's desires." It's deemed an "antisemitic" passage because it paints the Jews who wanted Jesus killed as satanic.

Aside from John 8:44, other verses that echo this sentiment such as Revelation 2:9 (and 3:9) which warn about "those who say they are Jews and are not, but are of the synagogue of Satan," are also deemed "antisemitic."[339] Some Jewish leaders have even called for Bibles to come with warning labels on them which highlight and counteract what they deem "antisemitic" passages and themes about "the seemingly stubborn nature of the Jewish people and their disloyalty to God."[340]

Billy Graham, the most respected Christian evangelist in the 20th and 21st century, deemed "America's pastor," can be heard on the Nixon White House Tapes referencing these verses since President Nixon secretly recorded every conversation in the Oval Office using a voice-activated tape recorder. The last of the tapes, which contain more than 3,000 hours of conversations, were made public in 2002 and include Billy Graham having a very candid discussion with the president back in 1972 where he can be heard telling Nixon, "You see the Bible makes a distinction, Mr. President, between two groups of Jews. One is called the synagogue of Satan—there are two different kinds."[341]

He continues saying the other group is called the remnant of God's people, who are Jews which will become Christians in the End Times. "And then there's the synagogue of Satan," he says again. "And nearly all of your religious deceptions in the latter days, like the Bible speaks, latter days would be a thousand years; [comes from] what they call the synagogue of Satan. In other words, they are energized by a supernatural power called the Devil. This is what the Bible teaches, whether you believe it or don't believe it, this is the Biblical teaching. This is what I believe. And I believe that they have a strange brilliance about them because they're smart. And they are energized in my judgement by a supernatural power, and you see, and uh, of course Hitler didn't uh—they had a stranglehold on Germany. On the banking of Germany, on everything in Germany—and the media. They had the whole thing, you see. And he [Hitler] went about it wrong, but this stranglehold has got to be broken or this country is going to go down the drain."[342]

Nixon asked, "You believe that?"

Graham: "Yes sir."

Nixon responded, "Good Lord. I can't ever say it, but I believe it."[343]

When the tape was made public 30 years later, Billy Graham was denounced as an "antisemite" but surprisingly it didn't completely destroy his career or legacy. And the fact that he never talked about such things publicly, but instead kept that conversation for what he thought was a private discussion with the president of the United States, speaks volumes about how dangerous it can be to talk about certain parts of the scriptures.

Even the cross itself has been called an "antisemitic symbol." The London Guardian says "Christians must understand that for Jews the cross is a symbol of oppression" and that "Christianity bears primary responsibility for historic antisemitism."[344]

In 2023, Israel's government proposed a ban on Christians proselytizing in their country.[345] "America's greatest ally," as both the Republicans and Democrats in congress always tout, who we give billions of dollars in aid to every year,[346] tried to ban preaching the Gospel.[347] (And this wasn't the first time).[348] After news of the latest proposition made it to the United States, Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu issued a statement saying he wouldn't sign the bill into law and frantically tried to engage in damage control so Christians would continue to support the State of Israel and the Jewish people.[349]

The "fact checkers" online tried to mitigate the damage too, claiming the proposed bill wouldn't ban people from "talking about Jesus," just proselytizing, or trying to convert someone to becoming a Christian.

People in Israel could still talk about him! A senior editor at The Jerusalem Post said, "And it wouldn't exist [meaning the proposed ban] if missionaries would just back off—at least in our own country."[350] Few Christian churches and political pundits will admit that while Israel tolerates Christian tourists—preaching to Jews about Jesus is highly discouraged and often results in hostility and scorn.[351]

After Mel Gibson's blockbuster Passion of the Christ film was released in 2004, it was widely denounced as "antisemitic" because it was the most popular film about Jesus in generations. A Jewish critic for The New York Daily News named Jamie Bernard called it "the most virulently anti-Semitic movie made since the German propaganda films of the Second World War."[352]

The Jewish Anti-Defamation League (ADL) said it "continues its unambiguous portrayal of Jews as being responsible for the death of Jesus. There is no question in this film about who is responsible. At every single opportunity, Mr. Gibson's film reinforces the notion that the Jewish authorities and the Jewish mob are the ones ultimately responsible for the Crucifixion."[353]

Well, Christians who have actually read the Bible would know that's actually how it happened. Groups like the ADL try to split hairs and claim that technically the Romans killed Jesus, but the Bible makes it very clear that the Jewish leadership in Jerusalem at the time were the ones pushing for it.

In Matthew 27:24 the Bible quotes Pontius Pilate (the Roman governor of Judea at the time) saying, "I am innocent of this man's blood… It is your responsibility!" meaning the Jewish Pharisees who had conspired to have Jesus arrested and killed for "blasphemy" and being a "false" messiah. The Bible also says that Pontius Pilate even offered to release Jesus, but the angry crowd of Jewish townspeople demanded Barabbas be set free instead, another prisoner who had been recently arrested for insurrection against Rome and murder.[354]

Bari Weiss, who has worked as the opinion editor for The New York Times and a book reviewer for The Wall Street Journal, insists it's a "conspiracy theory" that Jews were behind Jesus being crucified.[355] Others however, like Jewish comedian Sarah Silverman gloat, "I'm glad the Jews killed Christ. Good! I'd fucking do it again!"[356]

Of course it's not fair to blame all Jews or Jewish people living today for killing Jesus any more than it would be to blame White people in general for slavery in America's past, but it was the Jewish religious leadership at the time (the Pharisees) who conspired to have the Romans kill him, which Jewish advocacy groups like the ADL consider to be an "antisemitic trope" if you dare say it.

Yes, quoting the Bible is considered to be "antisemitic" these days, including passages like Matthew 12:14 which reads, "But the [Jewish] Pharisees went out and plotted how they might kill Jesus."

And Mark 11:18 which says, "The chief [Jewish] priests and the teachers of the law heard this and began looking for a way to kill him, for they feared him, because the whole crowd was amazed at his teaching." It wasn't the Romans who were insisting he be crucified. The Bible makes that very clear. Luke 23:23-24 says "But with loud shouts they insistently demanded that he be crucified, and their shouts prevailed. So Pilate decided to grant their demand."

It's rare for Biblical dramas to become so popular, but almost ten years after The Passion of the Christ, the History Channel's miniseries The Bible was a hit in 2013, and like clockwork the same cries of "antisemitism" rang out about that as well.[357]

Very few Christians today have an understanding of the tense (and ongoing) opposition many Jews have toward Christians. Before becoming a Christian, the Apostle Paul (a religious Jew prior to his conversion) actually hunted down and killed the first followers of Jesus.[358]

Martin Luther, the monk who started the Protestant reformation by famously nailing his Ninety-Five Theses to the front door of his local church in 1517 starting the Protestant Reformation, is deemed an antisemite for his theological writings criticizing Judaism.

His book On The Jews and Their Lies, published in 1543 and sold on Amazon since it first launched in 1995, was banned sometime around the year 2020 during a purge of numerous titles Jewish groups had been pressuring the retailer to censor.[359] There are plenty of books critical of Christianity, Catholicism, and the Inquisition, but certain books that are critical of Judaism, Jewish secularism (JINOs), Jewish ethnocentrism (their in-group favoritism), or discussions about any "Jewish banking dynasties" have been recently censored completely from Amazon and aren't allowed to be sold. Even used copies by third parties are forbidden from being listed.[360]

In the Talmud, the recorded oral teachings of Jewish religious leaders (known as Rabbinic Judaism which has been the mainstream form of Judaism since the 6th century), it not only says that Jesus was a false messiah and blasphemer who the Pharisees proudly put to death,[361] but that Mary was a whore and an adulteress who had sex with a Roman soldier named Panthera, and that's how she became pregnant with Jesus.[362]

The Talmud is considered to be just as sacred as the Hebrew Bible (the Old Testament) by most Jews, but Christians aren't demanding the Talmud be banned, or clamoring about any "anti-Christianism" because of the theological differences they have with Jews.

While Christians may debate and discuss their disagreements, they're not framing the Jewish view as being "hate speech" or "dangerous" like Jews paint Christian beliefs and Bible verses. Most Christians aren't even aware of the Talmud and are quite shocked to learn what it says about Jesus—and that it is one of the most sacred religious texts of modern Judaism and "the single most influential document in the history of Judaism."[363]

The diametric opposition between Judaism and Christianity softened in the early 20th century largely due to a new edition of the Bible, the Schofield Bible, an annotated version of the Bible (meaning including commentary and notes alongside the scriptures) published by Cyrus I. Scofield in 1909 which changed the view many Christians have towards Jews. It eased the tensions between the two groups by convincing Christians that God commands their uncritical support of the State of Israel, and turned most American evangelicals into Zionists (people who support Israel as a homeland exclusively for Jewish people) and now put Jews on a pedestal as "God's chosen people" or the "apple of God's eye."

This, despite Jews not believing in Jesus as the Son of God, and most ethnic Jews not even being religious at all.[364] The Bible makes it clear that God's covenant is with those who have faith in Christ—those who believe in Jesus, not people who just so happen to belong to a certain ethnic group, even if at one point in history God issued them the Ten Commandments.[365]

Christians believe that faith in Jesus (that he is God in human form and he paid the penalty for your sins, accepting the punishment on your behalf) along with genuine repentance (regret or remorse for your sins) is the only way to have salvation and come into fellowship with God;[366] and the entire premise of Christianity is that it's by faith alone (belief), not rituals or works—or outside actions; or anything that you can "do" (such as "being a good person," so no one can boast that they have more favorability with God than others).[367]

And this salvation certainly isn't contingent on anyone's ancestry or what ethnic group you belong to. Jesus offers fellowship with God (and access to the Kingdom of Heaven) to all of mankind—Jew and Gentile (meaning non-Jews, also called Goy or Goyim, which is a disparaging term used by some Jews to refer to non-Jews).[368]

Judaism is a very exclusive and ethnocentric religion. Notice Jews don't try to preach or spread the word to others about their God, because to them, he's their God, and they are his special people. In fact, they discourage people who aren't born (ethnically) Jewish from converting to Judaism, and many converts still aren't considered Jews according to Jewish law because if their mother isn't an (ethnic) Jew, then they're not really seen as Jewish because they have no direct genetic lineage to the ancient Israelites.[369]

This is why some people accuse Jews of being Jewish supremacists, which of course is denounced as another "antisemitic slur" because White people are the only ethnic group that are supposed to be framed as seeing themselves superior to others. But some Jews do reveal their own superiority complex when giving the impression that they're above doing certain kinds of jobs like manual labor.[370]

One of the most famous rabbis in Israel, Ovadiah Yosef, preached that "Goyim were born only to serve us. Without that, they have no place in the world—only to serve the People of Israel…Why are gentiles needed? They will work, they will plow, they will reap. We will sit like an effendi [a member of the nobility] and eat…That is why gentiles were created."[371] When he died in 2013, he was given the largest funeral in the history of Israel.[372]

Jews, in their view, work "prestigious" jobs like being doctors and lawyers. This is not a knock against them at all. Their culture emphasizes education and success, much like Asian Americans do. But they're very sensitive to even the slightest criticism from non-Jews.

If an (ethnic) Jew who once also followed religious Judaism (an Orthodox Jew, the ones who wear the yarmulke) becomes a follower of Christ (a Christian believing in Jesus), they are often called a messianic Jew to make the distinction that while they have Jewish heritage (ethnicity) they are also a Christian.

Jesus came to fulfill the Old Testament prophesies of a Messiah (a savior), and essentially reform (or transform) Judaism, much like Buddha reformed Hinduism by preaching his formula for “enlightenment” to all, breaking the monopoly held by the religious leaders at the time in India, the Brahmins, who saw themselves as the authorities others needed to rely on in order to gain knowledge of God.[373]

With the coming of Jesus the Messiah, Jews were invited into God’s new covenant which was also offered to all of mankind so they could do away with external rituals and other stringent practices they previously used in hopes of becoming holy and pleasing to God, and instead they could now be guided by faith alone through a spiritual transformation of their mind which automatically changes how they think and behave, bringing them into harmony with God through the Holy Spirit, a supernatural force that functions as an invisible guide and conscience.

But the Bible makes it clear that many Jews were jealous of their “chosenness” over the Gentiles (non-Jews) being offered communion with the God of Israel who they saw as their God—the God of (ethnic) Jews.

By God becoming a man in the form of Jesus, he also provided a way for humans to better understand him, and relate to him. He came to earth not only to reveal his instructions through parables that any man, woman, and child could understand, but to set an example for how to think and how to behave. To be the ultimate role model. And when the Holy Spirit enters a person’s mind (through belief in Christ) it’s like downloading a new operating system for your computer or phone, and the old animalistic (carnal) human nature is upgraded, and one becomes anointed with a spiritually-minded consciousness.

2nd Corinthians 5:17 says “Therefore, if anyone is in Christ, the new creation has come: The old has gone, and the new is here.” There are many metaphors that describe this, perhaps the most common is a caterpillar transforming into a butterfly. Christians use the term born again to signify this transformation, and Jesus enables us to interface with the awesome and inconceivable power of God in a way that our limited brains can comprehend.

Anyone who rejects Christ as the Son of God, the Light of the World (the transmission of God’s messages to mankind) also rejects God (John

2:23), so Jews who don't believe in Jesus are not God's chosen people.[374] Not anymore. Not since the new covenant—the arrival of Jesus. Christians are God's chosen people. This is Supersessionism because Christians superseded the Jews as God's covenanted people.

Often it's called replacement theology as a pejorative and is considered a "heresy" by many churches today because they don't want to be accused of "antisemitism" even though the Bible makes it very clear that Christians are God's chosen people, and ever since the early days of Christianity, Christians were universally understood to be just that until Zionism became a major influence in Christianity.[375]

Romans 9:6-8 says "For not all who are descended from Israel are Israel…it is not the children by physical descent who are God's children, but it is the children of the promise who are regarded as Abraham's offspring."

Galatians 3:29 also makes it clear that, "If you belong to Christ, then you are Abraham's seed, and heirs according to the promise." And your personal salvation and relationship with Christ have nothing to do with two different ethnic groups (Jews and Palestinians) fighting over a plot of land half way around the world in Israel or which one occupies any of the disputed territories.[376]

And any Christians who read the New Testament for themselves, instead of relying on what non-Christians or false preachers tell them it says, would know the true history and reasons for the differences and ongoing tensions between Christianity and Judaism.

While most Christians today don't hold any grudges against Jews despite the conflicts of the past, and instead revere them for the role they played in God's plan in the Old Testament and hope that they (along with everyone on earth) will one day come to believe in Jesus, unfortunately many Jews stand firm in their opposition to Christian culture and holidays while often masking their hostilities in hopes of not bringing any attention to themselves because of it.[377]

Tax-Exempt Churches

Most Christians don't know, but in order for churches to get tax-exempt status (meaning they don't have to pay federal or state income tax on all the donations, or property tax) the government severely limits what the pastor (or priest) can say during their sermons and restricts what kinds of political activities the church can engage in or endorse.[378] Virtually every church in the United States is held to these standards because they all operate as 501(c)(3) tax-exempt entities, as opposed to typical businesses which are set up as corporations (or sole proprietorships if they're small).

In 1954 then-senator Lyndon B. Johnson (a Democrat) successfully proposed an amendment to the tax code (called the Johnson Amendment) which prohibits all 501(c)(3) non-profit organizations from endorsing or opposing any political candidates or legislation.[379] This means that a church's tax-exempt status could be revoked if the pastor starts incorporating real world examples into their sermons and denouncing or supporting any specific candidates or legislation.[380]

You didn't think the government granted churches tax free status because they support Jesus, did you? It was to buy them off and keep them out of the way, and diminish their power to organize and influence things politically. Jesus said "Render unto Caesar what is Caesar's," meaning you should pay your taxes.[381] But unfortunately, most churches have sold their First Amendment rights for 30 pieces of silver. Many also don't want to drive away people who may have Liberal political views, so they try their best to keep politics out of the Church, which is one of the reasons why Christians in America have gotten so soft and afraid to denounce the widespread degeneracy in our culture.

President Obama's senior legal advisor suggested that Churches should lose their tax-exempt status if they didn't officiate gay "weddings" once the Supreme Court ruled in favor of them under his administration.[382] When Beto O'Rourke was running for president during the 2020 election season he agreed, saying that any Churches which refuse to acknowledge gay “marriage” should lose their tax-exempt status.[383] Such battles have been quietly raging for years.

The city of Houston launched an investigation into a local church back in 2014 to determine whether or not to revoke their tax-exempt status. They issued a subpoena demanding sermon notes and other documents after the lesbian mayor was alerted to the pastor’s sermons denouncing a local ordinance the city was trying to pass which would have allowed those who identify as transgender to use whatever public bathrooms they wanted, no matter their biological sex.[384]

A United Methodist Church that owns a boardwalk pavilion in New Jersey lost their tax-exempt status in 2007 after they wouldn’t allow a lesbian couple to use the location for their “wedding.”[385] Gay “marriage” wasn’t even legal at the time, but they requested to use the pavilion for their “ceremony” anyway and were denied, so they sued and the court ruled in their favor.[386]

After members of the Mormon Church helped organize support for Proposition 8 in California which banned gay “marriage” throughout the entire state back in 2008, LGBTQ groups tried to get their tax-exempt status revoked.[387] When the San Francisco archbishop issued a notice that the Catholic church would refuse then-Speaker of the House Nancy Pelosi communion because of her very vocal pro-abortion stance, #TaxTheChurch started trending on Twitter from so many people demanding their tax-exempt status be pulled.[388]

Pastor Greg Locke, a popular social media personality and head of a church in Tennessee, faced calls to have his church lose its tax-exempt status after a video went viral showing him railing against abortion, shouting, “If you vote Democrat, I don’t even want you around this church! You can get out! You can get out, you demon! You cannot be a Christian and vote Democrat in this nation!”[389]

After his rant made headlines he claimed that he would dissolve his church’s 501(c)(3) himself, “because the government ain’t gonna tell me what I can and what I can’t say.”[390]

Apostate Churches

Far worse than churches afraid to weigh in on political issues out of concerns that they might lose their tax-exempt status or hoping to avoid offending churchgoers (thus driving away some Democrat attendees along with their tithing) if the pastor is too overtly Conservative, are those who openly teach things or accept things that the Bible clearly opposes.

Most churches in America are afraid to denounce gay couples adopting children, let alone even call homosexuality a sin anymore (and especially not perverted or disgusting), but some "churches" have gone even further and hired openly gay pastors.[391] And not just "churches" in San Francisco.

Churches in Birmingham, Alabama,[392] Madison, Wisconsin,[393] Baptist churches in Louisville, Kentucky,[394] United Methodist churches in Texas, and more.[395] If you search Google for "Church hires openly gay pastor" there are countless news stories from local outlets about supposed "churches" across the country which are doing it.

Soon these apostate churches will likely print Bible editions that exclude various parts of scripture that the popular culture in America objects to (like verses denouncing homosexuals or pointing out that Jewish Pharisees conspired to have Jesus killed—the Romans didn't just crucify him out of the blue).[396]

A Chicago-area church announced that it was "fasting from Whiteness" for Lent—the Christian tradition in various denominations of giving something up for the period preceding Easter to commemorate the 40 days Jesus spent in the desert fasting and being tempted by Satan. Their "fast" involved "giving up" music created by White people during the worship and instead used music from Black people.[397] They even put a "Fasting from Whiteness" sign in their front lawn.

Other churches across America have given sermons denouncing "White privilege" and shown solidarity with the Black Lives Matter movement.[398]

Drag shows are even being held at supposed “Christian” churches. In 2019 the Fairview Community Church in Costa Mesa, California held one which may have been the first “church” to do so.[399] A few months later that same year, South Bay Pentecostal Church in San Diego held one.[400] Followed by the Trinity Episcopal Church in Swarthmore, Pennsylvania a few months after that.[401] The Episcopal Church is an apostate organization that claims to be Christian while accepting gays and lesbians as pastors (and officially supports abortion) so it shouldn’t be a surprise they’re holding Drag Queen Story Hour events, but many different denominations are doing so.[402]

A private Episcopal “Christian” school in Manhattan that charges nearly $60,000 a year for tuition, forced students to attend a drag show inside its chapel. Footage of the event was posted online showing a drag queen singing and dancing up and down the aisle in between the pews.[403]

A Lutheran church in the Chicago area hosted a drag queen story hour event at the end of 2021 where the church’s pastor was the drag queen! He told the children, “I am also a boy most of the time when I’m here, but today, I’m a girl.”[404] As usual, photos of the event were proudly posted on social media by the perpetrators to celebrate what they had done.[405]

More “churches” continued to follow. One in Florida called Naples United Church of Christ hosted a drag queen show for kids ages 12-18 to “help” them with the “exploration of LGBTQ-related issues facing today’s youth”[406] When signing up to attend the event, children (or their parents who signed them up) were asked to include their pronouns on the registration form. The “pastor” at University Christian Church in San Diego, Caleb J. Lines, does his sermons wearing an LGBTQ rainbow-colored sash, and calls drag “holy.” He also preaches that God is gay.[407]

As degenerate as drag shows are, they had always been considered exclusively an adult form of entertainment until the early 2010s when the LGBTQ community began openly targeting children. And despite what these satanic “churches” and their “pastors” say about it, the Bible is very clear on God’s view of crossdressing. Deuteronomy 22:5 says “The woman shall not wear that which pertaineth unto a man, neither shall a man put on a woman’s garment: for all that do so are abomination unto the Lord thy God.”

Aside from the perverts who get sexual gratification dressing as women (autogynephilia), crossdressing has also been used for comedic effect for generations because it’s so strange to see a man dressed up as a woman or pretending to be one, and so countless films and TV shows have used the bit to get laughs.

Classics like Some Like It Hot (1959), Mrs. Doubtfire (1993), and sketch comedy shows from In Living Color and Saturday Night Live to Tyler Perry’s movies used it as a staple bit, but now it’s considered to be offensive and hateful to laugh at men who dress as women—and instead we’re supposed to not just take them seriously, but put them on a pedestal as freedom fighters for “inclusion” and “diversity” in the New World Order.

Hate Crimes Against Christians

While in America it's common to be slandered and defamed for being a Christian, believers in other parts of the world like North Korea, Saudi Arabia, Iran, Afghanistan, and numerous regions in Africa, they literally risk their lives by professing belief in Jesus Christ.[408] It never makes the news in the United States, but militant Muslims in African countries (including Somalia, Nigeria, Libya, and Yemen) regularly murder them.[409]

Aside from being mocked and slandered by the Hollywood elite and Christianphobia allowed to flourish on the Big Tech platforms, when Christians in America are victims of hate crimes those attacks go mostly unnoticed—and are only reported in the local newspapers or in a 15-second sound bite on the local television news.

The ADL [Anti-Defamation League] claims to fight against "hate" and "bias" to "protect Democracy and ensure a just and inclusive society for all," but they aren't concerned in the least about hate against Christians. They're an anti-Christian hate group who work to protect and promote Jews, gays, transgenders, and any group of people who are non-White.

The Southern Poverty Law Center, another anti-White and anti-Christian hate group, has what they call a "hate map" on their website showing all of the groups they hate and where they're located. And this map was used by a mass shooter in 2012 to target a Christian organization called the Family Research Council which is a think tank and lobbying organization that has opposed gay "marriage" and other Leftist agendas like the LGBTQ child grooming movement.[410]

The gunman told police he intended to kill as many people as possible but was thankfully tackled by the building manager (despite being shot in the arm himself) and was able to stop what would have been a mass casualty event. The shooting soon vanished from the news, never to be mentioned again. The shooter was later convicted of terrorism charges and sentenced to 25 years in prison.[411]

An 84-page report published by the Family Research Council identified at least 420 attacks against 397 different churches between 2018 and 2022 including arson, vandalism, and bomb threats.[412] One of these involved a church in San Diego that was vandalized with satanic symbols by someone (or a group) who spray painted them on the building after the church made headlines for denouncing a local drag queen story hour event.[413]

Churches across the country were vandalized with pro-abortion messages shortly after the Supreme Court decision overturning Roe v. Wade was leaked in 2022. Churches in Wisconsin, Michigan, New York, Virginia, Oregon, Louisiana, and others were all vandalized by pro-abortion zealots.[414]

Antifa social media accounts were also posting the locations of Pregnancy Resource Centers, which are pro-life organizations that encourage pregnant women not to have abortions and offer other options like counseling to help prepare them for motherhood, or connecting them with adoption agencies to place the children with couples who will raise them as their own. Such targeting has led to numerous cases of vandalism and arson against these facilities as well.[415]

One in Madison, Wisconsin was firebombed with a Molotov cocktail and graffiti spray painted on the building that read, “If abortions aren’t safe, you aren’t either.”[416] Another Pregnancy Resource Center was set on fire in Peoria, Illinois during this tense time period after it was learned that Roe v. Wade was being overturned.[417]

Every Christmas there are local news reports of Nativity scenes that were set up outside of churches and peoples’ homes which were destroyed, and while these crimes may make the local news, the regular occurrences of such hate crimes are ignored by the Liberal media industrial complex as a whole. But if someone drops some leaflets outside a synagogue or in a Jewish neighborhood criticizing Judaism or claiming Jewish secularists are uniquely over-represented in positions of power in the government or the media, then it’s literally a national news story and gets denounced by members of Congress.[418]

World champion boxer Manny Pacquiao was assaulted while at a popular Los Angeles shopping mall called The Grove by a gay extremist who spotted him and was upset that Pacquiao had posted a Bible verse on his Instagram recently denouncing sexual perversion.[419] Pacquiao obviously could have knocked the man out with one punch, but restrained himself and defused the situation. And instead of being commended for not breaking the man's face, Pacquiao was banned from the mall by the owners who denounced him as a "homophobe."[420]

In March 2023 a transgender "man" committed a mass shooting at a private Christian school in Nashville, Tennessee, killing three nine-year-old children and three adults. And during their investigation police discovered the shooter had written a detailed manifesto explaining why "he" did it, but authorities refused to publish it, or even discuss the contents of it, claiming it would be "dangerous."[421]

After several months and numerous legal challenges by those demanding police reveal the motive for the attack (and the shooter's manifesto), the courts still refused to release it, but the reason was obvious. They were trying to cover-up the fact that it was an anti-Christian hate crime committed by a transgender terrorist.

Even the Wikipedia page about the incident (titled 2023 Nashville School Shooting) respects the shooter's "preferred pronouns" referring to Audrey Hale throughout the article using he/him pronouns and calls her "Aiden" which is the masculine name "he" went by once identifying as transgender.[422]

The Left Embracing Satanism

The Marxist establishment doesn’t just hate Christians and God, they actually admire Satan—and this isn’t hyperbole or political rhetoric. They literally do. In the coming years we’ll see theistic Satanism rise—not just clownish groups like the “Church of Satan” or the “Satanic Temple,” but more serious groups that espouse the doctrine that Satan is actually the “good” God, and they’ll proclaim the God of the Bible is the “evil” one who “enslaved” Adam and Eve as robotic animals, deprived of free will.

The great secret of most occult fraternities is that they believe Satan is the “good” God, who helped mankind break free from the prison of ignorance in the Garden of Eden by convincing Adam and Eve to eat from the Tree of Knowledge of Good and Evil. Nineteenth century occultist Helena Blavatsky, whose 1888 book The Secret Doctrine is credited with helping revive interest in the occult in our modern age, wrote “Satan will now be shown, in the teaching of the Secret Doctrine, allegorized as Good, and Sacrifice, a God of Wisdom.”[423]

This same view is echoed by nearly all classic occult authors from Eliphas Levi and Alice Bailey, to Aleister Crowley, who wrote, “This serpent, Satan, is not the enemy of Man,” but he is good, and he “made Gods of our race.”[424]

An increasing number of people in the LGBTQ+ community are embracing Baphomet as one of their symbols, the hermaphroditic human/goat figure said to have been worshiped by the inner circle of the Knights Templar.[425] For hundreds of years Baphomet has been used as Satanic symbol, from people like Aleister Crowley to the Church of Satan in the 1960s to The Satanic Temple today.

And the creator of a transgender clothing line carried by Target also incorporated Baphomet into his designs because it’s “a deity who themselves is mixture of genders, beings, ideas and existences. They [meaning Baphomet] reject binary stereotypes and expectations," adding "Satan respects pronouns. He loves all LGBT+ people."[426]

But the coming Luciferian religion is not just about trolling Christians by adopting satanic symbols or some abstract philosophy pondering the history of mankind and the origin of consciousness. As technology continues to advance at a breathtaking pace, Transhumanism will also rise in popularity with many people believing that through science and technology they'll be able to literally become "immortal," either through manipulating human DNA or replacing body parts as they wear out with 3D printed or lab-grown organs—or even transitioning human beings into what they're calling "inorganic life forms" by uploading the contents of one's brain into the "cloud" or external silicon databases where they can live as "gods" in a virtual world of cyberspace.

Transhumanist advocates see this as the next phase of evolution through "intelligent design" instead of by natural selection. And such ideas may sound insane and the stuff of science fiction (and they are), but there are also some very wealthy and dedicated believers who are literally working night and day hoping to make such ideas a reality.[427] Transhumanism and ancient occult philosophy have converged with adherents believing that they will finally be able to achieve Godhood like Satan said they could in the Garden of Eden.

Dr. Richard Seed, a geneticist who horrified the medical community by advocating for cloning human beings in the 1990s, had even more radical notions. He was a Transhumanist who once ominously stated, "We are going to become gods, period. If you don't like it, get off. You don't have to contribute, you don't have to participate, but if you are going to interfere with me becoming a god, you're going to have trouble. There'll be warfare."[428]

He died in 2013 at the age of 85, so things obviously didn't work out as he expected, but others are carrying on his vision. One of them is Ray Kurzweil, who has become the leading proponent of Transhumanism, and has worked for Google since 2012. He even signed up to be cryogenically frozen if he dies before technology is advanced enough to turn him into a "god," hoping to be thawed out in the future if such advancements are achieved.[429]

Elon Musk is also a Transhumanist, and his company Neuralink is developing neural interfaces, or BMIs (brain machine interfaces) in hopes of enabling humans to become super-intelligent cyborgs.[430] He has also suggested that a new religion is needed, saying, "Too many people have lost faith in the future. A new philosophy is needed"[431] and is developing an artificial intelligence entity called xAI which he says aims to "understand the true nature of the universe."[432]

This discussion is far beyond the scope of this book, but just a few years ago bringing up these issues would have been considered pure fantasy and delusional, but they're increasingly being taken seriously and the implications of such technology, if it successfully progresses, will be extremely difficult to grapple with.

Most Transhumanism proponents neglect to even begin to consider the ramifications of their goals, and are willing to naively turn their mind and body over to multinational mega-corporations who can't even be trusted with users' personal data or protecting their privacy, but they're still willing to grant these same companies physical access to their own brain through a neural interface, just like the enslaved humans in The Matrix films.

The LGBTQ+ Agenda

All they wanted was the right to get “married” they said, which happened in 2015 when the U.S. Supreme Court dictated to the American people that the definition of marriage should be changed from a man and a woman partnered together for a lifetime committed relationship to that of two men or two women as well. This, despite a marriage being defined as a partnership between a man and a woman ever since the beginning of the human race—and this mandated redefining of marriage was the moment when our society began sliding down the slippery LGBTQ+ slope into the Twilight Zone.

Allowing two men and two women to call themselves a “married” couple wasn’t enough though. Soon just a few short years later we saw the rise of “drag kids”—young boys dressed as drag queens and performing in gay bars where grown men throw dollar bills at them just like patrons do to strippers in strip clubs.[433] And then teachers began telling their elementary school students that little boys might actually be girls and vice versa. And schools started inviting drag queens to perform for students and even holding gay “Pride” parades on school grounds.[434]

These so-called “drag kids” aren’t just a few isolated instances, they’ve become an entire industry. In 2018 ABC’s flagship morning show Good Morning America famously hosted “Desmond is Amazing” when he was just 11-years-old, who sashayed onto the stage to a thunderous applause.[435] He’s just one of many pre-teen “drag kids” whose parents have infected social media with such material which is then celebrated and amplified by the legacy media outlets.

In 2019 YouTube, which also hosts full length films by major studios aside from user-generated content, started streaming a documentary called Drag Kids, not to sound the alarm about the practice, but to celebrate and promote it. Netflix produced a series called AJ and the Drag Queen about a 10-year-old boy who travels around with a drag queen as he performs in shows across the country.[436] In 2022 the Discovery channel produced a documentary about child drag queens—again to glorify them, not to denounce the growing trend.[437]

They feel so emboldened now since gender-benders and perverts are widely celebrated in pop culture at every Hollywood award show and boosted to go viral on the Big Tech platforms, that in 2021 the San Francisco Gay Choir (yes, that's actually the name of the organization—not just the San Francisco Choir, but the gay choir) released a song with lyrics about how "We're coming for your children…You think we'll corrupt your kids if our agenda goes unchecked. Funny. Just this once, you're correct." They go on, "We'll convert your children. Happens bit by bit. Quietly and subtly, and you will barely notice it."[438] The chorus in the song is literally "We're coming for your children."

To promote their agenda even further, countless fake polls are published with highly skewed numbers attempting to show that LGBTQ people aren't just one or maybe two percent of the population (which they are), but that twenty or thirty percent of people are either gay or some kind of queer or transgender.[439] One such poll claimed that more freshman at Harvard and Yale identify as LGBT-whatever than consider themselves Conservative.[440]

38% of college students at Brown University in Rhode Island said they "identify" as LGBTQ as well, according to a recent poll.[441] The CDC claims that 25% of high school students identity as LGBTQ, which is utterly ridiculous.[442]

Part of the reason the percentages are so absurdly high is because not identifying as queer is seen as being homophobic these days, and many straight kids falsely check that they're some kind of LGBTQ on these surveys in order to inflate the percentages so the queers don't feel like such a small minority. It's like stuffing the ballot box. They're just trying to help their "team" get more votes because they feel sorry for them.

Children aren't born a boy or a girl now, they say. They are "assigned" a sex by the doctors or their parents who "assume" the child's sex because of their genitals. The subversives want kids raised "gender neutral"—meaning not making any distinction between boys and girls at all.[443] The children can later decide for themselves if they want to be a boy or a girl (or neither).

Many suspect that parents who raise their children "gender non-binary" are actually suffering from a form of Munchausen syndrome by proxy.[444] A study conducted back in 1991 published in the National Library of Medicine found that 53% of the mothers of children with gender dysphoria met the criteria for having Borderline Personality Disorder.[445]

Meanwhile all the Leftist online outlets continue to promote gender bending with an endless barrage of stories touting how men should start wearing makeup.[446] And not just to hide an unsightly blemish, but lipstick and eye shadow. And there is a sustained campaign to encourage young boys to wear dresses.[447]

It's almost impossible now to watch any major media outlet without having gays and transgenders shoved in your face on countless TV shows, award shows, and even commercials. In 2021 Playboy magazine put a gay man dressed as a "bunny" on the cover, wearing heels and tights. Seriously, a gay man on the cover of Playboy magazine![448]

Since Pandora's Box has been opened, now men who identify as women are demanding to be allowed to use women's bathrooms, locker rooms, and showers. Transgender "women" who have been convicted of crimes have even been sent to women's prisons, where they have impregnated and even raped the (actual) women there![449] Despite being biological males and not having any "bottom surgery" (to remove their penis) they "identified" as women, and so they were sent to a women's prison![450]

And then there's the growing problem of biological men who identify as women competing in women's sports and robbing high school girls of college scholarships and robbing college athletes of their rightful place in competitions.[451] It's as if the gates of Hell have been opened and hordes of demons are running amuck, and instead of trying to contain the madness—schools, major corporations, the U.S. military, and the mainstream media are all promoting it.

Pride Month

Every June is the worst because now you can't escape being harassed by LGBTQ+ propaganda around every corner, whether you're scrolling through social media, channel surfing on network television, or even grocery shopping because the cultural Marxists deemed it "Pride Month," which is now basically a national holiday. It used to be called Gay Pride Month, but that wasn't "inclusive enough" since it didn't reference bisexuals, transgenders, pansexuals, and the countless other supposed "genders" and sexual orientations in the queer community.

Virtually every major brand on social media from automobile companies to banks change their profile pictures to incorporate a rainbow into their logos, and most post special messages about how much they support LGBTQ people. Nearly every professional sports team in the NFL, MLB, NBA, and even NHL now hold an annual "Pride Night" in June (or launch a promotional campaign if it's their off season) to celebrate this as well, where the teams coerce players to wear special rainbow jerseys or pins. They even have gay-themed half time shows at the games.[452]

And now there are "Pride" sections in major stores like Target and Walmart with special LGBTQ-themed clothes throughout the month of June.[453] PetSmart even sells rainbow colored "Pride" accessories for dogs and cats each year![454] Many major food brands from Bud Light and Kellogg's, to KIND bars and Effen Vodka all produce special gay Pride packaging for their products just like most companies do for normal holidays such as Halloween, Christmas, and Easter.[455]

In 2021 Chipotle started selling special burritos named after popular drag queens to celebrate the "holiday."[456] The following year Taco Bell announced they were sponsoring a "Drag Brunch Tour" at numerous locations and held drag shows inside their restaurants.[457] Some teachers in public schools even have their elementary school kids make Pride flags as an arts and crafts project.[458] And anyone who doesn't participate in LGBTQ

Pride celebrations at schools, work, or sporting events is denounced as "homophobic" and their career can be destroyed in an instant.[459]

Targeting Children with Transgenderism

Everyone knows how impressionable young children are. Until the age of six or eight most of them believe in Santa Claus, the Easter Bunny, and the Tooth Fairy. So it wouldn't be hard at all to convince little boys that as they grow up they'll transform into a girl or vice versa. And since transgenders are being celebrated as if they're divine beings endowed with special powers, it seems many Liberal parents want their children to be transgender so they can be a symbol of how woke the family is.

The Marxist propaganda trying to normalize incorporating children into drag shows is now everywhere in media—including advertisements. Kaiser Permanente insurance featured a scene from a Drag Queen Story Hour event in one of their commercials in 2019.[460] It started off just showing people from different walks of life, noting that everyone needs health insurance, but for the obvious reason they included a quick segment of a drag queen reading to small children to further desensitize people to the idea.

Major brands like Oreo, Sprite, Pantene shampoo, and Gillette razors have produced commercials featuring and celebrating transgender kids or young adults.[461] In October 2021 the Twix candy company came out with a Halloween-themed commercial about a young boy who wanted to wear a princess dress and his babysitter (a "witch") encouraged him to do so. She even used her "magic" powers to kill another boy who was making fun of him for wearing the dress.[462]

Kraft, best known for their macaroni and cheese, sponsored the publication of a children's book about pronouns titled His, Hers, Them & Theirs: Learning Pronouns with the Bears in 2021 which was read by two drag queens online for a special Christmas-themed Drag Queen Story Hour.[463] There's even a transgender Barbie doll now, modeled after "Lavern" Cox, a transgender actor who was featured on the cover of Time magazine in 2014. And a drag queen Build-A-Bear modeled after RuPaul.[464]

In 2021 Blue's Clues, a cartoon aimed at preschoolers on Nickelodeon, aired a singalong featuring a drag queen at a Pride parade as it sung how amazing queer people are (including gender non-binary people).[465]

The Democrats' strategy to counter opposition to their new predatory behavior is to call anyone who is against grooming children a QAnon conspiracy theorist.[466] In further attempts to stifle criticism Wikipedia calls the blatant LGBTQ grooming activities a "conspiracy theory."[467]

After a few members of the Proud Boys (the American nationalist organization that often counter-protests at Marxist events) showed up to protest a drag queen story hour event at a library in the San Francisco Bay Area, the local district attorney's office launched a "hate crime" investigation into them.[468] They weren't violent or threatening, all they did was show up and denounce the event for exposing children to sexual themes and call the drag queen a groomer.

After protesters showed up outside a gay bar in Dallas, Texas that held a drag queen event advertised to children, Newsweek ran a headline titled "Video of 'Anti-Groomer' Protest Outside Gay Bar Sparks Outrage," giving the impression that it was the protest which was the problem, not that drag queens were performing for small children inside.[469] Of course the groomers were upset about the protest so Newsweek took their side and portrayed them as the victims of "homophobes."

Until recently it would have been unheard of for anyone to bring children to drag shows (let alone have pre-teen children themselves dress in drag) because it was always seen as an adult form of entertainment. Drag queens often have sexual innuendo names which clearly illustrate and emphasize the adult nature of the shows. The sexual focus is also evident in the fact that all drag queens are gay (or bisexual, or some kind of queer).

Unsurprising to normal people, numerous drag queen story hour readers have been found to be convicted sex offenders or later arrested for possessing child pornography.[470] Two of the drag queens who read books to children at a Houston, Texas library were found to be convicted child sex offenders.[471] This was only discovered after a Conservative group called Mass Resistance (formerly the Parents' Rights Coalition) investigated the drag queens who were involved. A judge in Milwaukee, Wisconsin who was the head of a local LGBTQ advocacy group called the Cream City

Foundation which sponsored drag queen story hour events, was arrested for possession and distribution of child sexual abuse videos.[472]

Another reader at Drag Queen Story Hour[473] in Harrisburg, Pennsylvania was charged with 25 counts of child pornography.[474] And there are undoubtedly many more, but it would take a local journalist reporting on such arrests to take a few extra steps to look into the backgrounds of such perpetrators.

This, at the same time mainstream Liberal outlets are endorsing kink for children.[475] Kink, if you're not aware of it, is basically a synonym for sexual perversion of any and all kinds. The Washington Post published an op-ed by one of their writers titled, "Yes, kink belongs at Pride [celebrations]. And I want my kids to see it."[476] Photos now circulate every June showing parents who bring their small children to Pride parades which feature other attendees wearing kink gear, including "pup masks" and others who are practically naked.

Tucking And Packing Underwear for Kids

Because an increasing number of progressive parents are either convinced their children are trans or convincing their children they're trans, companies are even selling special "tucking" underwear for small "transgender" children.[477] "Tucking" involves shoving the testes up inside the inguinal canals and then pulling the penis and scrotum between the legs and holding it in place with the underwear made of firm material in that area.[478] For transgender "boys" they're selling fake penises (known as "packers"). Such items were once only available on fringe websites but now they're listed for sale on Amazon and even Etsy.[479]

For "Pride Month" in June 2022, Target began selling "chest binders" (also known as compression tops) which women who want to be men use to compress and hide their breasts; and "packing underwear" which include padding to cause a bulge in the crotch to give the appearance of a penis and testicles.[480] It wasn't until the following year that such products caught the attention of most Conservatives, sparking calls for a boycott.

As part of Target's new LGBT Pride Collection, they also sell "tucking underwear" (or gaffs) which transgender "women" (and drag queens) use to help conceal their penis, which again is done by shoving their testicles up the inguinal canals (where they were before birth) and folding their penis downward under their legs and using a stiff front panel to keep everything in place.[481]

The head of the Health and Human Services department under Joe Biden, Xavier Becerra, supports sex change surgery for children.[482] Not "just" crossdressing the kids and using different pronouns for them. But putting them on puberty blockers and then subjecting them to gender-reassignment surgeries! They call it "health care" or "gender affirming care."

And I won't even describe what such surgeries entail, or the lifelong complications they bring. You can go and Google "vaginoplasty" or "phalloplasty" to see photos of exactly what "gender-affirming" surgeries do to people's genitals. But be warned! They are horrific, but people should know what the end of the road is for transgender patients.

When White House Press Secretary Jen Psaki was asked about the Health and Human Services director endorsing gender-reassignment surgeries for minors she confirmed that is the official stance of the Biden administration, saying it is "a best practice and potentially lifesaving."[483] The Assistant Health Secretary, Admiral "Rachel" Levine, who is a transgender "woman," is obsessed with legalizing and normalizing putting small children on puberty blockers and giving them gender-reassignment surgeries (which also literally sterilizes them).[484]

Disney Goes Gay

Even Disney, the once family friendly entertainment giant beloved by everyone for generations, has become a vehicle to deliver LGBTQ propaganda to children. A leaked Zoom meeting of Disney executives in 2022 showed them openly talking about the company's "not so secret gay agenda" with one of them bragging they were "adding in queerness" wherever they could and planned for at least 50% of the characters in their films and television series to be LGBTQ+ or racial minorities by the end of 2022.

Shortly after the leaked Zoom meeting it became clear that Disney was keeping their promise to "queer up" more characters, something that had already been happening for the last eight years, but most parents had no idea it was happening at all. Disney had been slowly yet incrementally introducing gay characters starting back in 2014 when the Disney Channel's most popular comedy at the time Good Luck Charlie decided to include a lesbian couple who were raising a daughter together.[485]

The next year (in 2015) on the Disney-owned ABC Family Channel [which has since been renamed "Freeform"] a show called The Fosters included a scene showing two thirteen-year-old boys kissing which was hailed as another first for the LGTBQ movement.[486]

From there, it just continued to snowball. Disney+ released an animated short called Out (2020) about—you guessed it—a kid who comes out to his parents as gay after he moves in with his "roommate" who turns out to be his boyfriend. He was nervous about his parents finding out the truth, but of course, they were thrilled. The film was hailed as Disney/Pixar's "first gay main character."[487]

Then they introduced their first bisexual character in their series The Owl House in 2020*,* which includes a 14-year-old girl in a leading role who used to be interested in boys, but now likes girls.[488] The show's creator is bisexual herself and bragged that she lobbied Disney to turn the character bisexual just like her, and they agreed.[489]

Again, all this started happening years before the leaked Zoom meetings where they openly talked about their agenda, which wasn't even a secret because every time they gayed up a cartoon or movie since 2014 it was celebrated as another "move forward" by the Marxist media.[490] Sadly, most Conservatives didn't notice or were too cowardly to say anything about it, but the leaked Zoom meeting in 2022 laid bare their plan for all to see.

The previous year in June 2021 for "Pride Month" they produced a special "Pride Celebration Spectacular" musical hosted by a drag queen on Disney+.[491] Two words nobody ever thought they would hear in the same sentence—Disney and drag queens. Then in 2022 Disney launched an LGBTQ Pride children's clothing line.[492] And in June 2023 they held their first LGBTQ Pride Night at their theme parks.[493] That same month they released a feature film called Elemental which introduced their first "gender non-binary" character, voiced by a "non-binary" actor.[494]

There's no putting the toothpaste back in the tube. Disney is a queer company, and it probably won't be long before they announce that Mickey Mouse is bisexual.

U.S. Military Goes Gay

Gays used to be banned from the U.S. military because no one wants to have a member of their unit checking them, out dreaming of having sex with them; but now our military doesn't just allow them in—they celebrate them, and are actively recruiting them! Even during the Trump administration various branches of the military started posting messages on their social media accounts celebrating Gay Pride Month, and even posting videos of soldiers in uniform talking about how great it is to have a bunch of queers in the military.[495]

The Department of Defense has been celebrating LGBT Pride Month since 2012.[496] And now every June the different branches of the military post rainbow flags on their Instagram, Facebook, and other social media accounts along with cringeworthy messages about how they "commemorate the proud legacy of LGBT individuals who are part of the fabric of the nation and the U.S. Army."[497]

They even post videos online showing senior officers in uniform standing in front of Pride flags while announcing, "We observe LGBT pride month to mark the progress we've made" and call on all Americans to celebrate lesbians, gays, bisexuals, and transgender people.[498]

Even though President Trump is very LGBT-friendly and never really criticized the community as a whole, he did ban transgender people from serving in the military, causing every Liberal on social media to sound off about what a "bigot" he is and how it's "discrimination."[499] We don't allow mentally unstable people around dangerous weapons, and since statistically about half of transgender people are suicidal, that's all the more reason they shouldn't be allowed in the military.[500] Not to mention the female soldiers don't want to have to shower with some "chick with a dick."

But once Trump was out of office and Joe Biden moved in, the woke agenda went into overdrive. First he lifted Trump's ban on transgenders, and then the U.S. Army (and other military branches) began subjecting solders to mandatory diversity, equity, and inclusion training on gender identity to indoctrinate them into accepting transgender and other queer soldiers.[501]

The Air Force then featured a transgender "woman" in a video posted online to mark the made-up Twitter holiday "Transgender Day of Visibility."[502] Lieutenant Colonel "Bree" Fam, one of the highest-ranking "openly transgender" people in the military, who works as an engineer and looks like a six-foot-tall man wearing lipstick with his hair in a ponytail.

The Army released a series of woke recruitment videos in 2021, including one featuring a girl who was proud to have been raised by "two moms," and a cartoon illustration of her story showing a scene from the lesbian "wedding."[503] She also mentioned how she had been "fighting for freedom since she was a kid" as the ad showed her marching in a gay Pride parade.

That same year the CIA also posted a series of recruiting videos featuring people who would have previously never even been considered for employment in the agency due to psychological problems, but now are being celebrated as part of the new "diversity" initiative. One woman, a "proud Latino," introduced herself as a "cisgender millennial" who said she suffers from anxiety but the CIA is so welcoming they gave her a job anyway.[504] Another video featured a queer man with a giant nose ring. Even NASA now releases videos for "Pride" month featuring employees talking about how they're gay, lesbian, transgender, and gender non-binary and "no matter what your identity is in the community, there's going to be a place for you."[505]

Since LGBT people are supposed to only be celebrated and nothing about their perverted sexual activities or unhealthy lifestyles are supposed to be criticized (like the high rate of HIV or incontinence later in life from their anuses being stretched out),[506] the issue of gay men raping other men in the military is perhaps the most forbidden topic of all. The dirty secret behind President Obama lifting the longstanding ban on gays in the military is the frequency of gay soldiers raping other men.[507]

All of the focus around the issue of sexual assault in the military is on women victims (in the rare instances it's mentioned in the media at all), but the fact is that since men make up almost all of the perpetrators in sex crimes, what's always overlooked is that they're not just raping women—the gay ones are raping men. And ever since welcoming gays into the military instead of forbidding them and kicking them out if discovered (which was the policy until 2011), an epidemic of gay men sexually assaulting other men has been occurring.[508]

Such crimes are most often unreported because the victims are too embarrassed to come forward and talk about what happened.[509] Recent estimates are that 90% of male victims don't report such incidents.[510] In attempts to hide the number of men raped by gays in the military—aside from usually only focusing on the female victims—reports often group all forms of unwanted sexual contact into one figure (from groping to attempted rape, to actual rape—or penetrative assault as it's called), so most people dismiss such incidents as just hazing.[511]

And while there is hazing and bullying (the same kinds of juvenile and often perverted "pranks" seen in college fraternities) which do technically constitute sexual assault—the rapes and attempted rapes are swept under the rug.[512]

The actual number of male rape victims in the military was estimated to be fifteen times higher than what's actually reported less than three years after gays were allowed in, according to a study by the American Psychological Association.[513] 53% of overall known sexual assault victims in the military are now male.[514] These facts are ignored by most of the media because publicizing them is not only deemed homophobic, but also a national security risk because it would undermine faith in our military and hurt recruiting efforts.[515]

The “Father” of “Gay Rights” Movement

While the gay agenda had grown into a tsunami in the 21st century, the storm had been brewing for decades as activists plotted to get LGBTQ lifestyles accepted by society as a whole. The man credited as being the “father” of the “gay rights” movement is Harry Hay, who created a secret society in the 1950s called the Mattachine Society which was named after a French group of entertainers in the 16th century who wore masks when performing. He took inspiration from Freemasonry and Communism as well because he admired Marxist ideologies regarding “oppressed” groups.[516]

Harry Hay also supported the infamous pedophile group NAMBLA, the North American Man Boy Love Association, which advocates for eliminating the age of consent laws for sexual contact with children.[517] During the Los Angeles Gay Pride Parade in 1986 he marched holding a banner that read “NAMBLA Walks With Me” because organizers had banned the group from participating in the parade and Harry Hay was upset that they were “discriminating” against NAMBLA.[518]

When he was later confronted about his support for NAMBLA he said, “If the parents and friends of gays are truly friends of gays, they would know from their gay kids that the relationship with an older man is precisely what thirteen, fourteen, and fifteen-year-old kids need more than anything else in the world.”[519]

Hay himself says he had a sexual relationship with a 25-year-old adult male when he was just fourteen, and thought it was “beneficial.”[520] After Hay died, David Thorstad, an admitted pederast and co-founder of NAMBLA, praised him for being “a vocal and courageous supporter of NAMBLA.”[521] Hay had worked closely with the organization for years hoping to legalize and normalize pederasty just like in Ancient Greece where men engaged in sexual relations with young boys and was considered a “normal” part of the culture at the time.[522]

Harvey Milk

Harvey Milk is another gay icon celebrated for being the first openly gay man to be elected to public office, serving as a member of the Board of Supervisors in San Francisco, which is sort of like a City Council. And like virtually all of the gay men held up as heroes in the LGBTQ community for their "trailblazing" work to normalize homosexuality, Harvey Milk himself was a pederast who had a sexual relationship with a 16-year-old boy when he was a 34-year-old man.[523]

In 2008 a biographical film titled Milk was released starring Sean Penn which was praised by critics, and was given the Academy Award for the Best Film—and Sean Penn was given the Oscar for Best Actor.[524] Since he served (closeted) in the U.S. Navy, they later decided to celebrate him by naming a ship after him in 2021, and now sailers are forced to be stationed on the USNS [United States Naval Ship] Harvey Milk, a gigantic replenishment oiler. A Navy ship named after a pederast.[525]

And now that numerous states across the country are mandating that students be indoctrinated with "LGBTQ history" in schools, Harvey Milk is included in social studies text books—portrayed as a hero and civil rights pioneer.[526] After a school in southern California rejected a state-mandated text book because it included a section singing praises of Milk, Governor Gavin Newsom fined the school board $1.5 million dollars for violating the state's mandatory curriculum.[527]

Dr. John Money's Twisted Legacy

Since we can't go a single day without hearing about "gender identity" and the ridiculous ideas about how there are an unlimited number of "genders," it's important people understand the history of the concept and the man behind it. His name is Dr. John Money, a psychologist and "sexologist," and he's the man who is widely credited with coining the terms "gender identity" and "sexual orientation" in the 1960s which planted the seeds for the insanity that would later sweep across the country.[528]

John Money's concept of gender separated it from one's sex. If you look up the word gender in older dictionaries, the definition says something like "either the male or female division of a species," but now many dictionaries have Orwellianly changed the definition to say it has do with one's "identity" and an "individual's personal awareness," and how they "feel."

Like most (if not all) of the early LGBTQ "rights" activists, John Money also endorsed pedophilia, saying, "If I were to see the case of a boy aged ten or eleven who's intensely erotically attracted toward a man in his twenties or thirties, if the relationship is totally mutual, and the bonding is genuinely totally mutual…then I would not call it pathological in any way."[529]

He argued that pedophilia was "harmless in most instances."[530] But he is perhaps best known for recommending that a small boy (David Reimer) whose penis was accidentally cut off during a botched circumcision operation in the 1960s be raised as a girl in order to "remedy" the unfortunate situation.[531]

Dr. Money believed that gender was just a social construct and that there were no differences between boys and girls other than their genitals, so he thought that if the boy was raised as a girl that "she" would act like other girls and could be a girl.[532] But as David Reimer (Brenda) grew up, the brainwashing wasn't working and he rejected being raised as a girl, despite having been subjected to sexual reassignment surgery at 22 months of age which removed his testicles and fashioned a synthetic vulva (vaginoplasty).

Despite his experiment completely failing (with David Reimer not only rejecting being told he was a girl, but also committing suicide as an adult years after he resumed living as a man) and Dr. Money's hypotheses that a boy could be socialized into being a girl proving to be false, his warped ideas about "gender identity" became solidified in the LGBTQ doctrine, not to mention codified into law.

And this goes far beyond someone suffering from gender dysphoria feeling like they were born in the wrong body and wanting to change their "gender" from male to female or vice versa on their own. That was just phase one. Now they demand no gender be accepted as a "gender"—or the "gender non-binary" people as they're called. And these oddities aren't just found in fringe communities online. News outlets like The New York Times and NBC News are promoting this ideology.[533] And gender non-binary characters who use they/them pronouns are being included in children's cartoons in attempts to normalize it.[534]

Singer Sam Smith, the grammy award-winner of the chart-topping single "Stay With Me" decided to "come out" as gender non-binary in 2019, making him the most famous celebrity to do so at the time. Then two years later singer Demi Lovato did the same thing as she descended into madness.[535] But it doesn't stop there—it never stops. In 2017 numerous states began issuing drivers licenses to "gender non-binary" people using a letter X instead of M or F to signify "other."[536] By 2023 nearly half of all states allowed such practice.[537]

Then people started suing to have "no gender" as an option included on birth certificates instead of just a boy or girl.[538] Thirteen different states now allow "non-binary" birth certificates to be issued.[539] In 2021 the American Medical Association recommended that a baby's sex no longer be included on birth certificates![540] As of 2023, seventeen different states allow people to amend their birth certificates to list "X" as their gender.[541]

Of course there isn't a requirement for a medical diagnosis like an MRI brain scan because there is no such thing as "no gender." All that's needed for these changes is for someone to just say they are gender "neutral" or "non-binary" or whatever the hell new term they've come up with to describe their insanity.

Women identifying as transgender “men” who have given birth to children are even suing the government trying to have themselves legally declared the children’s father.[542] And it’s not just a few isolated instances—this is an increasing legal battle that transgender “birthing persons” are waging.[543]

In 2017 the Dove soap company released a commercial featuring what they called “real moms” with their babies and included a transgender “woman” who fathered a child, but he not only identifies as a “woman” he also identifies as the child’s mom![544] No sane society would allow someone so delusional to have custody of a child, but these sorts of things aren’t just allowed to happen—it’s being celebrated by a major household brand!

DeTransitioners

While transgenderism is being hailed as the next "exciting" phase of human "evolution," what's rarely talked about are the detransitioners, or the people who at one point in their lives decided to try portraying themselves as the opposite gender, often taking hormones and even having surgery, who then later regret their decision and decide to revert back to their original gender.

The phenomena first came to widespread attention in May 2021 when CBS's 60 Minutes featured interviews with a group of them, causing LGBTQ activists and their allies to completely freak out. The LGBTQ lobbying organization GLAAD slammed the 60 Minutes report saying it was "a shameful segment fear mongering about trans youth,"[545] and were especially upset because it included some of the detransitioners explaining that they were convinced to change their gender after watching popular transgender YouTubers and joining online trans communities on Tumblr where members encourage people to change their gender if they're the slightest bit uncomfortable with their body or confused about their identity.

The Human Rights Campaign, another queer advocacy group, said it "further marginalized and victimized" transgender people.[546] They were concerned all right. Concerned that people were finally beginning to hear about the dark side of trying to change one's "gender" and how there are people who deeply regret it and are warning others not to try it. Many Leftist lunatics who live their lives online reacted as if this was the start of a transgender holocaust.

Media outlets that will even mention detransitioners cite figures that are very low, trying to downplay the number of people who regret their "transition." The supposedly small percentage of detransitioners is most likely because they don't get the celebration and adoration of those who "come out as trans." Many who detransition are embarrassed about what they had done and so they quietly revert back to their original identity and try to get on with their lives.

Rapid-Onset Gender Dysphoria

Some believe that the cause of so many young people thinking they're transgender is due to rapid-onset gender dysphoria, or a social contagion fueled by social media (and now mainstream media), and peer pressure.[547] One transgender psychologist named "Erica" Anderson (who was born a man) and who has helped hundreds of teens transition, now expresses that "she" is worried the trend has "gone too far," saying, "What happens when the perfect storm—of social isolation, exponentially increased consumption of social media, the popularity of alternative identities—affects the actual development of individual kids? We're sailing in uncharted seas."[548]

One explanation for rapid-onset gender dysphoria is that it's a maladjusted way children (especially girls) deal with being uncomfortable with their body during puberty and the pressures of being sexy, so they're repulsed by their own gender—feeling they can't compare to the cultural standards of beauty.

Often there are underlying mental health conditions which exacerbate their body image discomfort. Many are just lesbians, so they're confused about being sexually attracted to other girls and think maybe they're a boy in the wrong body because of the explosion of transgender propaganda in recent years.

Similarly many teen boys who think they're transgender are just gay (which you're not supposed to say is also abnormal and something the medical community should research in order to prevent or cure, just like transgenderism).

A young woman named Chloe Cole, who at age 15 got a double mastectomy removing her breasts in order to "transition" to a boy, later changed her mind in less than a year and a half after realizing she made a mistake and is one of the more visible detransitioners.[549] Aside from giving numerous interviews detailing her story to warn others, she filed a lawsuit against Kaiser Permanente hospital in 2022 for breaching the standard of care for doing the double mastectomy on her when she was just a child.[550]

Transgender advocates argue that Conservatives being outraged over hospitals performing “sex change” surgeries or “gender affirming care” as it’s called, on minors isn’t happening, while at the same time denouncing those who are against it.[551]

Helena Kerschner is another young woman who speaks out about the danger of rapid-onset gender dysphoria after once identifying as a transgender man.[552] “I don’t think I would have ever even considered seeing myself as a boy without the social aspects, especially if I hadn’t joined these online communities specifically because there wasn’t anything at the time, really in my school or in my community, that was influencing me. It was all online,” she now says.[553]

A retired Navy SEAL named Chris Beck famously became a transgender “woman” in 2013, and then years later announced that he had detransitioned back to a man and now says that he destroyed his life by thinking he was transgender and is warning people about not transitioning their children if they’re confused about who they are.[554]

Numerous studies have shown that the vast majority of children who suffer from gender dysphoria end up growing out of it once they go through puberty.[555] And most probably wouldn’t have even questioned their gender at all if the idea hadn’t been planted in their minds in the first place.

Other Possible Causes

Sigmund Freud believed homosexuality is caused by a disruption in a child's psycho-social development.[556] Other psychologists agree.[557] An article in Scientific America titled "Oedipus Complex 2.0: Like it or not, parents shape their children's sexual preferences" states, "This basic developmental system, one in which certain salient childhood events 'imprint' our psychosexuality, may not be terribly uncommon. In fact, that early childhood experiences mold our adult sexual preferences—specifically, what turns us on and off, however subtle or even unconscious these particular biases may be—could even be run-of-the-mill."[558]

Some studies have shown that people who were molested as children are inclined to later become child molesters themselves when they're adults.[559] So are people born pedophiles, or do they become pedophiles because of some horrific experience they themselves fell victim to as a child that altered their brain and perverting their desires?

It's severely politically incorrect to even remotely compare pedophiles to homosexuals, but isn't it obvious that they both suffer from a similar sexual attraction dysfunction? Scientists have even identified a high correlation between people who were molested as children and those who identify as gay when they're adults.[560]

It's not just politically incorrect to say—and if you do say it, you could easily and quickly end your career, get kicked out of school, and/or banned from social media—but gay people (and transgenders) are not normal. That doesn't mean you should hate them. But it doesn't mean we should ignore the scientific and obvious reality. But you're not allowed to say that they have a birth defect if they're actually "born that way" as many claim.

And you're certainly not allowed to say they have a mental disorder. Instead, the Establishment is trying to frame the issue as if there's no more of a difference between someone's sexual orientation and gender identity than there is between someone who prefers to date blondes over brunettes, or someone who is left-handed vs right-handed.

Of course there’s a world of difference between what hand somebody writes with or throws a baseball with and people using body parts in ways they clearly weren’t designed for (or cutting them off because they feel like they were born in the wrong body).

You’re not allowed to have this conversation though, or even suggest that there is anything wrong with these people in any way, whether from a birth defect in a region of the brain that regulates sexual orientation and gender identity, or whether they developed some kind of mental disorder or maladjustment strategy to cope with the underlying issues.[561] But inquisitive people can’t help but suspect that whatever is causing transgenderism and homosexuality is being covered up, and any investigation into it is violently discouraged.

Endocrine Disruptors

Aside from rapid-onset gender dysphoria, others point to hormonal imbalances that may be caused from synthetic estrogen or what are called endocrine disruptors that are believed to ultimately result in birth defects in the brain as a fetus develops (known as the hormone theory of sexual orientation).[562]

But for well over a decade there have been concerns that these chemicals have been feminizing boys when exposed to them as they're developing in the womb. In 2005 the University of Rochester Medical Center in New York found that "Gender-bending chemicals mimicking the female hormone oestrogen can disrupt the development of baby boys" in the first human study about this after the effects had previously been widely known to occur in tests on animals.[563]

A few years later in 2009 they released a follow-up study further confirming that "Chemicals in plastics alter the brains of baby boys, making them more feminine."[564]

The findings were reported in some mainstream outlets, including The Los Angeles Times, which noted, "Boys born to mothers who have above-normal levels of the controversial chemicals known as phthalates in their urine are less likely to exhibit masculine behavior, a new study has found. Phthalates, which block the activity of male hormones such as androgens, could be altering masculine brain development."[565]

And while such findings should have caused as big of concern as the discovery of cancerous chemicals or the dangers of gun violence, these studies went mostly unnoticed.

Scientists have also found that the lower the levels of testosterone a fetus is exposed to during gestation (growth), the more feminized the child will be if it's a boy, and the more likely they are to be gay.[566] And they found that by altering the levels of testosterone in pregnant animals they can change the sexual orientation of their offspring, thus making them gay.[567]

They even know the specific region of the brain that is affected—the third interstitial nucleus of the anterior hypothalamus, or the INAH-3, which is the part of the brain that is responsible for sexual behavior (the sexually dimorphic nucleus).[568]

Research by Ray Blanchard (who himself is gay) found that when a child is forming in utero, if there are high levels of antibodies against the NLGN4Y protein (which is involved in brain development in males), then the brain is also more feminized.[569] This research indicates that the more boys a woman gives birth to, the more likely they are to be gay because there is a higher level of the protein each pregnancy.[570]

Dr. Deborah Soh, author of The End of Gender, suggests that further researching the cause of homosexuality and transgenderism with the goal of preventing it may be "unethical" because she knows if scientists confirm it's a birth defect that could be prevented by pregnant women avoiding hormone-altering endocrine disruptors or offsetting them through medication, that would undermine LGBTQism, therefore the people who have been celebrating and promoting it will be viewed in hindsight like other medical quackery throughout history.

Before plastic food packaging was the norm, it was mostly cardboard, metal, and glass. So is it just a coincidence that as plastic food packaging containing BPA became the standard that society has seen an explosion in gay people and transgenders? Also in recent years researchers have been reporting that sperm counts have dropped 50% over the last several generations and testosterone levels in men have also been dramatically declining.[571]

Women's workout clothes have also recently been found contain as much as 40 times the levels of BPA that has been deemed safe—since sports bras, leggings, and athletic shirts are made of synthetic fibers (plastic) so they don't absorb sweat like cotton clothes do and instead helps wick it away.[572] The BPA in the clothes is absorbed through the skin because of the close contact, and the Center for Environmental Health sent legal notices to eight brands of popular women's clothes putting them on notice about the concerning levels of the chemical found in their clothes.[573]

Some suspect soy consumption is causing the drop in testosterone since it contains phytoestrogens or plant-based estrogen, effecting hormones levels—feminizing males.[574] Is consuming too much soy contributing to the gender-bending and sexual disorientation epidemic? Is it causing hormone imbalances in pregnant women who consume it, thus altering the brains of their baby boys?

Robert F. Kennedy Jr. made a very interesting statement during an interview on Dr. Jordan Peterson's podcast when Peterson stated he believes the apocalyptic hysteria about climate change has demoralized young people and is causing high levels of depression and loneliness. Kennedy responded that he thought that was a simplistic reason, and went on to say, "In fact, I think a lot of the problems we see in kids and particularly boys, it's probably underappreciated how much of that is coming from chemical exposures, including a lot of the sexual dysphoria that we're seeing."[575]

He continued, "You know these kids are being overwhelmed by a tsunami, I mean they're swimming through a soup of toxic chemicals today. And many of those are endocrine disruptors. There's atrazine throughout our water supply. Atrazine by the way, if you, in a lab put atrazine in a tank full of frogs it will chemically castrate and forcibly feminize every frog in there. And ten percent of the frogs, the male frogs, will turn into fully viable females able to produce viable eggs, and if it's doing that to frogs there's a lot of other evidence that it's doing it to human beings as well."[576]

Atrazine is a common herbicide used to kill weeds in farmers' fields, golf courses, and residential lawns. And has been found in the water supply in hundreds of districts across America, which millions of people have been drinking.[577] Aside from killing weeds which it's designed to do, it has been shown to convert testosterone into estrogen.[578]

One of Alex Jones famous rants is about "chemicals in the water that turn the fricking frogs gay," referring to Atrazine, and if you can look past his histrionics, he was making a good point. He had seen the studies and was frustrated and upset that the issue wasn't getting the attention it should and that more people weren't concerned about it.

People also made fun of him for ranting about the BPA in juice boxes feminizing boys because many couldn't look past his over the top style and didn't understand just how sophisticated his concerns were behind his theatrics hoping to get people's attention.[579]

A growing number of scientists now suspect that birth control pills may actually be causing some women to become sexually attracted to other women! The pill has long been known to come with a range of side effects from weight gain to mood swings, but now scientists are investigating anecdotal evidence that the hormone changes they cause may result in altering some women's sexual attraction.[580]

It can take eight months to a year before a woman's hormone levels return to normal after she stops taking the birth control shot.[581] In fact, it's fairly common for women who stop taking birth control to experience side effects for months, ranging from no menstrual periods, to acne and hair loss, in what's called post-birth control syndrome.[582] Is birth control medication (which is designed to alter women's hormone levels) also having effects on fetus development even after they stop taking it?

There are other factors most people are unaware of as well that are missing from virtually every discussion and debate about homosexuality and transgenderism. TMZ, the celebrity news site, published a story back in 2015 when Bruce Jenner first announced that he was transitioning into a "woman" and taking female hormones which contradicted everything the LGBT advocates had said for years about "gay conversion therapy."

TMZ reported, "Several prominent doctors in the field tell us, the hormones often change sexual preference," and referenced a study of 300 transgender people showing one third of them changed their sexual preference because of the opposite sex hormones they took.[583] They noted that the female hormones Bruce Jenner was taking would feminize not just his body, but also his brain, causing him to "think like a woman," and there was a 1/3 chance he would be sexually attracted to men as a result.

The National Center for Biotechnology Information has also reported that many transgender patients' sexual orientation (meaning the sex they're attracted to) changes due to undergoing hormone therapy as they're attempting to change their gender.[584] So if over 30% of people who take hormones of the opposite sex in hopes of altering their body to become more like that sex, ultimately end up also changing their sexual orientation (who they're attracted to because their brain also changes), then why isn't hormone replacement therapy being explored to help children (and adults) who suffer from gender dysphoria?

If a boy thinks he's a girl, or feels like a girl, then why not give him testosterone to masculinize his brain instead of giving him cross hormones (estrogen) and then subjecting him to all kinds of horrifying surgeries trying to make him look like a woman? Is it possible that the transgender movement is looking at this entire problem from the wrong angle?

And why isn’t HRT (hormone replacement therapy) being used on homosexuals to fix their sexual attraction disorder by giving them hormone boosters that correspond with their own biological sex, since that appears to be a way to reverse their same sex attraction?

Perhaps with medical advances in the future and brave scientists who aren’t afraid of the social consequences of their findings we may have definitive answers to these questions and solutions to these problems.

But it’s also possible that because of the ramifications of uncomfortable truths, these answers may be forever suppressed and hidden, and the scientists who pursue them smeared by disinformation campaigns as the human species continues to suffer from mass psychosis, endocrine disrupting chemical-induced birth defects, and genital-mutilating surgeries marketed as the only solution.

Immigration

If people sneak into a theater through the exits hoping to watch a movie without buying a ticket, they're kicked out immediately once they are discovered—or even arrested. If some stranger walks into your house without permission even if the door is unlocked and they start relaxing on your couch, that's trespassing—and a crime. And so is entering a country without permission, even if you find an unguarded path or sneak in by hiding in the back of a truck. But this crime is being allowed and encouraged by Democrats for various reasons, one of which you're not supposed to say out loud, but everybody knows.

Illegal immigration though our southern border has been a problem for many decades, and while some of the invaders would get deported once apprehended, once Joe Biden took over as president the word got out that the U.S. was welcoming anyone in who could make it to our southern border from anywhere in the world.

Many of the people in the massive caravans who made the long trek north from South and Central America were literally wearing Joe Biden t-shirts! When one man on the journey was asked by ABC News "Would you have tried to do this when Donald Trump was president?" He answered "Definitely not." The reporter then asked him, "Did you come here because Joe Biden was elected president?" To which he responded "Basically."[585]

Another one interviewed by CNN said he hoped for "Patience and prayers that we can get to the U.S. because they have a new president, of course Biden. He's going to help all of us, he's giving us 100 days to get to the U.S. and give us legal paper, so we can get a better life for our kids and family."[586]

Every single day (year after year) hundreds, and often two or even three thousand people enter the United States illegally through the southern border, and the conservative estimates are that over 11 million illegal aliens currently live in the U.S. but more realistic figures are double that.[587] In the month of February 2019 alone, over 66,000 were counted by U.S. Border Patrol, the highest number in over a decade, and that doesn't include all the ones who got in without being noticed.[588] It's common for the Border Patrol to spot 1000 a day, every day, month after month flooding in.[589] And again, those figures are just the ones we know about.

The Department of Homeland Security counted 234,088 illegal aliens that were "encountered" at the border just in the month of April 2021, which was the highest total ever in one month.[590] At least two million invaded the United States in the first year Joe Biden was president.[591] That's well over 100,000 every single month.[592] More than two million more came the next year.[593] Vice President Kamala Harris was surprisingly asked about this staggering number during an interview with Chuck Todd on NBC's Meet the Press and she responded with a nonsensical word salad saying, "We have a secure border in that—that is a priority for any nation, including ours and our administration."[594]

This was all part of the plan. During his campaign in 2020, Joe Biden said that as president he would call for all the migrants the Trump administration was able to block from coming in to "surge to the border."[595] Meanwhile Jonathan Greenblatt, the head of the ADL, says that the people who talk about "open borders" or "caravans" of migrants are using "White supremacist phrases."[596]

Most of them falsely claim they're seeking "asylum" or that they needed safe harbor from a hostile government they had fled—a well-known scheme used by illegal aliens to gain access to our country. Once inside they're allowed to stay under those false pretenses, and are given a court date to begin hearing their claims which is often ten years in the future![597] In the meantime they apply for green cards, and unless they're arrested for a violent crime they'll be deemed a "lawful permanent resident" after a year, and never be deported.

Anchor Babies

The other dirty secret of the illegal immigrant invasion, aside from the astonishing number of them continuously flowing into our country, are the millions of them who have anchor babies once they're here. An anchor baby is the child of an illegal alien mother who comes here pregnant (or gets pregnant after she arrives) and then once she gives birth, the child is automatically granted citizenship, thus all but ensuring the mother will never be deported.

In 2022 there were 300,000 anchor babies born to illegal alien mothers across the U.S.[598] Analysis conducted by the Center for Immigration Studies shows that 400,000 is about the average each and every year, dating back to at least 2018. The Congressional Budget Office published a report in 2017 estimating that at least 4.5 million anchor babies are currently living in the United States.[599]

Of course anchor baby is considered to be a racist slur, just like illegal alien, because the Left tries to deter people from pointing out what's happening. The term refers to the child anchoring the mother to our country. And as you would expect, U.S. taxpayers end up paying the hospital bills for the children to be born because the mothers don't have any insurance (or money), and then we also pay the expenses for the mother to raise the children through the various social welfare programs funded by our tax dollars since they can't afford to raise them on their own.

But it's not just illegal immigrants who are living off our tax dollars. Over 50% of legal immigrant households receive some form of government welfare—from food stamps, to housing assistance, school lunch programs, and Medicaid.[600] A report by the Center for Immigration Studies shows that 63% of non-citizens living in the U.S. use at least one form of welfare.[601]

Some Republicans have finally begun calling for an end to "birth right citizenship" which automatically grants a baby citizenship if it's born on U.S. soil, even if the mother is here illegally. The sane thing to do would be only grant citizenship to the child if the mother is here legally, but we live in an insane and dysfunctional society.

And of course Democrats want to legalize the 20+ million illegal aliens living here so they can be the party's new voter base. Democrats have turned their back on the working class and now pander to the welfare class who just want free stuff.

The Biden Justice Department was even planning on paying illegal aliens $450,000 each as a "settlement" for the Trump administration separating families once they were detained after crossing into the U.S. illegally![602] Only after news of the planned "settlements" made headlines did they abandon the idea.

More Preferential Treatment

Sixteen different states allow illegal aliens to get drivers licenses![603] Bank of America even allows them to get credit cards![604] In California they're given government health care through the state's Medicaid program.[605] During the 2020 election cycle all ten Democrat candidates running for president raised their hands when asked by a debate moderator if they would offer healthcare to all "undocumented" immigrants.[606]

Calling what's happening an "invasion" is considered "hate speech," because obviously it is an invasion and the puppet masters are desperately trying to discourage the American people from doing anything to stop it. The Department of Homeland Security under the Biden administration has even been caught secretly flying the aliens across the country in the middle of the night to disperse them throughout other regions so they're not just concentrated in border states in the South. It's for "diversity."

Many of them have no desire to become Americans. They just want to take advantage of what America can offer them. They don't care about our culture, customs, holidays, or laws. They just want to create little Tijuanas within the American cities they inhabit.

Various Latino groups like La Raza (meaning the race, which was recently renamed to UnidosUS to sound less Latino supremacist) and MEChA (the Chicano Student Movement of Aztlan) support what's called the Reconquista movement (Spanish for reconquest) and openly brag about how they're plotting to take back (reconquer) territory in the American Southwest (including California, Arizona, New Mexico, and Texas) in order to make their own country called Aztlan which refers to a mythical homeland of the Aztecs.[607]

Illegal Alien Crimes

The illegal aliens aren't just using up resources they're not paying for, taking jobs away from Americans, having anchor babies that are automatically granted citizenship, and irreversibly changing our culture by making little Tijuana's within American cities, but a lot of them also commit crimes. And not just theft or fraud (by using stolen social security numbers to get jobs), but violent crime—and a lot of it.

Every year in America there are often hundreds of murders committed by illegal aliens who obviously shouldn't even be here to begin with.[608] These crimes may make the local news for 15 seconds but then it's on to the weather, so their real impact is never realized. CNN and MSNBC will do entire segments about a White person using a racial slur during an argument in a store or restaurant somewhere, but the illegal alien murders never get a mention there.

Nor on the national broadcast networks like ABC, NBC, or CBS. The New York Times and The Washington Post never report on them either and certainly wouldn't dedicate a headline to the ongoing problem, but if a White woman gets into an argument with a Black person over something and video of the incident is posted online, then the "Karen" is doxxed with a barrage of headlines and her name trends on Twitter from thousands of people denouncing her for being "racist."[609]

Aside from murder, many illegal aliens commit other crimes that should never occur because they shouldn't even be here in the first place. Burglaries, rapes, thefts, and drunk driving offenses all go virtually unnoticed by the media and Democrat lawmakers. Democrats even defend MS-13 gang members who law enforcement agencies consider to be the most violent and sadistic street gang in the world. They're the ones best known for torturing and dismembering their enemies.[610] Illegal aliens in general are estimated to commit twice as many crimes as American citizens.[611] But mentioning that is considered "xenophobic" and "racist."

Often when illegal aliens are arrested for non-violent crimes like DUI or theft, they’re let out of jail pending their trial because Democrat run cities (the sanctuary cities, as they’re called) forbid local authorities from turning them over to ICE [Immigration and Custom Enforcement], so they’re just set free back out onto the streets![612]

The Wall

Democrats used to at least pretend to be against illegal immigration, but all that changed when Donald Trump became president. They've long been planning on their new voter base being the 20 million illegal aliens living in the United States once they're given a "pathway to citizenship"—which means full citizenship within a few years of being granted amnesty.

Democrats blocked $5.7 billion in funding that President Trump wanted to complete the border wall, but gave Ukraine over $200 billion to defend their border.[613] Alexandria Ocasio-Cortez compares our southern border wall to the Berlin Wall and Senator Elizabeth Warren calls it "a monument to hate and division."[614] When he was running for president in 2020, Beto O'Rourke said he wanted to tear the wall down![615] During Joe Biden's campaign that same year he promised if he wins "There will not be another foot of wall constructed in my administration."[616]

Before the Democrats embraced open borders, when Barack Obama was a U.S. Senator from Illinois back in 2005 he said, "We all agree on the need to better secure the border and to punish employers who hire illegal immigrants. Those who enter the country illegally and those who employ them disrespect the rule of law and they are showing disregard for those who are following the law. We simply cannot allow people to pour into the United States undetected, undocumented, unchecked, and circumventing the line of people who are waiting patiently, diligently, and lawfully to become immigrants in this country."[617]

When Hillary Clinton was a senator in New York she admitted, "The Mexican government's policies are pushing migration north…There isn't any sensible approach except to do what we need to do simultaneously. Secure our border—with technology, personnel, physical barriers if necessary in some places. And we need to have tough employer sanctions… if they've committed transgressions of whatever kind, they should be obviously deported."[618]

Years later when campaigning for the 2016 presidential election she said, "I voted numerous times when I was a senator to spend money to build a—uh, a barrier, to try to prevent illegal immigrants from coming in and I do think you have to control your borders."[619] The wall had become a dirty word since it was a major part of Donald Trump's platform, so she called it a barrier instead, but early in the 2016 race Democrats weren't yet ready to pivot to their current no border policy.

In 2009 Senator Chuck Schumer, one of the most powerful senators in Washington, said, "Illegal immigration is wrong, plain and simple… People who enter the United States without our permission are illegal aliens and illegal aliens should not be treated the same as people who entered the U.S. legally. When we use phrases like 'undocumented workers' we convey a message to the American people that their government is not serious about combating illegal immigration, which the American people overwhelmingly oppose."[620]

All that has changed though. Democrats now deem the term illegal alien to be on par with the n-word, and they're doing everything they can do to cater to the illegal aliens, even allowing them to vote in some local elections![621] But they're not just looking to gain the support of the 20 million of them if or when they're granted amnesty and allowed to vote in national elections. There's something else at play here as well.

Demographic Changes

Non-Whites and the Democrats who use them to maintain their power have long anticipated White people becoming a minority in the United States (on pace to occur around 2045), but if anyone points out this trend while expressing any opposition to this impending future, then they're instantly and viciously denounced as a "White supremacist" who's promoting the "dangerous great replacement conspiracy theory."[622]

These sweeping demographic changes in the racial makeup of the United States are mostly due to the massive number of illegal aliens that have been flooding in across the southern border for decades and given safe harbor in America despite them just standing on our soil being a violation of our laws. But mass immigration is only part of it. Compounding the problem is the declining White birthrate. As far back as 2011 there were more Hispanic, Black, and Asian babies being born in America than White ones.[623]

And despite countless Democrats expressing their joy about the rapid decline of the White population in the United States, The New York Times says "'The Great Replacement' is a racist and misogynistic conspiracy that holds that white people face existential decline, even extinction, because of rising immigration in the West and falling birthrates among white women," adding sarcastically "caused, of course, by feminism."[624]

Non-Whites celebrate it as the "browning of America" while some White people uncomfortable about their looming minority status figuratively call it "White genocide" to evoke stronger emotions, but that term too is considered a dog whistle for "White supremacy." Personally, I think using "White genocide" to describe White demographic displacement is too hyperbolic and causes others to respond with an eye roll. A genocide is the mass slaughter of a group of people, and that's not what's happening.

Although the Leftist online magazine Counter Punch says, “White genocide would not only be good, it is necessary and even unavoidable; that is, if we are interested in the survival of the planet, humanity, and all life forms—though to be clear the phrase ‘white genocide’ is a bit of a misnomer.”[625] It goes on to explain that they want White people divested from any thoughts about their own racial identity so White people don’t organize as an ethnic group to defend their own interests and culture like all other races do—something I’ll cover in detail in the next chapter on Antiwhiteism.

The Southern Poverty Law Center’s president Mark Potok actually has a list hanging on the wall of his home office showing the declining percentage of White people in America starting in the 1920s through today. The chart was captured on camera for a brief moment when he was being interviewed for a documentary called Alt-Right: Age of Rage (2018). Obviously he made it as a visual reminder that the browning of America is going according to plan.

Some opponents of the rapidly declining White population often point to Jewish groups as being active in facilitating mass immigration to the United States and European countries for decades in order to make them more racially and ethnically diverse so that Jews aren’t singled out as a sole minority or the “outsiders” within a society as they were in Nazi Germany and other parts of Europe.[626] This is why the torch-bearing marchers at the infamous Charlottesville Unite The Right event in 2017 were chanting “Jews will not replace us.”

But it’s not just supposed “White Nationalists” who have been talking about the White majority in the United States being demographically replaced through sustained immigration from other regions of the world—the Democrats have been openly bragging about this happening for years.

As Vice President under Barack Obama, Joe Biden had boasted about an “an unrelenting stream of immigration” that would soon make White people a minority in the United States.[627] “I’m proud of the American record on culture and economic integration of not only our Muslim communities but African communities, Asian communities, Hispanic communities, and the wave still continues. It’s not going to stop. Nor should we want it to stop. As a matter of fact, it’s one of the things I think we can be most proud of.”[628]

He continued, "Folks like me who are Caucasian of European descent—for the first time in 2017 we'll be an absolute minority in the United States of America. An absolutely minority. Fewer than 50 percent of the people in America, from then and on, will be White European stock. That's not a bad thing. That's a source of our strength."[629]

When CNN's Anderson Cooper was speaking with Jorge Ramos, a popular host on the Spanish language station Univision about the changing demographics of the United States, Cooper gloated, "The idea that, you know, Whites will not be the majority, I mean, that's—it's an exciting transformation of the country, it's an exciting evolution and you know, progress of our country in many different ways."[630]

For decades Democrats had been openly bragging how "demographic trends" are going to one day keep the Republicans from holding power. After Donald Trump became president many Democrats were concerned that his immigration plan may keep White people the country's ethnic majority for longer than they had hoped. The Washington Post lamented that instead of it happening in 2044, it might be pushed back to 2049.[631] MSNBC's Chris Hayes ranted, "That's what Donald Trump's plan would do—keep the nation as White as possible for as long as possible."[632]

After Trump was out of office however, the globalists made up for lost time and the massive floods of illegals increased to record levels and the celebrations of the rapidly declining White majority in the United States resumed.

In April 2021 Tucker Carlson started openly discussing these issues which had been completely taboo in the Republican Party, saying one night on his Fox News show, "I know that the left and all the little gatekeepers on Twitter become literally hysterical if you use the term 'replacement;' if you suggest that the Democratic Party is trying to replace the current electorate, the voters now casting ballots, with new people, more obedient voters from the Third World. But they become hysterical because that's what's happening actually. Let's just say it—that's true."[633]

After that monologue he trended on Twitter from so many people attacking him, and the next day the ADL demanded that Fox News fire him.[634] Instead of backing down and apologizing, Tucker doubled down and in the following months would bring it up again and again. "Nothing about it is an accident, obviously. It's intentional. Joe Biden did it on purpose. But why? Why would a president do this to his own country?" he asked.[635]

"Our system cannot handle this many destitute newcomers, period. Imagine what hospitals are going to look like a year from now. How about schools? What Joe Biden is doing now will change this country forever. So again, why is he doing it? There's only one plausible answer."[636]

Tucker then played the clip of Joe Biden which I just quoted earlier of him looking forward to Whites becoming an "absolute minority," and continued, "Biden just said it: to change the racial mix of the country. That's the reason, to reduce the political power of people whose ancestors lived here and dramatically increase the proportion of Americans newly arrived from the Third World."[637]

Tucker went on, "It's horrifying. But there's a reason Biden said it. In political terms, this policy is called the great replacement, the replacement of legacy Americans with more obedient people from far away countries. They brag about it all the time, but if you dare to say it's happening, they will scream at you with maximum hysteria. And here you have Joe Biden confirming his motive on tape with a smile on his face. No one who talks like this should ever be the president of the United States."[638]

The Left keeps calling it a conspiracy theory when it's a historic reality numerous cultures around the world have faced. White Europeans displaced the Indians (or Native Americans, "Indigenous" people, or whatever they're calling themselves these days) here in North America.

Jews displaced Palestinians in 1948 with the creation of Israel after the United Nations adopted the Zionist resolution causing over 700,000 Palestinians to be forced out of the land, an event that's called the Palestinian expulsion.[639] (It's considered extremely "antisemitic" to point out this fact, by the way, so be careful when talking about it.)

Tucker responded to the ADL's calls for him to be fired for talking about this issue by pointing out the organization's own statement regarding their concerns about Jews being demographically diminished in Israel. The ADL's official stance on Zionism is that, "It is unrealistic and unacceptable to expect the State of Israel to voluntarily subvert its own sovereign existence and nationalist identity and become a vulnerable minority within what was once its own territory."[640] After Tucker highlighted their hypocrisy, they deleted that page from their website, but not before it was archived on the Wayback Machine.[641]

On Megyn Kelly's podcast, Tucker was even more candid than on his Fox News show. When she mentioned that the ADL was calling for him to be fired, he responded "Well, fuck them."[642] Tucker let the cat out of the bag, and the Left were furious that not only did he point out their plan, but by him finally talking about what had only been whispered in Republican circles out of fear of being called "White nationalists" or "Nazis," now others would feel safer pointing out the obvious too.

The very next day after one of Tucker's monologues on the issue, Charlie Kirk felt it was finally okay to say such an obvious fact out loud. When talking about the need for stricter border enforcement he added, "The other side has openly admitted this is about bringing in voters that they want and they like, and honestly—diminishing and decreasing White demographics in America. We're gonna say that part out loud. So many people in the corporate media are afraid to talk about it."[643]

Yeah, people in the corporate media have been afraid to talk about it. And those in Conservative Inc., including him! For years! But Tucker shattered the taboo and now others didn't feel like they had to completely avoid even hinting at the topic. The Washington Post soon lamented that "Half of Republicans see great replacement is real."[644]

Vice News called it "a conspiracy theory that's quickly becoming gospel on the right: that Democrats want a flood of immigrants to remake America and keep them in power."[645] Every Liberal media outlet denounced Tucker for discussing it, trying to scare others away from pointing out White people's impending minority status in the U.S. is because of mass immigration.

Some, like The Los Angeles Times, recommended that Republicans talking about "replacement theory" (which is a fact) be censored from social media.[646] The ADL then started calling for Tucker Carlson to be banned from Twitter and Facebook, and demanded that all clips of his show be deleted from the Fox News YouTube channel.[647]

Demographics Is Destiny

"Demographics is Destiny" has been a mantra for the Democrat Party for many years as they anxiously await granting amnesty to the 20 million illegal aliens living in the United States. (They deceptively underestimate the number to be "only" 11 million, but it's double that.)[648]

Politico once admitted, "The immigration proposal pending in Congress would transform the nation's political landscape for a generation or more…pumping as many as 11 million new Hispanic voters into the electorate a decade from now in ways that, if current trends hold, would produce an electoral bonanza for Democrats and cripple Republican prospects in many states they now win easily."[649]

The Center for American Progress, a Democrat think tank, openly admitted, "Supporting real immigration reform that contains a pathway to citizenship for our nation's 11 million undocumented immigrants is the only way to maintain electoral strength in the future."[650] They claim to be a "non-partisan" organization, but it was founded by John Podesta and is filled with George Soros disciples and former Clinton and Obama staffers, so they couldn't help but admit what "immigration reform" means to them.

For years Democrats have talked with glee about the "population growth" in Texas and other border states, which is a codeword for the influx of millions of illegal aliens. Newsweek magazine even ran a headline titled "America's Getting Less White, And That Will Save It."[651] As paleoconservative Pat Buchanan warned over twenty years ago in his 2002 book The Death of the West, "Uncontrolled immigration threatens to deconstruct the nation we grew up in and convert America into a conglomeration of peoples with almost nothing in common—not history, heroes, language, culture, faith, or ancestors."[652]

Liberal European leaders have been obsessed with needing more racial "diversity" in their countries as well. But pro-immigration activists seem to only want White European countries flooded with immigrants from South America, Africa, and the Middle East. Interestingly, nobody is demanding that Israel accept an influx of non-Jewish refugees from other Middle Eastern countries. How about more African Muslims emigrate to Israel from places like South Sudan or Somalia?

If multiculturalism is so great, then why should they not want to participate in global diversification? There aren't any cries for Japan, China, or other Asian countries to become "more diverse" by adding millions of Africans, Hispanics, or Middle Easterners either. They, like Israel, would instantly quash any such suggestions because they know that flooding their countries with millions of immigrants from other cultures would replace their own.

Since BIPOCs (Black, Indigenous, People of Color) endlessly complain about European "colonizers" establishing communities and Democracies around the world, why then are they so determined to colonize North America with people from other countries? The answer of course is because they like what we built here, and instead of attempting to replicate our success in their own countries, they are coming here to live off the fruits of our labor.

But shouldn't the American people be able to maintain the dominant cultural traditions of those who founded our country and have been the foundation of our society for almost 250 years? The Founding Fathers weren't Chinese. They weren't Jews, Arabs, or Guatemalans. They were White Europeans. (So why should the United States continuously and incrementally change our culture and our customs to be more accommodating to immigrants from other regions of the world?)

Some cultures are simply not compatible with American culture. Their values, traditions, and morals are impossible to integrate into modern society. For example, some Arab cultures believe women shouldn't be able to drive a car, work at a job, or even go out into public without wearing a full burqa. Some Middle Eastern cultures even use bacha bazi boys, which are young boys they sexually abuse like the pederasts of Ancient Greece.[653] Should we really be allowing people like that into our country—especially when so many of them clearly don't abandon their native countries' old traditions and customs that are incompatible with ours?

Many people in Mexico and South America see drug kingpins like "El Chapo" and Pablo Escobar as folk heroes.[654] The locals loved them because they provided jobs! Latino gangs in virtually all parts of the United States (the American Southwest, the Pacific Northwest, the Midwest, the Mid-Atlantic region, the Northeast, and South Florida) work directly with Mexican drug cartels.[655] The MS-13 street gang, the most violent and brutal in the United States, only exists here as a result of immigrants (from El Salvador) coming to the U.S.[656]

The diversity-obsessed Leftists even oppose English as the official language for the United States, despite the Declaration of Independence and our Constitution obviously being written in English. So why shouldn't it be our nation's official language? Why should we let foreigners dictate the dominant language in our own country? Why should we have to be told to "Press one for English and numero dos for Español" when calling every customer service number? Why should we have to deal with people we can't even understand when they speak?

Imagine if millions of Americans moved to China and then opposed Chinese as the official language. Or demanded that tests in school be given in English. Or said they need more "diversity" to make China a "better, stronger" country by bringing in more non-Chinese people. If diversity is a source of strength in a society as Liberals always say, then why not import millions of Muslims to Israel? Or millions of Indian people or Africans to Japan? Imagine White people moving to Japan en masse and then demanding that statues of the country's founders be torn down because of how they treated other races or because the country bombed Pearl Harbor (which brought the U.S. into WWII).

Democrats' Hypocrisy Exposed

While Democrats love the flood of illegal aliens into the U.S., what they really love is them invading Republican border states like Texas, Arizona, and New Mexico, which have historically been Red states but are shifting purple and blue because of the huge numbers of Hispanics arriving.

So in April 2022 Texas Governor Greg Abbott began bussing thousands of illegal aliens into Chicago, New York City, and Washington D.C. Since he didn't have the authority to deport them, he just relocated them to Democrat strongholds which had previously declared themselves sanctuary cities to virtue signal that they're not "racist."[657]

New York City mayor Eric Adams immediately denounced the action saying the city was "nearing its breaking point" and later said the illegals "will destroy New York City."[658] Lori Lightfoot, the then-mayor of Chicago, said the city is "completely tapped out" and they have "no more space" after just a few busloads of migrants arrived from Texas.[659] The mayor of Washington D.C. (another Democrat), declared a public emergency.[660]

Then Florida Governor Ron DeSantis one-upped Governor Abbott and flew two planeloads of illegal aliens to Martha's Vineyard, a wealthy island community in Cape Cod off the coast of Massachusetts where the Obamas bought a $12 million dollar estate to retire. All hell broke loose. The residents called in the National Guard and the illegal aliens were removed from the island within 48 hours and shipped off to a military base on the mainland.[661] They "couldn't handle" the fifty migrants, local officials said, even though it was the end of summer and there were plenty of empty Airbnb rentals available for them to stay in.

The point was clear. They didn't want any illegal aliens in their community—not even a few dozen of them. Meanwhile there were 5,000 a day (every day on average) pouring across the southern border into Texas, New Mexico, Arizona, and California at the time, overwhelming countless communities in the Southwest—an ongoing problem that has been allowed to continue for years.

As Ron DeSantis said, "The minute even a small fraction of what those border towns deal with every day is brought to their front door, they go berserk, and they're so upset that this is happening. And it just shows you that their virtue-signaling is a fraud."[662]

Antiwhiteism

White people are regularly blamed for every problem in the personal lives, communities, and countries of non-White people. And despite Martin Luther King's wish that we could become a society where people are judged on the content of their character and not the color of their skin, it's common and widely accepted for Black people to express racism against White people and continue to blame White people living today for things that other White people did hundreds of years ago.

But it's not just a few disgruntled and envious Black people who have embraced such beliefs. With the mainstreaming of the Black Lives Matter movement, antiwhiteism has become disturbingly widespread and normalized, and White people are constantly said to be keeping down "minorities" because of "White privilege" and "systemic racism," despite White people actually being a minority in the world—and even in numerous states within America.[663]

Whites have been a minority in California since the year 2000, and they're also a minority in Hawaii, New Mexico, and Texas.[664] Other states including Georgia, Nevada, and Maryland are trending to be next, and projections are that Whites will be a minority in the whole of the United States around the year 2045, according to the U.S. Census bureau.[665] But you're not supposed to talk about that unless you frame it in glowing terms and an "exciting transformation of the country," as CNN's Anderson Cooper calls it.[666]

Jimmy Fallon's audience cheered when he said that the 2020 census showed for the first time in our nation's history the number of White people went down. He was setting up a joke, but the audience burst into applause at the setup, confusing Fallon, who looked bewildered. "Wait, what?" he said, going off script. “That’s an interesting reaction to that. I didn’t want cheers or boos—I just wanted a ‘interesting,’ that’s all I wanted.” He then continued with the punchline that “Fox News declared it a national emergency.”[667]

New York Times columnist Jennifer Rubin celebrated the 2020 census figures calling it “fabulous news,” adding “now we need to prevent minority White rule.”[668] Many Latinos, Blacks, Jews, Native Americans, and guilt-ridden White Liberals cheer the news of White people being on the verge of becoming a minority in the United States, and anyone who dares to say they don’t want it to happen are branded a “White nationalist” and a “Nazi.”

But demographic displacement and becoming a racial minority in a country that was founded and built by White Europeans is just one of the complicated racial issues facing White Americans.

White people are openly hated by a disturbingly large segment of the non-White American population. A viral meme illustrates the situation by showing a nice White husband and wife alongside their two kids with the caption “White People: The Only Race You Can Legally Discriminate Against.” But it’s more than that. It’s spite, envy, and hatred.

White people in America are blamed for everything from the crime problems in Black communities, to even global warming![669] There are endless stories in mainstream outlets today that complain about how there are too many White people playing golf,[670] too many White people going skiing,[671] too many White people are hiking in public parks;[672] there are too many White teachers,[673] too many White doctors,[674] and too many White airline pilots,[675] and basically just too many White people everywhere in America! So we need more “diversity” they say, which is a codeword for less White people.

The Jewish ADL, the Ant-Defamation League (an organization originally founded to protect and defend Jews from supposed “antisemitism” but later morphed into an anti-Conservative hate group) is trying to change the very definition of racism. On their website they literally defined it as, “The marginalization and/or oppression of people of color based on a socially constructed racial hierarchy that privileges white people.”[676]

This Orwellian word game is just one more reason why the term antiwhiteism needs to be part of the lexicon. When people hear the word "racism"—they've been conditioned to (wrongly) think that it's something White people do to Black people. And the ADL is perpetuating that disinformation with their false definition of the word. So when talking about anti-White racism, it's best to be specific and use the term antiwhiteism so people don't get the wrong impression and automatically think that the "racism" you're talking about is White people discriminating against Black people or other non-Whites.

A similar deceptive term is Critical Race Theory or CRT, which masks what's going on. It makes people think that anti-White racism is just a theory and it's too generic of a term, so call it what it is: antiwhiteism. Or at least always make it clear by calling it anti-White racism, instead of just "racism" to avoid the preconceptions people have been conditioned to think when they hear the word "racism."

When speaking of supposed antisemitism, the ADL's Jonathan Greenblatt told CNN, "If you demonize the Jewish people or the Jewish State, if you make these wild accusations, if you traffic in conspiracy theories, you create the conditions for violence."[677] So wouldn't that mean endlessly blaming White people for all the problems in America and coining new terms like "White Privilege" and perpetuating hoaxes about "systemic White supremacy" and other lies (like police officers across the country are always beating up and shooting Black suspects) mean that those who traffic in such nonsense are actually creating an environment that puts White people at risk for violence?

It certainly does, but the Establishment always covers up hate crimes committed by Black people and perpetuates the myth that "hate crimes" are something that only White people commit. In this chapter I'll detail just a small fraction of the systemic antiwhiteism occurring in America, which is a risky thing to do because daring to stand up for White people is the quickest way to be smeared as a "White supremacist."

Every time Black people complain about White people, no matter how unfounded and ridiculous the criticism is, it's framed as an important issue that White people need to be "confronted" about and "address," but when a White person simply mentions certain pervasive problems in the Black community (no matter how tactfully) regarding crime, fatherlessness, poor grades, or the high STD rates, those concerns are immediately dismissed and vigorously opposed as more “evidence” of “racism.”

The Antiwhiteism Grifters

Democrats' favorite tactic is calling White people "racist," and the Race Hustle is an entire industry with high-paid "experts" who get paid to just complain about White people all day, every day. People like Robin DiAngelo, who is credited with popularizing the term White Fragility which is used as a weapon against White people and was constructed to depict White people who are tired of hearing Black people complain about them as being a character flaw and more "evidence" that they're racist because they don't want to "acknowledge" or "address" their own "white privilege."

Ibram X. Kendi (which is a fake name to make him sound cool like Malcolm X) is another popular race grifter. His real name is Ibram Henry Rogers, and he works as an "anti-racist activist," meaning an anti-White activist. In his mind, White people are the cause of all racism in the world, and like all other Race Hustlers he ignores the racial conflicts between Black people and Latinos which are common in places like Los Angeles, especially between rival gangs. The only thing "Ibram X. Kendi" thinks about is how terrible White people are.

The 1619 Project founder Nikole Hannah-Jones is another one. This "project" started as a feature in The New York Times and refers to the year 1619 when she claims Black slaves started "building America" for White people.

While there are many professional Race Hustlers, perhaps the most infamous (aside from Shaun King who looks White despite being half Black and is often mocked as "Talcum X") is Black Lives Matter co-founder Patrisse Khan-Cullors, who bought four different homes with the millions of dollars her scheme brought in.[678] Black Lives Matter (the organization) also transferred millions of dollars to a "charity" run by her "wife" who then used six million dollars to buy a mansion that was the former headquarters for the Communist Party.[679]

Over $90 million dollars was given to Patrisse Khan-Cullors' Black Lives Matter organization (not to be confused with the generic “movement”—the organization is technically a legal entity in and of itself) which claims to be a “nonprofit” organization.[680] They also paid nearly a million dollars to a company run by Cullors’ baby daddy for “creative services”[681] and also paid her brother over $840,000 for “security.”[682]

Corporate Antiwhiteism

Under the guise of various fancy sounding terms like “diversity, equity, and inclusion” (DEI), “racial bias training,” or “sensitivity and inclusivity” seminars—major American corporations are forcing their employees (and especially new hires) to undergo various classes derived from Critical Race Theory to indoctrinate them about how terrible White people are and how amazing non-Whites are (and queers).

The “anti-racism” grifters have been around for a long time, but now it’s commonplace for major corporations to hire them to “teach” employees about how White people perpetuate “racism” simply by existing if they don’t constantly prioritize Black people’s thoughts and feelings.

Walmart employees have been put through “training” where they’re told that the United States is a “White-supremacy system” and if they’re White and don’t think they’re racist and part of the problem, that’s just more evidence of their “internalized racial superiority.”[683]

Companies now include entire sections on their websites explaining their plans on how they’re going to hire more people of color in the name of Diversity, Equity, and Inclusion despite favoring any particular race in the hiring process being illegal. Coca-Cola’s website says, “Our plan will focus on internal and external recruitment, hiring, development and advancement of people of color.”[684] They go on to openly admit that they’re dedicated to only promoting Blacks, Hispanics, and Asians instead of White people.

Leaked documents show that AT&T’s Diversity, Equity, and Inclusion training course labels White employees “the problem” and says that “American racism is a uniquely white trait” and Black people can’t be racist.[685] They’re also encouraged to take the “21-Day Racial Equity Habit Challenge” to reflect on their “white privilege,” and be on the lookout for “white supremacy.”[686]

Many major corporations now have an entire department dedicated to “Diversity, Equity, and Inclusion” and people have titles like “head of diversity," and it's their job to make sure that fewer White people (and heterosexuals) are hired to work there. LinkedIn, the employment and business-focused social media platform, now enables job recruiters to filter their searches for candidates according to race in order to help them find a more "diverse group of candidates."[687]

It used to be an unwritten rule that job applicants not include their race on their resumes to help avoid racial bias during the hiring process, but now it's encouraged for non-White people to list theirs so they can be picked as a diversity hire.

When the hiring manager of Dropbox, the Google-owned cloud storage service, posted about a new position open for product design in the U.S., she said applicants from the BIPOC (Black, indigenous, people of color) and URM communities (underrepresented minority), meaning queer people, were given priority over all others.[688] Of course that's a violation of federal law because a business can't pass up job applicants simply because of their race, but as usual, systemic antiwhiteism is ignored.

If a hiring manager of any business, whether a Fortune 500 company or a small family owned pizza place posted that they were prioritizing White applicants, then the Department of Labor would launch an investigation into them and sue them into bankruptcy, but no action is taken when White people or Christians are blatantly discriminated against. A producer for Fox News reached out to Dropbox for a comment when this story went viral, but they ignored the request proving that they're complicit in the discriminatory practices.[689]

YouTube got sued in 2018 because of their anti-White hiring policy.[690] A recruiter who worked for YouTube for nine years claims the company set quotas for hiring non-White people and recruiters were told not to even interview applicants who weren't Black, Hispanic, or women.[691] On Valentine's Day that same year, the official YouTube Twitter account tweeted, "Roses are red violets are blue, subscribe to Black creators."[692]

As noted previously, YouTube has also been hostile towards Thanksgiving, and hosts an annual event exclusively for Black YouTubers to give them extra help to build up their subscribers.[693]

Comedian Tyler Fischer was turned down by an agent because he's White, so he sued for discrimination and the talent agency quickly offered him a settlement—which he refused, saying he wanted the case to go to court, probably because a settlement would mean he would have to sign a non-disclosure agreement, preventing him from ever talking about what happened to him again.[694]

Responding to a headline in the *New York Pos*t that said he "claimed" the agent turned him down because he's White, Fischer said, "The entire claim is on tape and in plain English. I'm simply not allowing myself to be discriminated against for my skin color anymore. There's no such thing as 'reverse' discrimination. There's one kind and everyone is protected under the law against it."[695] He also said that "endless people" in the industry have reached out to him privately telling him the same thing has happened to them as well, but they were afraid to speak about it publicly.

It's not just corporations, but many cities are also indoctrinating their employees with antiwhiteism. Such "training" programs now mandated across the country for elected officials and their staff.[696] Many police and fire departments are requiring such programs as well.[697] These "Race and Social Justice Initiatives" teach that White staffers are "responsible" for racism and are "oppressors" of non-Whites.[698]

A teachers union in Minneapolis announced that they plan to layoff White teachers first if they have to make budget cuts, regardless of seniority—explaining in Orwellian language, "if excessing [laying off] a teacher who is a member of a population underrepresented among licensed teachers in the site [the school], the district shall excess the next least senior teacher, who is not a member of an underrepresented population."[699] They always try to mask their agenda by using codewords. "Excess" means to layoff, and "under represented" means if they're not White they'll be passed over, and the White teachers will be laid off instead.

Again, all of this is illegal and violates long-standing anti-discrimination laws, and the fact that such blatant racial discrimination would be adopted by so many organizations is shocking but perhaps even more disturbing are the lack of legal consequences for their actions. The Department of Labor and the Justice Department do nothing to enforce anti-discrimination laws when the discrimination is against White people.

Uber's "head of diversity" (an Asian woman) was suspended after she held an event where she tried to encourage employees to stop calling their White coworkers "Karens" (which has become an anti-White slur that Black people like to use against White women who they view as being entitled or bossy because of their “White privilege”), but Black employees felt like they were being “lectured” and “scolded” so they accused the executive of being racist against them![700]

Black people feel so entitled these days in America that when a company executive tries nicely to get them to stop being racist against White people, they view that as racist!

Black Crimes Matter

Black people in America commit more crimes than White people, Latinos, Asians and every other race.[701] It's an irrefutable fact, but because they commit more crimes (approximately ten times more violent crimes than White people) Blacks also get arrested and incarcerated at a much higher rate per capita than White people.[702]

But like obese people who get defensive when they're told that they should lose weight because they're at risk of having a heart attack or getting diabetes, most Black people don't want to talk about the crime problem in their communities because it involves taking a good hard look in the mirror.

Black people are arrested and incarcerated far more often than White people (and Hispanics, Asians, and every other race) because they commit more crimes, and it's not because of some conspiracy being carried about by police, prosecutors, and juries. It's the same reason there are dramatically more men arrested and incarcerated than women—because men commit more crimes. A lot more.

It's not that police are unfairly "targeting" men for arrest and "systemically" ignoring women who commit crime. It's obvious to everyone that men commit more crime than women, so it makes perfect sense that they would be arrested and incarcerated more. The reasons why Black men commit more crimes (particularly more violent crimes) than White people (as well as Hispanics and Asians) is a whole other topic and beyond the scope of this book.[703] And while it's politically incorrect (or "racist," as Liberals call it) to talk about Black Crime, it's extremely taboo to talk about hate crimes committed by Black people.

When most people think of a hate crime, they think of a group of "White supremacists" attacking a random Black person for the same reason when people hear the word racism, they've been conditioned to automatically think of White people being prejudiced against non-White people. But Black people not only commit hate crimes against White people, Jews, Asians, and Latinos—but the media does their best to keep such attacks contained to small local news outlets in hopes of preventing people from seeing the pattern.

When they do report on such incidents, they try to hide what actually happened by insinuating that the perpetrators are White by reporting that a hate crime did occur, and that the "perpetrator" or "man" called the victim a racial or antisemitic slur, but they purposefully omit the race of the attackers when they're Black.

When a Black man shot up a White church in Antioch, Tennessee to get "revenge" on White people for psycho Dylann Roof's despicable attack on a Black church years earlier, his motive was covered up until the trial, and then only mentioned in local news. A note was found in the shooter's vehicle that same day which admitted he did it for "vengeance" and that "10 of your kind" (meaning White people) "would die."[704]

At the time when people were posting online that the attack was suspiciously not getting any national attention, Newsweek claimed that it was an "alt-right conspiracy theory" that it was a "reverse Dylann Roof story," meaning the Black shooter targeted White people.[705] The New York Times initially reported on the shooting in a story buried on page 14 of their paper and didn't even mention the shooter's motive.[706]

While most Americans never heard of this attack, everyone remembers the endless coverage of Dylann Roof's heinous attack on churchgoers in South Carolina in 2015, which resulted in the Confederate flag being banned across the entire United States and social media companies deeming it a hate symbol; Amazon banning all sales of it, and even reruns of the 1980s classic Dukes of Hazzard series were pulled from TV because the famous General Lee car has the flag painted on it.[707]

Similarly, the media was obsessed with the Unite the Right rally in Charlottesville in August 2017 which would mark the end of the Alt-Right after a man who was literally a schizophrenic drove his car into a group of protesters, killing one of them and injuring others, but they always ignore Black Lives Matter violence like when Micah Xavier Johnson, a Black supremacist and supporter of the Nation of Islam, opened fire on a group of police during a Black Lives Matter rally in Dallas, Texas in 2016 killing five and wounding nine others.[708]

That story disappeared the next day, and the media never brought it up again, but the "White supremacists in Charlottesville" with their tiki torches is a central part of the mythos about why Joe Biden ran for president in 2020, and the car crash will be talked about in the Liberal media for an eternity.

A Black man in California was convicted of going on an anti-White murder spree, killing three random White people in Fresno in 2017 simply because they were White, and planned "to kill as many white males as possible" and advocated for the creation of a Black-only ethnostate, but that too was swept under the rug.[709] I could list more that have been covered by local news outlets (since anti-White hate crimes are always ignored by the national ones), but I'm trying to keep this book to a moderate length.

Antisemitism is always framed as coming from White supremacists, but the dirty little secret of antisemitic hate crimes is that many, if not most, are committed by Black people—particularly Black supremacists who follow the Black Hebrew Israelites' philosophy believing they are the "real" Jews. Black supremacists consider White people the Edomites, which is a reference to the Biblical story of Esau (also known as Edom) who is the twin brother of Jacob and the son of Isaac and Rebekah, who Black Hebrew Israelites consider to be the patriarch of the White race.[710] They often speak in code so most people have no idea what they're talking about when they rail against "the Edomites," the "White Edomite Devils," or Esau-Edom.[711]

A Black couple in New Jersey walked into a Kosher deli and started shooting, killing two people in what was a targeted attack against Jews by Black Hebrew Israelites.[712] A Black man walked into a Hanukkah party in an Orthodox Hasidic Jewish community in New York and started stabbing people, leaving five people injured.[713] As usual, all reports about the stabbing omitted the man's race and just described him as a "man" or "the suspect" to hide the fact that another Black man committed another hate crime against Jews.[714]

A Black woman in Brooklyn was arrested for slapping three Orthodox Jews while yelling "fuck you Jews" and because of the "bail reform laws" she was released from custody without having to pay any bail and three days later arrested again for assaulting more people.[715]

A lot of the hatred Black people have towards Jews isn't from those who subscribe to the Black Hebrew Israelite philosophy, but from Black people in general who often harbor anti-Jewish sentiments from perceiving that Jewish business owners have exploited Black communities.

Malcolm X, who was a Black separatist and wanted Black people to have their own region of the United States so they could live without any White people around, said, “It is Jews right here in Harlem who run these whiskey-stores that get you drunk. It is Jews that run these old run-down stores that sell you bad food. It is Jews who control the economy of Harlem and use it for themselves and the benefit of Israel…That’s not antisemitic, that’s just plain intelligence.”[716]

But only White people are framed as having anti-Jewish views and Blacks are always portrayed as a fellow minority group being oppressed by the White man even though antisemitism is a central part of the Nation of Islam—the Black power Muslim movement, and many Black people who aren’t followers of the movement still harbor similar views.

White people are always blamed for anti-Asian hate crimes too, when surveillance footage shows they’re almost all committed by Black men. After a Black man in Dallas, Texas was arrested for going on shooting sprees at various Asian businesses, specifically targeting Asians, that story vanished down the memory hole by the next day and was completely forgotten.[717] If he was White the story would have received endless coverage on cable news and CNN would have said Donald Trump incited him because he kept calling COVID-19 the “China virus,” but as usual, once the perpetrator was found to be Black, they all dropped the story.

A Black man brutally beat a 67-year-old Asian woman in Yonkers, New York, punching and stomping her more than 100 times while calling her an “Asian bitch,” which was all captured on video by a security camera.[718] But he was just identified as a “man” in the news stories, not a Black man, even though it was a clear hate crime not just a random mugging or assault. Only those who saw the security camera footage, which was released by police and omitted in most news stories about the attack, saw that he was clearly a Black man.

“Asian man pushed onto subway tracks in Queens” read the headlines after another hate crime in the New York area, and the perpetrator was descried as only wearing a black hooded sweatshirt, while the fact that it was known he himself is a Black man was ignored, as usual, despite footage of the attacker being captured by security cameras.[719]

In 2020, the Southern Poverty Law Center removed Black hate groups from their online list of “hate groups” because it was making the Black Lives Matter movement look bad by not just admitting Black supremacist and separatist groups exist, but showing how prevalent they are. The SPLC admitted that they didn't want to "aid law enforcement in its definition of Black Identity Extremists," since the Department of Justice (under the Trump administration) finally admitted that Black hate groups pose a danger to society.[720]

They recategorized some of the groups giving them the cover of "antisemitic" groups or "general hate" groups, instead of being Black separatists or Black nationalists. There used to be three dozen Black hate groups on the Southern Poverty Law Center's list, including the Nation of Islam, the New Black Panther Party, the Black Hebrew Israelites, and many others, but not anymore. Admitting the reality that Black supremacist organizations exist is considered to be racist.

When discussing hate crimes, you can't ignore hate crime hoaxes, which are the vast majority of alleged "hate crimes" reported today.[721] To list the specific instances that have been confirmed hoaxes would fill up an entire book—and they do.[722] There are also numerous websites which keep a pretty good tally of the latest hate crime hoaxes, including FakeHateCrimes.org.

From a Black college Lacrosse player spray painting the n-word and a swastika on his dorm in Maryland targeting himself,[723] to a Black girl tweeting death threats to a school in New Jersey hoping to gain more sympathy for Black Lives Matter,[724] to a Black woman writing racist notes to herself and filing a fake police report at the University of Wisconsin, Madison.[725] As The Wall Street Journal surprisingly admitted, "Hate crime hoaxes are more common than you think."[726]

There are countless ones which have been foiled on college campuses where mostly Blacks and gays, but sometimes Muslims and Jews, are caught faking hate crimes by spray painting graffiti, or even harming themselves and claiming they were attacked.[727] It's a common tactic that is often exposed because the hoaxers are too stupid to realize security cameras are everywhere on college campuses, but there are exponentially more hate crime hoaxes that are said to have occurred other places which go undiscovered and are reported as real in the media.

Jussie Smollett's hoax is the most famous to be exposed, but they date back decades. Al Sharpton's claim to fame was rallying behind the

Tawana Brawley hoax in 1987 where a Black teenager in New York falsely accused four White men of kidnapping and raping her.[728]

The Bubba Wallace “noose” incident isn’t technically a hoax because it wasn’t a deliberate scheme, but instead a case of Imaginary Racism which is also a common occurrence, where Black people falsely interpret something as being “racist” because they’ve become paranoid from all the fear-mongering and fake news in the media (and spread through social media) about how there are supposedly “White supremacists” around every corner and that “systemic racism” is the bedrock of every American institution.

White Identity

For most of America's history White people haven't thought about themselves as a racial group because their race had been largely invisible to them, like a fish in water, since whiteness has been the dominant culture going all the way back to America's founding.

But as White people are quickly becoming a minority group (and have already become minorities in several states) they are becoming racially conscious and starting to think about themselves as an ethnic group—like Blacks, Asians, Latinos and every other race—and caring about their own interests within the multicultural communities (and states, and country) they inhabit, instead of always allowing themselves to be pushed aside in the name of diversity.

And as White people came under increasing attacks from the mainstream media, online activists, woke corporations, and others as a result of the insurgency of Black Lives Matter—White Identity (again, White people seeing themselves as a unique ethnic group with their own interests they want to protect or advance) has accelerated their racial consciousness and is changing how they perceive themselves in our multiracial society.

In response to this, the other ethnic groups (and self-hating Whites) along with the usual suspects in the media and Democrat Party, are frantically trying to stop this inevitable paradigm shift, equating White Identity or White collectivism with "White nationalism" and "White supremacy," deceptively conflating them as if they're the same. These increased attacks are causing a feedback loop which is only accelerating White people's awakening and involvement in ethnic collectivism. This then increases concern among non-Whites and incites more attacks against whiteness, and so on.

An assistant Professor of Political Science at Duke University named Ashley Jardina has actually been a pioneer in scholarly research into the awaking of White Identity politics and found that contrary to most people's expectations and beliefs, there is a low correlation between White Identity and racial resentment towards other races.[729]

In other words, Whites who are racially consciousness and are thinking of themselves and other White people as part of an ethic group are not racist against non-Whites. They simply want what every other racial group in America has, which is the right to not only be proud of their race, but to be able to voice support for their own in-group interests (such as preserving their culture) and to not have their civil rights be violated by being discriminated against.

The Left has stigmatized the idea of White people being concerned about their own ethnic interests to the point that it's almost always falsely equated with White supremacy. It's the biggest taboo, but if White people keep getting systematically demonized by radical Black and Latino groups (and Jewish groups like the ADL), Whites will naturally respond by awakening to their own White Identity as a natural instinct, and will begin to collectivize and organize as an ethnic group in order to stop other races from treating them as if they are second class citizens.

Europe has seen the rise of a White Identity movement in what's called Identitarianism (or the Identitarian Movement) which is opposed to multiculturalism and promotes localism or ethnopluralism which is the idea of maintaining unique and separate ethnocultural regions. This is a reaction to the Islamization of European countries caused by the massive influx of Muslims from the Middle East as well as millions emigrating to Europe from Africa.[730]

Many of the migrants cannot assimilate into such a different culture and have no desire to. And the flood of migrants has caused massive crime waves in Sweden, Germany, France, England, and other countries who took them in.[731] Sweden is now over 8% Muslim.[732] In 2016 Mohamed became the most common new baby name for boys in the UK, and remained the most popular through at least 2022.[733] (It still may be, but the latest data for 2023 wasn't released by the time this book went to print and the trend is likely continuing).[734]

London is also now 15% Muslim.[735] In 2016 the first Muslim mayor of London was elected, and many of the indigenous Europeans are extremely unhappy with such dramatic demographic changes which are resulting in a rise of White Identity throughout Europe.

Beginning in 2017 as a reaction to the rising antiwhiteism on American college campuses and social media, some members of the online forum 4Chan decided to print fliers that simply read "It's Okay To Be White" and posted them on various campuses. Instead of people ignoring such an innocuous statement, the fliers made national news and were denounced as "racist" and "neo-Nazi propaganda" by school authorities, the media, the ADL, and Southern Poverty Law Center.[736]

The fact that anyone was even upset about the fliers is strange, but catching the attention of the professional hate groups like the SPLC and ADL, and making the national news just proved the point the kids were trying to make. If they had spray painted the slogan on the side of some buildings, that would be vandalism and maybe justified making the local news, but these were ordinary 8 1/2" by 11" sheets of paper that were just taped on some light poles and stapled onto community bulletin boards.

Similar fliers reading "All Lives Matter" have occasionally been posted on college campuses and around town as well, and as you can expect, were also firmly denounced as "overtly racist" and "White supremacist propaganda."[737] In October 2022, Kanye West (who had legally changed his name to Ye) wore a White Lives Matter shirt to a fashion show in Paris alongside Candace Owens, causing everyone in the Liberal media in America to freak out. CBS News insinuated it was "racist."[738] Rolling Stone said it was "uncalled for."[739] And The New York Times ran the headline, "There Is No Excuse for Ye's 'White Lives Matter' Shirt."[740]

The ADL deems "White Lives Matter" to be a "White supremacist phrase,"[741] along with the Southern Poverty Law Center.[742] Both organizations function to smear Conservatives and Christians as racist, bigots, and homophobes; and often label organizations they hate as "hate groups," and are tirelessly trying to stop White people from embracing White Identity by equating it with White supremacy and neo-Nazis.

Even Christopher Rufo, who's held up as the world's foremost expert on Critical Race Theory by Conservatives, is firmly opposed to White people collectivizing as an ethnic group like other races, saying "I do not believe that 'white identity politics' or 'white identitarianism' is a solution; in fact, I think it would be a major step backwards and, potentially, disastrous. We should emphasize the individual and de-emphasize racial categories, to the extent possible."[743]

He also performs mental gymnastics in order to avoid framing Critical Race Theory as "anti-White racism" out of concerns it may fuel White Identity. He argues this because "it's not exclusively anti-White," and points to the college admissions scandal over affirmative action where Asians were also passed over while Blacks were given preferential treatment, but CRT is specifically anti-White—it just so happens that Asians are sometimes collateral damage. The main target is obviously White people.

Rufo is married to an Asian woman, and his children look Asian, so he has a personal interest in trying to depict CRT as not being exclusively anti-White, and it would be highly unlikely that he and his wife aren't fostering in their children a strong sense of Asian identity and pride, but he cautiously advises White people not to embrace their whiteness or White Identity, saying, "White identitarianism is pathetic and disgusting."[744]

Instead, it appears Christopher Rufo wants White people to avoid any ethnic identity at all, and proposes they just view themselves as generic "Americans" and minimize their racial identity as much as possible. Of course he would never recommend Jews shed their ethnicity as the core of their identity. They're "special," and that would be antisemitic. Meanwhile he looks forward to a world in which Whites, Blacks, and Latinos are all mixed together into one homogeneous "human race," saying "I think interracial marriage is a sign of progress, I think it's beautiful, I think it's amazing…America is going to look different in 100 years. You're not going to be able to tell 'you're Black, you're White, you're Hispanic, you're Puerto Rican, whatever.' I think ultimately that's going to be good."[745]

Ask anyone who is of mixed race about some of the complications regarding their identity and acceptance among certain peer groups and they may not sing such praises of it.[746] And ask any mixed race couple about the intercultural conflicts that arise (or persist), and they too would admit it's not always as rosy as such "diversity" is often portrayed from the outside.[747] So many people wish to retain their unique ethnicity within their families and aren't interested in their children and grandchildren becoming part of a multicultural mishmash.

But unlike every other race on the planet, White people aren't allowed to be proud of being White—or proud of the list of things White people have contributed to the world, from creating the automobile and airplanes to air-conditioning and computers. "White Pride" is considered synonymous with “White Supremacy.” Wikipedia defines it as “an expression primarily used by white separatist, white nationalist, fascist, neo-Nazi and white supremacist organizations in order to signal racist or racialist viewpoints.”[748]

Of course Black Pride is defined favorably as “a movement which encourages Black people to celebrate Black culture and embrace their African heritage.”[749] Similarly, the entry for Asian Pride notes that it’s “a term utilized by people all over the world to celebrate their Asian ethnicity.”[750]

White people just wanting to date only other White people is considered racist, and any app that would facilitate White-only dating would not only cause a national outcry by Democrats in Congress who would launch a congressional committee to investigate whoever created it, but it would be banned by the Apple and Android app stores for being “racist.”[751] Meanwhile there are countless dating apps for Black people and Latinos to meet each other, not to mention Black-only beauty pageants, Black-only dorms, graduation ceremonies, and other “Black safe spaces” where they can enjoy themselves without the presence of White people.[752]

But again, if a White person just wants to date or marry another White person, that sets off alarm bells—while Blacks, Asians, Latinos, and Jews who want to do so are celebrated for maintaining their cultural heritage. And if any White people prefer to live in a predominantly White neighborhood (like Scott Adams, the creator of the Dilbert comic strip recommended) or want their children to go to a predominantly White school, that’s even worse, and they’re denounced as White nationalists and Nazis.

Just for recommending that White people should live in predominantly White neighborhoods to avoid the ongoing racial strife between Whites and Blacks, Scott Adams’ Dilbert comic strip was canceled by his syndicator after more than 30 years in publication, and overnight vanished from every newspaper around the world.[753]

Aside from the Liberal media manufacturing outrage over his comments, he was also denounced by some brand name Conservative commentators as well, including Ben Shapiro, who said that “there’s a strong case” that anyone saying such “racist stuff” should have their career ended.[754]

Use Their Own Terms Against Them

One tool you can use to combat the Marxists and their incessant antiwhiteism is turning their own terminology against them by linguistically hijacking their buzzwords. When they talk about "White Fragility," point out Black Fragility—which I would define as: Discomfort and defensiveness on the part of some Black people who live in a predominantly White culture due to fixating on long since past injustices which they never experienced (and weren't experienced by anyone in their family alive today) causing them to imagine racism where none exists, and pine away for living in a culture that is predominately black instead.

When they whine about whiteness or "White normativity" then bring up their White-Envy which is when Black or other non-White people who live in a predominantly White culture feel envious of the society because their ancestors lacked the skills, knowledge, or possessions of others in the dominant culture, often resulting in resentment and demands for reparations instead of accepting personal responsibility for their own situations and working to improve their lives through hard work, discipline, and other ethical means of achieving success and happiness.[755]

When they talk about the "need" for more "diversity," call them anti-White. Don't play into their semantical games by acknowledging their made up words and ridiculous false concepts. Every time they use their cultural marxist terminology, do linguistic judo, and turn it back against them.

Doing this saves you from wasting time engaging them in an argument about why they're wrong, (and insane). And just chuckle or laugh at them, mock them, and don't even take their concerns seriously unless it's your boss and you run the risk of being fired. We should all start highlighting the systemic antiwhiteism to make it clear that anti-White racism isn't just occurring in isolated instances from a few individual Black people or organizations, but instead antiwhiteism is so pervasive it has become woven into American culture through Black Lives Matter activism and the Liberal media constantly demonizing White people and whiteness.

And again, the term antiwhiteism needs to become the common word used in place of racism when talking about anti-White racism because of the deeply rooted associations and preconceptions people have with the word racism. Just invoking the word racism always conjures up a frame that it's something White people do to non-Whites, and the very word is basically an anti-White slur, so a completely different word should be used when talking about anti-White racism, or at the very least—the clear distinction should be made by describing it as anti-White racism, not just racism.

That is as long as the ADL, SPLC, and Wikipedia don't hijack the term and get a false definition to stick by claiming it's a "White supremacist" code word, which they will likely attempt to do just like they've done with It's Okay to Be White, Cultural Marxism, and White Pride. Even mentioning the percentage of Black people in relation to the percentage of violent crimes they commit in the United States (i.e. 13/50) is deemed a "numeric hate symbol."[756]

When the Left mentions "White privilege" then turn it around on them and point out that Black Privilege is actually the centerpiece in our culture now since Black people are put on a pedestal and treated as if they deserve special benefits and treatment because they've been exploiting grievances about injustices in the distant past and laying guilt trips on White people in order to subvert equal rights and blind justice. This Black Privilege often stems from false perceptions of racism where none exists, or fabricating incidents of racism in order to leverage power over White people.[757] They try to wield this power to silence criticism or judgment about any aspect of their culture (like glorifying thugs and crime) or others pointing out the high percentage of single mothers in the Black community.

Black Privilege goes far beyond giving them jobs they're not qualified for in the name of "diversity, equity, and inclusion" (the fancy new term for affirmative action). It also grants them the benefit of often not being charged with anything when they commit crimes, or being given light sentences out of concerns that putting them in jail instead of releasing them on probation would reflect poorly on Black people as a group, so in the 21st century many are often allowed to escape justice.

Black Privilege also entails having TV shows and entire networks like BET and Fox Soul dedicated to Black-only entertainment—and having Black-only dating apps, Black-only beauty pageants, Black-only dorms at colleges, and being able to openly proclaim that Black people are the “best” and “Black is beautiful” while flying into a violent rage if a White person were to say the same thing about their race.

We all know what would happen if a White person said they wanted to live in a White-only community, or if White students said they wanted to live in White-only dorms or if a network wanted to produce a TV show that expressly doesn’t include any Blacks or Latinos and instead would focus on a White family or community without any forced “diversity.” All hell would break loose, but every other race can make such demands and are given those accommodations without any resistance.

But beware, because cancel culture has gotten so strong that your career could be destroyed in an instant by saying many of the obvious truths mentioned in this this book—especially if you explicitly show support for White Identity (or even bring it up in any context other than denouncing it).

Not everyone is in a position to loudly or firmly push back against antiwhiteism (or LGBTQism), but we do need people who are confident they can weather the storm that may come their way if they do, or else our country and our culture will be irreparably damaged, if not destroyed.

Censorship

The World Wide Web opened up a new frontier for publishing in the 1990s where anyone could create a website from their home computer that could be seen by anyone else in the world with just a few clicks on a keyboard through their Netscape or Internet Explorer browsers. But at the time, it was difficult to build a website—and extensive computer skills (including knowing the HTML computer language) were needed, so while every major corporation eventually set one up, only a few eccentric people, computer nerds, or entrepreneurs had one.

About a decade later in the early 2000s, the advent of social media made having an online presence turn-key, and anyone with practically no computer skills or technical experience could start using the Internet to publish blogs with photos and videos, and share links to news articles with others who could then share them with their friends and followers who could do the same, and the concept of "going viral" was born. It was the next phase of the Internet revolution, or Web 2.0 as it's called. While Web 1.0 consisted of static webpages, the new era of online activity involved easy two-way communication and an interactive experience with comments, follower counts, and "likes."

While MySpace led the way, Facebook soon overtook them and quickly grew to dominate social media. At the end of 2006 Facebook opened to everyone, not just people with a college email address ending in .edu, and then MySpace quickly died.[758] By the 2008 presidential election Facebook was already part of everyone's lives, and now on their phones thanks to the launch of the Apple App Store. When the iPhone was first released in June 2007 it had only a few apps (like email, maps, and music), but the following year the App Store was opened to 3rd party developers and enabled access to services that had previously been contained to desktop computers but were now available anywhere in the palm of your hand.[759]

Social media soon morphed from a fun novelty to a way of life. During this new social media revolution if you were a young adult and didn't have a Facebook page (or later if you were a high schooler and didn't have a Snapchat or Instagram account), then you were seen as an outcast. Social media became just as common as cellphones.

Even though Facebook, Twitter, and YouTube had become extremely popular by the 2008 presidential election, their real power still wasn't realized until a few years later. Barack Obama was the first president to have a Facebook and Twitter account, and throughout the 2008 and 2012 election cycles people used social media to argue and debate ideas and share news articles as the platforms slowly became more and more intertwined with politics and our daily lives.

But even throughout the Obama administration social media was still mostly considered to be a "neat" way to communicate with other people, and while it was certainly changing our culture, it hadn't become the center-point of it—yet.

But by the 2016 presidential election cycle (which began in 2015), social media had become an integral part of our culture. Every celebrity, every TV show, every brand name business had Facebook and Twitter accounts. It's how major companies fielded complaints from their customers instead of the "old fashioned" way of people calling them on the phone. A new kind of celebrity was created in the form of YouTubers or "social media stars" who used the technology to go viral and gain massive audiences, often dwarfing traditional talk radio shows and television networks.

Stories that weren't chosen by editors of the major newspapers and television networks to dominate their coverage (or even get mentioned at all) could now become widely publicized from people organically sharing them, and the corporate news giants lost their ability to control the topics of conversation that the general public was having.

The New York Times complained that "YouTube, Reddit and Facebook have allowed fringe thinkers to bypass traditional gatekeepers and reach millions of people directly."[760] CNN's "senior media reporter" Oliver Darcy complained that social media companies have "given everybody the same ability to broadcast their views, unfiltered really, to millions and millions of people," and now "they can share it and they can tell their friends about it."[761]

After Trump beat Hillary Clinton, the entire Liberal Media Industrial Complex panicked and claimed that "fake news" being spread through Facebook by the Russians tricked people into not liking her, and thus not voting for her. The Establishment media aimed to take their power back and that's when the mass censorship and algorithm manipulation started. Before the 2016 election, the only posts or content that was taken down were almost exclusively things that clearly violated what were once reasonable terms of service—forbidding death threats, porn, or people just uploading full episodes of TV shows to YouTube, infringing on studios' copyrighted works.

The mainstream media lost control of the flow of information, and so they scrambled to gain back their monopoly, partnering with the Big Tech platforms to not only get their content artificially boosted, but also systematically suppress independent voices.

Immediately in the aftermath we saw an increasingly number of Conservatives having posts removed from social media and getting locked out of their accounts (or permanently banned) for posting criticism of illegal immigration, Muslim refugees, gender bending and other LGBT activities that had previously been allowed to be hotly debated and firmly denounced.

Posting basic scientific facts about gender or undisputed crime statistics about Black males became a problem. During President Trump's (first) impeachment hearings, nobody was allowed to mention the name of the "whistleblower" whose bogus allegations kicked the whole thing off after Trump asked Ukraine's President Volodymyr Zelensky about the Biden Crime Family's dealings in the country, which was spun into a story about seeking a foreign country's "help" to "interfere" in our election.

When Senator Rand Paul mentioned the name of the person widely believed to have helped get the impeachment hearing in motion (Eric Ciaramella) on the floor of the Senate, YouTube even removed that video, claiming it was "harassment" and an "invasion of privacy."[762]

In 2017, YouTube completely changed their search results to surface videos from mainstream media channels for most topics people look up.[763] Internally they tag brand name channels as "authoritative" so the algorithm artificially boosts them to the top of the search results even if other videos from independent "ordinary" YouTubers are more relevant and should organically be the actual top results because of their views, watch time, and the amount of engagement they have.

YouTube even created a special curated list of search terms after Liberals in the media complained about the top search results for things like abortion and the Federal Reserve.[764] They added actress Brie Larson's name to the list after "journalists" complained that the top search results for her name accompanied by the title of her latest film at the time (Captain Marvel) were YouTubers critical of her and the movie.[765]

Then they later hid the dislike ratings near the end of 2021 because so many people were thumbing down videos on mainstream channels that kept getting artificially boosted into people's feeds and inserted onto the trending list. They claimed it was to prevent smaller YouTubers from getting "bullied" by large numbers of people thumbing down their videos, but it was just another attempt to hide negative feedback about the Liberal propaganda they kept pushing.

And then another wave of censorship hit during the COVID-19 pandemic in 2020 when people opposing the mandatory lockdowns were suspended and banned from the brand name social media platforms, and people questioning the safety of the vaccine were censored as well. Even just saying that the virus leaked from the Wuhan lab wasn't allowed.

Senator Rand Paul was censored by YouTube another time for a speech he made denouncing mask mandates on the floor of the Senate.[766] Dan Bongino's channel was banned after his third strike for "COVID misinformation" because of a rant he did about masks not being effective.[767] Then just a few days later the CDC updated their "data" about masks, admitting after two years of the pandemic that cloth masks basically don't do anything.[768]

Dr. Drew, the famous Hollywood Liberal TV doctor, even got a strike from YouTube for "medical misinformation" after he discussed some of the possible side effects of the COVID-19 vaccine on his podcast.[769] He's generally pro-vaccine despite experiencing some mild side effects himself, but also said if his children were under 18, he would not have given them the COVID vaccine.

The censorship was so egregious that after a medical device being used on COVID patients called the Heal Light, which consisted of a breathing tube wrapped in ultraviolet LEDs designed to kill the virus once inserted into the lungs of patents was mentioned by President Trump, the company had their YouTube channel and Twitter account censored for spreading "dangerous medical misinformation."[770]

Donald Trump mentioned that scientists were using ultraviolet light "inside the body" to kill the virus, something that the media mocked him for because anything he said they used against him. His explanation of the technology was just an off the cuff remark about some of the things that were being developed to help treat patients. So the media made it seem as if he was crazy and wanted to insert light bulbs under people's skin.[771]

Then when people starting pointing out he was referring to an actual device being tested in hospitals, the Big Tech platforms did what they could to hide that fact in order to prevent the media's mockery of him from backfiring.[772]

And while social media was the primary focus of the "thought police" looking to censor all content they disagree with, soon those who wanted to silence others began pointing to podcasts that were hosted on Apple Podcasts and Spotify.[773] The topics being censored, along with the methods and reasons for shutting down discussions kept growing.

The Next Wave of Censorship

The first wave of censorship was after the 2016 election, the second was during the COVID pandemic, and the third began immediately after the 2020 presidential election like clockwork. After four years of the Democrats coming up with countless conspiracy theories about how Donald Trump supposedly secretly worked with Russian intelligence to "steal" the 2016 election, all of a sudden claiming that Democrats stole the 2020 election for Joe Biden was a violation of the terms of service on all Big Tech platforms.[774]

Such claims were suddenly deemed to "undermine our Democracy" and said to be "dangerous." Exercising your First Amendment right to question the outcome of an election, or state an opinion that it was stolen, was now forbidden.

Censoring such discussions on social media was a new level of authoritarianism never seen in America. Up until that point, the only countries where people weren't allowed to question the election results were Communist countries and third world dictatorships. They claimed it might cause more civil unrest in the wake of the January 6th protest at the Capitol, but the systemic antiwhiteism and anti-police rhetoric coming from Black Lives Matter that had been inciting violence for years was still allowed to be posted and go viral.

Shortly before the 2020 election, the Big Tech platforms all censored the October surprise sprung on Democrats when the contents of Hunter Biden's laptop was published after he abandoned it at a repair shop. Aside from bizarre videos he shot of himself smoking crack and having sex with prostitutes, there were emails showing shady business deals with Ukraine and China that involved his father.[775]

So to muddy the waters hoping to hide the story, Deep State intelligence officials said it was Russian disinformation, but it was obvious at the time (and would later be undeniable) that their claims about the story being disinformation was the disinformation. A year and a half later, after the Biden Administration was an utter failure and Joe Biden had become an embarrassment, Liberal mainstream outlets finally admitted that the Hunter Biden laptop story is true—that the emails and explicit videos are his, but they still denied he or Joe Biden engaged in any influence peddling or illegal activity.[776]

Of course Donald Trump was banned from all brand name platforms after the January 6th protest at the Capitol got out of hand, but the Taliban (and their officials) were still able to have an official Twitter account.[777] So was Vladimir Putin and all Russian government officials and agencies, even after they invaded Ukraine.[778] But not Donald Trump. From that point on, anytime he gave a speech or an interview, if he mentioned that he thought the 2020 election was stolen, that video would get censored from YouTube and Facebook, including his speech at CPAC in February 2021, as well as his CPAC speech the following year in 2022.[779]

As the 2020 election approached, numerous high-profile Democrats voiced concerns about the security of electronic voting machines and even held congressional hearings about it, but once Joe Biden was declared the supposed winner of the 2020 election, all of those concerns vanished and couldn't be raised by Republicans.

Democrats had legitimate concerns about the security and accuracy of electronic voting machines, and HBO even aired a documentary called Kill Chain: The Cyber War on America's Elections in March 2020 which demonstrated some of the vulnerabilities they had (anticipating a Donald Trump victory over Joe Biden, which Democrats would have blamed on Russia hacking the machines), but all those concerns went out the window —and after the election any Republican who raised them ever again was attacked as a "conspiracy theorist" and said to be spreading "dangerous misinformation."[780]

Surprisingly, a little over two years later Donald Trump's Twitter account was reinstated thanks to Elon Musk buying the platform, and a few months after that Facebook, Instagram, and YouTube allowed him access to his accounts again as well.[781] This, shortly after he announced he was running for reelection a second time. They probably knew that keeping the Republican frontrunner off their platforms during a presidential run would have galvanized Republicans across the country to denounce such communist-style censorship, so they reluctantly allowed him back on.

Then three months later, in June of 2023, YouTube finally lifted their ban on Republicans doubting the 2020 election results and talk of widespread voter fraud affecting the outcome.[782] YouTube claimed it was because they deemed there was no longer an "eminent" threat of people rioting again, like at the Capitol on January 6th 2021, since that tense time had long since passed and the anger dissipated.

But YouTube probably also realized that Rumble had become a viable alternative, attracting big names and even non-political channels like gamers and other content creators who thought YouTube was too saturated and wanted to try building an audience on a newer platform that was gaining momentum. Rumble even got listed on the NASDAQ stock exchange in September 2022 and has reached a market cap of two and a half billion dollars.[783] While other platforms had tried to take on YouTube, they either failed financially and ended up shutting down, or only gained niche users and audiences.

Rumble has grown to be a serious threat to YouTube's monopoly. While they still have policies against "hate speech," their rules regarding discussions about transgenderism and vaccines are drastically less restrictive than YouTube. And they even allow (as of November 2023) channels that have been banned from YouTube, including Alex Jones, Red Ice TV, AmRen (American Renaissance run by Jared Taylor), and Nick Fuentes.

But while Rumble promotes themselves as a "free speech" platform, they're only freer, and will be put to a difficult test at some point when the Apple and Android App stores pressure them to remove certain videos or channels they deem "hateful," "antisemitic," or contain what they deem "extremist" content.

Rumble is no longer a privately owned company. They have shareholders they're accountable to, and it's doubtful they will resist the ultimatum of either banning such content, or being banned from the App Stores themselves, if or when it's given. In the small chance they stand their ground and refuse to ban specific creators from their platform if threatened by the App Stores, they'll have to do what Gab.com did, and format their website so that users can visit it on their phone's browser and then just use the Save to Home Screen feature to create an icon on their phone that launches the website.

This workaround, pioneered by Gab's founder Andrew Torba after Gab was banned from the App Stores, allows a website to function essentially as an app on a phone, minus the push notifications. There may be some drawbacks however, such as lag-time when using certain features compared to the app itself, but it will still work—at least for now. Apple and Android may close this loophole at some point, but Gab.com has been using this method for years.[784]

Rumble will also increasingly face organized advertiser boycotts aimed at strangling them financially. After YouTube demonetized Russell Brand's channel in the wake of a coordinated campaign to cancel him, Rumble stood by him, causing brands like Burger King and HelloFresh to pull ads from the entire platform.[785] Rumble had already been the target of numerous organizations dedicated to stripping them of advertisers in hopes of shutting them down, and these groups will continue to seize on highly publicized events surrounding content creators who use the platform in order to further bully major brands (and advertising agencies) into not working with them.

Fake Fact Checkers

Facebook is the worst of all the social media platforms in terms of censorship and algorithm manipulation. What was once a great platform to keep in touch with family and friends, and a place to read interesting articles others shared, has turned into another tightly controlled corporate cog in the Left's information warfare machine.

At the end of 2016, about a month after the election when the "fake news" scare was first heating up and Democrats were blaming Hillary's loss on people posting "misinformation" about her, Facebook decided to start automatically "fact checking" things people posted, outsourcing the operation to various organizations like Snopes and PoltiFact who were granted authority to police content so Facebook itself could claim they weren't censoring posts deemed to be "false" or sticking their nose into everyone's business—it's "trusted third party independent fact checkers."[786]

From this point on when anyone posted a link to a news story or YouTube video—if it triggered a "fact check," the post would be completely blurred out with a notice over it claiming it's "false" which also prevents it from going viral. But many of these "fact checks" are completely and obviously false, and the posts they censor are accurate and true. The new feature is just another way for the Establishment to further suppress information they don't want people to know.

But it's not just links that are censored. Posts just containing text are too, since Facebook automatically scans and reads everything; and if posts are detected to say things that they don't want people to say but aren't a violation of the terms of service, then they're secretly suppressed and only show up in a limited number of people's feeds who are following the page.

The Facebook "fact checks" started off to "protect civic integrity," meaning election news or falsehoods about voting, such as if someone posts that the polls in a particular area are closed when they're actually still open which could discourage people from going out to vote on their way home from work, or posts citing the wrong location of where people can vote which would send them on a wild goose chase, etc.

That kind of misinformation was initially the target of the fact checkers, along with actual hoaxes they didn't want to go viral (such as someone claiming there was a terrorist attack in an American city, like a bombing that didn't actually happen) which many would argue may have been a good feature. But the road to hell is paved with good intentions, and the system got so out of control Facebook started censoring memes making fun of Democrats and Joe Biden.

For example, they "fact checked" a meme about gas prices being high because of President Biden that reads "Man I haven't seen gas prices this high since the last Democrat was in office." Anyone who posted it had the meme automatically grayed out and it was labeled "false" with a note claiming gas prices were high due to generic "supply issues."[787]

They even "fact check" the popular meme of Martin Luther King wearing a MAGA hat, claiming that his political affiliation isn't known.[788] Like all platforms, they use a Content ID system to automatically scan every image and video that's uploaded, and they have an entire library of memes the moderators have set to be flagged. Satirical articles from The Babylon Bee even get the same "fact check" in order to censor their mockery of Liberals.[789]

Another ridiculously false "fact check" that was integrated into Facebook's automatic system by USA Today, one of their "trusted" partners, claimed it was fake news that a thug named Jacob Blake was armed at the time he got himself shot by police in Kenosha, Wisconsin. He's the thug whose shooting sparked the Black Lives Matter riots there shortly after, which led to Kyle Rittenhouse having to defend himself when he was attacked by the angry mob.

Anyone who posted that Jacob Blake was armed with a knife (which he was) had their posts flagged as "false" and penalties placed on their accounts. Not only did police say he had a knife on him at the time of the shooting, but it could be seen on video, and later during an interview with Good Morning America he admitted the obvious—that he was armed with a knife when police shot him.[790] But Facebook tried to protect the false narrative that another "unarmed" Black man just happened to get shot by police who must have been racist.

Facebook also “fact checked” a true claim that Donald Trump made about Kyle Rittenhouse when he said that videos showed he was trying to get away from the mob when they attacked him.[791] Anyone who followed that story closely saw those videos which went viral that same night, but Facebook was censoring posts that defended Rittenhouse or showed he acted in self-defense, deeming him a “mass shooter,” and supporting or praising such individuals is a violation of their terms of service.[792]

Rittenhouse himself was banned from Facebook after his arrest, so he couldn’t even defend himself on the platform while the media, Democrats in Congress, and countless others online kept smearing him as a White supremacist and a mass murderer.[793]

One of the most hilarious fake “fact checks” happened after CNN made Joe Rogan look green when they aired a video he posted on Instagram announcing that he had tested positive for coronavirus. He wasn’t vaccinated, so the media tried to rub it in that he got sick by making him look deathly ill by drastically altering the color of his video even though he only had mild symptoms because he got the monoclonal antibody treatment right away.

“No evidence video color was manipulated in CNN news segment,” claimed the fact checkers,[794] but if you looked at the original video he uploaded to Instagram side by side with the one CNN aired (which is still up on their YouTube channel) he looks almost as green as the Incredible Hulk.[795] It’s cartoonishly altered, and there’s no reasonable explanation for it other than it was done on purpose, just like discoloring footage of political opponents in campaign ads—a common tactic used to cast them in a negative light.

Candace Owens sued the “fact checkers” because after receiving several “strikes” for posting supposedly false content then pages get demonetized just like YouTube channels—harming the livelihoods of content creators.[796] John Stossel also sued Facebook for over $2 million dollars claiming their fake “fact checks” were defamatory after they had declared several posts of his to be “false” (that were not), but a judge dismissed his lawsuit at the end of 2022 claiming that the “fact checks” are only a “subjective judgment about the accuracy and reliability of assertions.”[797]

Note the judge's claims that the "fact checks" were "subjective," not objective. In other words, the supposed "fact checks" were just opinions. The judge's ruling goes on to say, "Simply because the process by which content is assessed and a label applied is called a 'fact-check' does not mean that the assessment itself is an actionable statement of objective fact."[798]

So a judge ruled the "fact checks" are B.S. but Facebook is allowed to still use them to censor and suppress factual information, without facing any consequences. Candace Owens' lawsuit was also thrown out by a judge for similar bogus reasons.[799]

Elon Musk Tries to Save Twitter

Twitter (now rebranded as X by Elon Musk, but will still be referred to as Twitter for the sake of this discussion) often drives the news cycle. What trends on Twitter, makes headlines because lazy journalists looking for a new story to write just have to scroll through Twitter for a few minutes and see what's trending and figure that would be a good topic since so many people are talking about it.

So, activists make it their mission to get topics or hashtags to trend in order to promote their cause, and of course for years Twitter manually inserted topics into the list to create a self-fulfilling prophecy. People thought the topic was popular because it was on the trending list, so they start tweeting about it, which then caused it to become popular.

It appears this manipulation stopped soon after Elon Musk purchased the platform, but since its launch in 2006 this was an extremely powerful method of directing news cycles, especially since Twitter has been predominantly a news platform and is a favorite for "journalists," news junkies, and political activists. Equally powerful was the platform preventing topics from trending when they were so widely tweeted about the algorithm would have organically included them on the list. Under Jack Dorsey's leadership (and later Parag Agrawal) the company regularly suppressed topics from trending that they didn't want to become bigger issues.

The platform is largely considered to be the digital public square where people argue and try to dunk on each other's stupid tweets, and its very design incentivizes dogpiling, which can instantly flood someone's mentions with an endless stream of mockery and this is why it's often used by activists to cancel people. A small group of people can easily whip up an online mob and flood a business's mentions with angry demands that someone be fired or they drop a certain product or stop advertising on certain TV shows or podcasts.

While once perhaps the least strict platform in terms of censorship, it slowly fell in lock step with the same policies of the other major platforms—banning "misgendering" transgender people (which means not using their preferred pronouns) and suspending people for "homophobic," "Islamophobic," or "antisemitic" tweets.[800]

Then in April 2022, Elon Musk—the richest man in the world at the time, made an official offer to buy Twitter for a shocking $44 billion dollars. And perhaps even more shocking—the board of directors approved the offer. But as soon as the wheels were in motion to get the legalities ironed out, the entire Liberal media machine completely freaked out over the thought of Musk, who had been clear about his support for free speech (and even saying he would reinstate Donald Trump's account), now loosening restrictions and restoring Twitter to its glory days.

The Washington Post denounced Musk's pending takeover, saying "we need regulation of social-media platforms to prevent rich people from controlling our channels of communication."[801] Of course rich people had controlled our channels of communication for nearly two decades. People like Mark Zuckerberg, and the executives at Twitter and YouTube.

What the Washington Post meant was they wanted the government to prevent Elon from allowing free speech—since he obviously had a very different philosophy about content moderation, and the mainstream media was scared to death that Conservatives may be able to leverage the platform to promote their agenda just like Liberals had been doing on Twitter since its inception.

Axios, a popular online outlet, said "The world's richest man—someone who used to be compared to Marvel's Iron Man—is increasingly behaving like a movie supervillain, commanding seemingly unlimited resources with which to finance his mischief-making."[802] Allowing discussions critical of transgenderism and not using the platform to artificially amplify Liberal agendas was unthinkable to these people.

MSNBC's Ari Melber complained that Elon might amplify right-wing content, and suppress Liberals—which is obviously the very manipulation tactics the platform had been doing under the leadership of Jack Dorsey and Parag Agrawal for years.[803]

CNN's David Zurawik, who is also a professor of Media Studies at Groucher College, said Elon Musk running Twitter would be "dangerous" and pushed for government regulation of "hate speech" like in Europe.

"You need regulation. You cannot let these guys control discourse in this country or we are headed to hell. We are there. Trump opened the gates of hell and now they're chasing us down."[804]

The Justice Department and the Securities and Exchange Commission launched a joint investigation into Elon Musk and his actions at Tesla.[805] Elon even became a victim of the MeToo movement, where women accuse rich and famous men of "sexual harassment" they say occurred many years earlier to essentially blackmail the men into paying them money to go away. A settlement Elon Musk had paid out from years earlier leaked to the media once he fell under the crosshairs of the Establishment for his plans to allow free speech on Twitter. Seven women would come to sue Elon for alleged "sexual harassment."[806]

Such lawsuits are common for celebrities even if they never did anything wrong because unscrupulous women figure they can get a decent settlement to make the problem go away and as counterintuitive as it may seem, it's often cheaper (and quicker) for the celebrities to pay out settlements than defend themselves in court.

Elon used to be a marvel of the world, but was now hated by half of the U.S. population who saw him as the man who would allow "Nazis" (like Donald Trump) to have Twitter accounts. And Elon would soon learn that he had dramatically underestimated the complexities of running a social media company, especially in the "woke" age of mass censorship. He never imagined the forces that would be unleashed trying to destroy him.

Elon Restores (Some) Banned Accounts

Soon after taking full ownership of the platform, Elon reinstated Donald Trump's account, although Trump had already launched his own social media platform Truth Social, so he hesitated to return to the platform because he was under obligation to Truth Social investors to use that platform exclusively for a set period of time.[807]

Jonathan Greenblatt, the head of the ADL, denounced Elon's decision as "dangerous and a threat to American democracy," and then insinuated that Twitter should be banned from the Internet, saying, "We need to ask—is it time for Twitter to go?"[808] And he wasn't just making idle threats. Efforts were underway hoping to ban Twitter from the App Stores.[809]

Elon also restored over 12,000 accounts which had been banned under false pretenses, including poplar Conservatives, who—while not being household names, had built up rather large followings on the platform.[810] He also started releasing internal communications showing top executives who had previously run the company having discussions about banning popular accounts including Donald Trump's, as well as discussions about censoring the Hunter Biden laptop story and other (accurate) tweets about COVID-19 related issues.[811]

Elon would later say, "To be totally frank, almost every conspiracy theory that people had about Twitter turned out to be true."[812] But despite restoring thousands of wrongfully banned accounts (including Donald Trump's) and loosening the terms of service and ending the partisan manipulation of the trending list, Elon's claims of being a "free speech absolutist" are false.[813]

When a user recommended he restore Alex Jones' account, he responded "No." And then later in the day doubled down saying "too bad" when someone else in the thread tweeted that bringing back Alex Jones should be the litmus test of him allowing free speech.[814]

When he was pressed even further about restoring Jones' account, Elon tweeted that he has "no mercy" for Jones because of his conspiracy theories surrounding the mass shooting at the Sandy Hook Elementary School.[815] Even though Jones' comments were insane, they weren't why he was banned from Twitter. He was banned for confronting CNN's Oliver Darcy in the halls of Congress in 2018 outside of a hearing about social media censorship which he live-streamed on Twitter through their Periscope app.[816] Twitter deemed it "harassment," but video of the interaction shows Jones was rather calm and wasn't even being disruptive.

Many thought perhaps Elon would change his mind in the future and allow Alex Jones back on because his policy decisions have been anything but consistent or principled, and he changes his mind more often than the way the wind blows. But a full year after taking over the platform, Alex Jones' ban remains.[817] Allowing him back on would be a PR nightmare, and even Jones has said he doesn't hold it against Elon because he's facing enough problems as it is.

But how is Twitter banning him from having an account any different than Verizon or AT&T not allowing him to have cell service because they don't like what he says? If he's not breaking the law by the things he posts (which he's clearly not) then why is he denied access to the basic communication tools available to everyone else?

He also never restored the accounts of Proud Boys founder Gavin McInnis and other high-profile controversial figures, including pro-White advocates like Jared Taylor, professor Kevin MacDonald,[818] and David Duke who all had Twitter accounts for years before eventually getting banned.[819] Nick Fuentes, a young controversial figure who built up a sizable dedicated fanbase of Conservative Zoomers (generation Z kids) had his Twitter account initially restored after Elon took over, but was permanently banned again within 24 hours after he said he loved Hitler during a Twitter Space, the group audio chat feature.[820]

While I'm certainly not defending his incendiary rhetoric nor his support for Hitler, it is interesting to note that Leftists are allowed to praise murderous communist dictators like Joseph Stalin, Mao Zedong, and Pol Pot. Many of them are quite open about their admiration of such figures and that never seems to be a violation of the terms of service. Nor is open support for communism (which killed more people than Nazism), and while posting swastikas is strictly forbidden (unless done so with condemnation or for editorial purposes), communist and Marxist groups like Antifa are allowed to post hammer and sickle flags and openly promote their ideology.

The Future of X

The future of Twitter (famously renamed X in July 2023) remains to be seen. Elon has made some great changes (restoring thousands of accounts and loosening many of the restrictions on what people are allowed to post), but he has also made some rash and dumb decisions—like selling verification checkmarks to any account that paid $8 a month without actually verifying the identity of the accounts, leading to a wave of impersonations (and hilarious parody accounts), causing him to pause the scheme less than 24 hours later and revert back to the standard procedure of actually confirming account holders' identities before issuing the blue check signifying they're "verified."[821]

He once announced a new policy banning all links to content on other social media platforms because he didn't want anyone driving traffic to a competitor, only to reverse his decision (again within 24 hours) upon realizing the backlash and mockery over the idea, since it would be absurd and contrary to the core principles of social media to prevent people from linking to a Facebook post or Instagram photo.[822]

Elon often doesn't take into account feedback of others, even concerns of executives in the company who have extensive knowledge and experience before making dramatic changes that anyone else could have foreseen would cause massive problems (like selling verification checkmarks to accounts without actually verifying them) because he relies so heavily on his own instincts and intuition. This management style is often a double-edged sword extremely successful people wield because while this strategy can often work, it also leads them to further discount the doubts and concerns of others, which can result in them stumbling into obvious pitfalls that they themselves are blind to.

He wants X to be the "everything app" or a super app, which enables voice and video calls and the ability to send payments to others just like Venmo and CashApp; and perhaps even incorporate brokerage accounts for people to trade stocks, and possibly even online marketplaces like Amazon and eBay.

But because of the immense opposition to Elon allowing so many once-banned users and topics (like "misgendering" trans people, which means using pronouns other than the ones they demand people refer to them as—something that was strictly forbidden under the previous ownership and is a violation of the terms of service on all the other Big Tech platforms), it may be difficult for him to sustain enough revenue sources to keep the app financially viable in the face of ongoing boycotts and attempts to sabotage him.

The platform experienced a massive revenue loss once Elon first took it over because many major advertisers fled out of fear it would now allow "hate speech," and "racism" would be allowed to flourish, mostly due to the Liberal media churning out a bunch of hit pieces and lying about what Elon's ownership would entail.

Then he tried to increase revenue through subscription services like Twitter Blue (now called X Premium) which gives users a verification checkmark and some other features like the ability to post longer tweets instead of the standard 280 characters, and edit them after they're posted. And despite Elon bringing aboard a new CEO from the advertising industry, Linda Yaccarino, the company continued to struggle financially.[823]

Hopefully he can maintain and grow the platform without further compromising on his support of free speech (remember, he already won't allow Alex Jones, professor Kevin MacDonald, Jared Taylor, and others to use it) and it's going to be impossible to keep everyone happy. Social media is no longer just a neat new technology for communication online. It's an information warfare tool used to drive news cycles and shape the culture, and Elon liberating it from the Big Tech oligarchs (despite his shortcomings) isn't going over very well with the powers that be.

The smears against him and the platform are relentless, with "journalists" and activist groups constantly searching for offensive or "hateful" posts and then framing stories as if "dangerous hate speech" is proliferating the entire ecosystem.

If he isn't able to make it profitable in the long term then X may end up back in the hands of another Silicon Valley social justice warrior like Mark Zuckerberg who will implement the same strict policies as usual, and go right back to using its power to shape public opinion and stifle debates in hopes of imposing their own values and agendas onto the world as they do on all the other mainstream platforms.

Coming After TV Stations

The Left weren't happy with the widespread censorship of certain topics and deplatforming of individuals from the virtual town squares of Twitter, Facebook, and YouTube, so they're trying to do more. Their agenda of stamping out influential opposition to the New World Order was working so well they decided to take things even further and hoped to get Fox News, Newsmax, and OAN taken off cable and satellite TV.

CNN's Oliver Darcy, the weasel-looking creature who worked as Brian Stelter's sidekick until he was fired in August 2022, helped amplify the idea. "Somehow, these companies have escaped scrutiny and entirely dodged this conversation. That should not be the case anymore," he said.[824]

He then put out a call to action, saying "it is time TV carriers face questions for lending their platforms to dishonest companies that profit off of disinformation and conspiracy theories. After all, it was the very lies that Fox, Newsmax, and OAN spread that helped prime President Trump's supporters into not believing the truth: that he lost an honest and fair election."[825]

The editor-in-chief of The Verge, an online outlet owned by Vox Media, had also called for Fox News to be taken off the air several years earlier, saying, "I feel like we should be just as comfortable asking Comcast and Verizon and Charter why they continue to offer Fox News on their networks as we are about Facebook and Alex Jones."[826] At the time, few had even thought of such an idea, or weren't so bold to try, but recently the calls to pull Fox News, Newsmax, and OAN from the air have been growing.

DirecTV would later drop OAN in April 2022, which accounted for 90% of their revenue through what are called carriage fees, which are payments cable and satellite providers pay to channels on their service because being on the system is an incentive for people to subscribe.[827] Their removal was celebrated by many on the Left, including NAACP President Derrick Johnson who called it "a victory for us and the future of democracy."[828] Eliminating the free press in America is a "victory" in his mind!

Compounding their problems was a lawsuit OAN faced after being sued for one billion dollars by the Dominion electronic voting machine company. Then a few months later Verizon dropped them from their TV service (called Fios) too.[829] Newsmax was dropped from DirecTV in January 2023 but later picked back up again two months later after they came to a new agreement, perhaps in part due to Republicans boycotting the company once they were dropped.

While only bringing in a small fraction of Fox News's audience at the time, Newsmax has grown into a formidable competitor to Fox and has been gaining former Fox News viewers who prefer Newsmax because programming tends to be further to the right. And after Tucker Carlson was fired without any reason being given, even more people left Fox for Newsmax.[830]

A woman named Gigi Sohn, who President Joe Biden nominated to be one of the five FCC Commissioners, had previously called Fox News "state propaganda" and suggested the Federal Communications Commission should pull the broadcast license for Sinclair media's television stations—a Conservative leaning company that owns and operates nearly 300 local news stations across America.[831]

Luckily after her hatred of Conservative media went viral, she withdrew her nomination (claiming she was the "victim of cruel attacks."[832] But the fact that such a Left-wing extremist would be nominated in the first place to sit as an FCC commissioner and oversee television and radio broadcast licenses is stunning.

Congresswoman Alexandria Ocasio-Cortez called on the FCC to pull Tucker Carlson off the air, claiming he "clearly incites violence," but she's so dumb she doesn't know that the Fox News channel isn't governed by the FCC, only over the air broadcast stations are (not cable). But Tucker Carlson was fired by Fox News just a few days later, which she celebrated on an Instagram livestream where she said "Deplatforming works," and used the event to fundraise.[833]

Pulling Fox News from cable systems and satellite TV providers will never happen, but it happened to OAN because they're too far to the right and their news and commentary is seen as more threatening to the Establishment's order. And it did happen to Newsmax, although they returned a few months later after the backlash, and the fact that Democrats have even proposed the idea of banning television stations is a shocking indication of just how un-American they are, and how far they're willing to go in hopes of silencing their opposition.

Banning Books

While Democrats claim Republicans are "banning books" because they don't want pornographic and pedophilic material in school libraries, they're actually the ones who have been working to censor books and ban them from even being sold to adults. But as you'll see, the brand name "free speech" activists will only ring the alarm when certain books are banned from Amazon (and Barnes & Noble) and stay fearfully silent when it happens to others.

In 2018 Amazon banned a children's book called No Dress for Timmy which is about a boy who refuses to go along with supporting gender-bending at his school, but that didn't make any major headlines and was only mentioned in a few small blogs.[834] This was back when most brand name Conservatives were still afraid to speak out against transgenderism and drag queen story hour, so only a few YouTubers (myself included) covered this story at the time.

As the years went on however, transgenderism became a major political and cultural issue, and once Conservatives realized the queers are coming for the children, then finally the stigma around aggressively opposing the trans agenda had ended.

In 2021 Amazon banned a book titled When Harry Became Sally which did generate major headlines and got the attention from numerous Republican members of Congress who denounced the censorship, prompting Amazon to break their silence about deleting the book's listing saying they would now ban any book that equated transgenderism or any LGBTQ "identity" with mental illness.[835]

In 2022 a recording of an Amazon Zoom meeting was leaked showing employees complaining about Matt Walsh's children's book Johnny The Walrus which is about a boy who decides he wants to be a walrus, mocking the gender-bending craze.[836] One of the employees on the call broke down into tears and said the book is causing "trauma" to transgender employees and pushed for it to be banned.[837]

Then during the company's LGBTQ Pride celebration that year several employees staged a "die-in" where they laid on the ground pretending to be dead to protest the sale of "transphobic" books like Johnny the Walrus and Irreversible Damage: The Transgender Craze Seducing Our Daughters by Abigail Shrier, which discusses rapid-onset gender dysphoria.[838] Surprisingly those titles have not been banned, at least at the time this book was published at the end of 2023.

And while the brand name activists on Twitter, hosts on Fox News and Newsmax, popular YouTubers "fighting the culture war," and members of Congress denounced Amazon banning When Harry Became Sally and the company's new policy forbidding certain anti-LGBTQ books, they all remain silent about other material Amazon (and Barnes & Noble) have banned. Professor emeritus Kevin MacDonald, a sociologist from California State University Long Beach, had his magnum opus Culture of Critique: An Evolutionary Analysis of Jewish Involvement in Twentieth-Century Intellectual and Political Movements banned in March 2019.[839] Another one of his books titled Cultural Insurrections: Essays on Western Civilization, Jewish Influence, and Anti-Semitism was banned at the same time.[840]

The books, as you can probably tell from their titles, cover a taboo topic, and despite being written by a California State University professor, they have been deemed "antisemitic" by the ADL, so both Amazon and Barnes & Noble quietly banned them. They don't just refuse to stock them —they are completely banned, and used copies aren't allowed to be listed by third parties either.[841]

They had been in stock and sold for years, but as cancel culture kept gaining momentum, the censorship of content shifted from social media platforms to podcasts, and then ultimately books. But zero mainstream Conservatives noticed or spoke out against professor MacDonald's books being banned out of fear that they would have been accused of supporting "antisemitism."

Jared Taylor's book White Identity: Racial Consciousness in the 21st Century was also banned from Amazon and Barnes & Noble in 2019.[842] Since 1994 he has held his American Renaissance conference ever other year (falsely labeled a "White supremacist" gathering by the media, the SPLC, and the ADL) where he and other speakers discuss some of the problems multicultural societies face and advocate that White people should demand the same rights and opportunities as other ethnic groups in the United States.[843]

Around this same time Amazon also quietly banned David Duke's autobiography My Awakening and his other book Jewish Supremacy, which details what he believes is a Jewish supremacist belief system at the core of Jewish culture.[844] It's extremely politically incorrect to accuse members of any ethnic group other than White people of believing they are superior to others. Admitting that Black supremacy exists is called "racist," but pointing out that many Jewish people believe in their own ethnic superiority is even worse—that's "antisemitism."

Theologian Martin Luther, who is responsible for the Protestant Reformation (he famously nailed his Ninety-five Theses to the door of the Catholic Church in 1517 challenging them on their authority), later wrote a book very critical of Jews as well, called On The Jews and Their Lies which has been in print ever since it was first published in 1543, and in stock on Amazon for years until around this same time when it too was banned after pressure from Jewish groups.[845]

Amazon also banned Jewish History, Jewish Religion: The Weight of Three Thousands Years (1994) written by Israel Shahak who is not only a Jew (or was, since he died in 2001), but he was also a Holocaust survivor who was kept at a concentration camp in Poland, and after World War II moved to Israel where he later became an organic chemistry professor at Hebrew University in Jerusalem.[846] Despite being Jewish (and a citizen of Israel) he was very critical of the human rights violations against the Palestinians, Zionism, ethnocentrism in Judaism, and Jewish supremacists.[847]

The foreword to the first edition was written by Gore Vidal and the book was endorsed by Noam Chomsky, Edward Said, and other popular human rights activists.[848] So nobody can lump him in with David Duke and other supposed "White nationalists." But Israel Shahak's book has also been deemed "antisemitic" so it was quietly deleted from Amazon after being listed for over two decades.[849]

Anyone can order books critical of Christianity, Catholicism, Mormonism, the Jehovah Witness cult (not to mention White people and whiteness) but certain books a little too critical of Jews, Judaism, or Jewish involvement in political movements and ones that focus on "Jewish bankers" have quietly vanished.[850]

But again, none of the "free speech culture warriors" like Ben Shapiro, Charlie Kirk, Glenn Greenwald, or even Tucker Carlson denounced the censorship of these books. The brand name Conservative Twitter personalities and YouTubers who host shows funded or produced by Turning Point USA, The Blaze, The Daily Wire, and PragerU were all silent as well.

All books promoting White nationalism and the Alt-Right have also been banned, including The White Nationalist Manifesto, New Right vs. Old Right, and The Alternative Right by Greg Johnson which documents the rise and fall of the movement.[851] (All purged in February 2019.)[852] Another popular one in the genre called A Fair Hearing: The Alt-Right in the Words of Its Members and Leaders was also banned from both Amazon and Barnes & Noble.[853]

None of these books call for any violence or even suggest it, but because they're essentially pro-White, they've been deemed "White supremacist" material, and the publishers are now forbidden from listing them for sale on the two biggest bookseller websites in the world.

Black nationalist books however, are allowed, with several exceptions published by the Nation of Islam which were removed—not for antiwhiteism, but for "antisemitism."[854] Amazon certainly wouldn't ban Malcom X's autobiography, even though he was a Black nationalist and called for racial separatism and wanted to create a Black-only region of the United States.[855] Countless books by Black Lives Matter activists and other "Black Power" advocates argue for Black-only spaces and support racial segregation so they don't have to deal with any White people anymore—and that's just fine.

Activist groups are even targeting other, lesser known online book retailers like ThriftBooks.com, BooksAMillion.com and BetterWorldBooks.com, as well as eBay, pressuring them to ban the sale of used copies of such books.[856] To be clear, I'm not endorsing these books, the Alt-Right, or the idea of creating a White ethnostate, which is just a nostalgic pipe dream—an impossible endeavor and a fantasy held on to by those who wish to return to an era that has long since past. Anyone who believes such a thing is even remotely possible at this point in civilization is either just dreaming or delusional.

But why shouldn't people be able to read what such authors have to say? Especially since they're not calling for any kind of violence at all, and in fact specifically condemn it, arguing it would only reflect negatively on those who hold their views and ostracize others from listening to them. Most are just expressing their view as White people who are increasingly becoming marginalized and demonized simply for existing, and don't want any kind of violent conflicts at all. And you have to admit it's odd that Amazon sells literal bomb-making manuals like the Anarchist Cookbook (and Adolf Hitler's Mein Kampf) but won't allow the sale of David Duke's autobiography or Jared Taylor's book because they talk about White Identity.

In 2015, I posted a video on my YouTube channel showing me approaching random people on a southern California boardwalk and asking them if they would sign a petition demanding Amazon.com and Barnes & Noble both stop selling the Bible because it promotes "homophobia" and is too "offensive." Many gladly did.[857] I repeated the same experiment again over five years later with the same results.[858]

You may have seen the videos, but the analytics show that only about 15% of subscribers to a YouTube channel watch any given video that's uploaded, so I mention them here because I think it's critically important to understand just how normalized the idea of banning books has become among the Left, to the point that many of them are willing to go along with banning the Bible!

First Amendment Doesn’t Apply

A detailed discussion of censorship on social media would fill hundreds of pages, and I documented the history of it in my previous books The Liberal Media Industrial Complex and The True Story of Fake News which you should read if you haven’t already because it’s important to be familiar with the different phases the platforms have gone through—and how much they have changed, and why.

When the censorship first started it was “only” social media personalities who weren’t household names but who had amassed followings of hundreds of thousands of people that were getting suspended and banned. Little to no news articles were written about them when it happened. No Republican members of Congress tweeted about them. They weren’t invited on Fox News for a segment to talk about it. Only others in their online community seemed to notice or care.

Those of us who saw the writing on the wall did our best to ring the alarm bell about the growing problem, but it really wasn’t until the Hunter Biden laptop story was blocked on social media (and The New York Post suspended from Twitter) that censorship became a major concern for the Republican Party.

Because the First Amendment only protects free speech from being censored by the government and not corporations which control telecommunication technologies and social media platforms, people have little recourse and are held over a barrel by the selectively enforced “terms of service” and the whims of faceless moderators who can ban anyone they want for any reason.

Seeing the problem early on, however, were numerous entrepreneurs who staunchly support free speech so they worked to create platforms by basically cloning the features of Facebook, Twitter, and YouTube but applying the type of content moderation policies that the Big Tech platforms used to have before they started massively restricting what people are allowed to post.

And while Rumble, Odysee, BitChute, Gab, Gettr, Truth Social, MeWe, Telegram, and others haven't gained the widespread user bases of the Big Tech platforms, millions of people use them, and they are invaluable tools for free speech despite how "niche" they may be.

The Washington Post wrote an entire article complaining about Congresswoman Marjorie Taylor Greene's reach on the alt-tech platforms after her personal account was banned from Twitter in early 2022 for "repeated violations" of their COVID "misinformation" policy. The Post was stunned that she continued to reach hundreds of thousands of people.[859] Her Twitter account was among those later restored by Elon Musk, but that's beside the point. Facebook, YouTube, and Instagram continue to severely restrict what users can say, and who can even use their platforms.

And Rumble will likely cave to the demands of the app stores regarding banning certain individuals and content, but as we've seen with Amazon banning various controversial books, the brand name Conservatives will likely say nothing about it and go on pretending it's a "free speech" platform because they can make fun of transgender people.[860] Those who touch certain third rail issues about things like White Identitarianism or Jewish power will never have their free speech rights defended by any Conservative Inc. pundits.

It's possible that we can shift the culture enough to cause the pendulum to start swinging back the other direction and get the Big Tech platforms to ease up on their censorship (at least regarding some issues). But it's likely they'll get even more strict and more manipulative, especially as our society becomes more polarized with each side digging in to their positions and difficult issues regarding race and transgenderism dominating the political landscape.

If they continue with the current trend, the so-called alt-tech platforms are only going to gain more users which may cause Leftists to look for their vulnerabilities, trying to get them banned from the app stores (like they already did with Gab and BitChute). Activist organizations have even gone after hosting services trying to get the websites banned too, as well as payment processors, and even banks (issues that Gab has been facing for years).[861]

They may never stop scheming, and for many years now the Left has wanted to criminalize "hate speech" in America, just like other supposed "free" countries around the world have—including Canada,[862] Germany,[863] England,[864] Scotland,[865] and others. These countries arrest people for posting "hate speech" on social media. Not death threats or harassment (which any reasonable person can agree should be illegal, and is), but things like insulting gay people, or being too critical of the Islamization of Europe from all the Muslim refugees that have flooded the West, or for posts deemed "antisemitic" (anti-Christian hate speech is always allowed though).[866]

To list the cases of people arrested for such "violations" (which include jokes) would be too long, but America should be aware that such things are happening in other western countries, and it should serve as a warning of what could happen here. There's a reason the freedom of speech is protected by the First Amendment—because it's the most important right we have, and it must be protected at all costs.

Cowardly Conservatives

Starting shortly after the turn of the 21st century most Republican members of Congress and mainstream Conservative pundits became cowards when dealing with social issues. They suddenly became afraid of being called "homophobic" for denouncing the widespread sexual perversions which are now commonplace in society, and almost as afraid to be called a "racist" for pointing out the Black Crime problem in America or denouncing antiwhiteism.

As our culture continued to rapidly decay with brazen degeneracy being thrust into the mainstream by Leftists in Hollywood and boosted by the Big Tech social media platforms, most Conservative "leaders" stayed silent, continuously self-censoring themselves hoping to avoid any backlash from the Liberal Media Industrial Complex.

Instead, all they talked about were "tax cuts for the middle class" and how they were trying to prevent jobs from being outsourced to foreign countries; and while those are great policies, their focus came at a tremendous cost to the culture which is just as important, if not more so than economics and the job market. People can usually find a new job and get by with less if they have to cut their budget, but once the culture becomes polluted, it's like a poisoned well, and anyone who drinks from it is in danger of getting sick or dying.

But after two decades of quietly watching from the sidelines as the poison was poured in, the sleeping giant of "reactionaries" finally awakened. The Left had pushed too many people too far. Although time will tell whether or not the awakening was too late. Despite Republican "firebrands" like Matt Gaetz, Marjorie Taylor Greene, and Lauren Boebert getting involved in the culture war (to some extent, at least), most politicians and political commentators are still only doing so half-heartedly and walking on eggshells hoping to avoid being labeled "far right," "homophobic," "White nationalist," and the other list of labels the Left usually tries to stick on their enemies.

One of the problems that led the Republican Establishment to become so cowardly is they morphed into a Big Tent Party, meaning one that attempts to attract as wide range of groups and voters as possible under one banner, but that means not taking a firm stance on certain issues because being “too Conservative” may scare some new people away who the party is trying to attract. “Too Conservative,” meaning still supporting various issues that were core values in the Republican Party in previous generations but ones they’ve slowly backed away from as society has gotten more tolerant of liberalism.

So they water down their message, hoping to gain the support of first-time voters and that of moderates, independents, and some disaffected Democrats while taking for granted those who have usually supported them in the past.

The brand name Republicans, “Conservative Inc.,” or the “Corporate Conservatives”—whatever name you want to attach to the Republican Establishment and their mouth pieces, have increased the size of the tent for “conservatism” so big that it became a circus. And because the Republican Party has become dramatically more socially Liberal over the last twenty years, there’s a saying among real Conservatives (Paleoconservatives) that the only difference between Liberals and mainstream Conservatives is ten years.

The Republican Establishment functions as a political ratchet, meaning they allow the Democrats to keep moving society slowly to the left while putting up some resistance trying to stop it, but they rarely (if ever) turn things back to the right.

Similarly, the political commentators who work for the brand name outlets (or are trying to build up their followers on social media in hopes of one day joining them) usually function as a false opposition and pretend to be antiestablishment by criticizing a few common points of contention people often have about Congress or the media in general trying to create the impression that they’re not part of the club, while either toeing the party line on every other issue or carefully avoiding going against others that are clearly core Establishment positions.[867]

Pandering To Blacks

There's an old joke about Republicans that goes: What do you call the one Black guy at a Republican conference?—The keynote speaker! Just like Republicans now pander to the gay community and go out of their way trying to show that they're not "homophobic" hoping to gain the support of what is just a tiny fraction of the electorate, they also pander to Black people and shamelessly try to prove that they're not "racist," playing the same game Democrats have been engaged in for decades.

Our party has great Black people like Larry Elder, David Webb, Ben Carson, Tim Scott, Byron Donalds, Candace Owens, and others, so there's no need to pander to them in hopes of showing how "diverse" the Republican Party is. If they like our ideas and our values, they'll vote Republican. There shouldn't be a focus on what the Republican Party can do "for Black people."

Older Black people tend to be socially Conservative because of their history with the church, but have historically voted Democrat for economic reasons because Democrats appeal to lower income voters through promises of social welfare programs. But seeing the Democrat Party embracing all kinds of LGBTQ nonsense should be enough to bring many of them over to the Republican side because Black people overwhelmingly do not support gay "marriage" or transgenderism. They also don't want their jobs taken by illegal aliens.

Pandering to Blacks by offering them more social welfare programs in their communities is only going to keep moving the Republican platform further to the left while marginalizing more White voters.

And sadly even Donald Trump pandered to Blacks with his "criminal justice reform" (the First Step Act) hoping to gain another few percentage of Black voters by virtue signaling that he was letting Black criminals out of prison early.[868] During his rallies the organizers strategically put people with "Blacks for Trump" shirts prominently in the background right behind him to signal to other Black people watching at home hoping to gain their support.

Republicans even chose a token Black man named Michael Steele to be the chairman of the Republican National Committee, who later betrayed the party, joining the anti-Trump Lincoln Project and became an MSNBC contributor where he criticizes everything Republicans do. Of course he didn't vote for Donald Trump in 2016 and endorsed Joe Biden in 2020, and wants Donald Trump to go to prison.

You get what you pay for, as the saying goes. If you buy something cheap, it's usually going to break after a short period of time and need to be replaced, costing more in the long run. And if you hire a token Black person trying to show how "inclusive" you are instead of hiring whoever is best qualified for the job, regardless of their race, it's always going to backfire. The Republican Party's first major affirmative action hire, Michael Steele, went from a top leadership position to a Democrat operative in the span of just a few years. Such disastrous outcomes could easily be avoided by not even playing the diversity game.

CPAC, the biggest Conservative event in the political world, sucked up to a rapper named Young Pharaoh one year because they thought it would be cool to have a rapper on the stage in hopes of attracting more Black people to the Republican Party, but right before the event, CPAC canceled his appearance because some of his past "antisemitic" comments resurfaced.[869] And the one thing the Republican Party won't tolerate is criticism of Israel or Jews, so he was canceled. Like I said, affirmative action hires always end up being a disaster.

“Conservatives” Catering to Gays

The Republican Party is now more pro-gay than the Democrat Party was just over 10 years ago.[870] Even Barack Obama and Joe Biden opposed gay “marriage” until mid 2012.[871] Although when Obama was first running for president in 2008, he and his running mate Joe Biden opposed it, but once elected they both “evolved” their position and fully endorsed it, as did the entire Democrat Party. But back then nearly every Republican was firmly against it.[872] Today however, there are probably less than a half dozen Republican members of Congress who oppose it. And instead, the Republican Party has climbed aboard the gay Pride bandwagon.

Ronna McDaniel, chairwoman of the RNC, tweeted out a “Happy Pride Month” message in June 2021, adding that the GOP is proud to have “doubled our LGBTQ support over the last four years, and we will continue to grow our big tent.”[873] Fox News even started celebrating LGBTQ Pride Month in 2022 with at least nine segments that June featuring the “achievements” of queer people and highlighting how great “gay culture” is.[874]

“Meet important voices of the LGBTQ+ community. And go inside their incredible contributions,” one of the promos announced.[875] One of the stories was presented by Dana Perino who began the segment saying, “Pride Month continues as we highlight the story of Ryland Whittington whose journey of transitioning at age five has been seen by seven million people in a family YouTube video.”[876]

She went on to say the family hopes their experience can help convince others to support the idea of sex changes for children.[877] Fox News also highlighted a lesbian priest in the Episcopal church[878] and commemorated the first gay major league baseball player, Glenn Burke, who came out as gay back in the 1970s (and later died of AIDS).[879] What a surprise.

Fox News also hired Caitlyn Jenner in March 2022 as a contributor who appears on Sean Hannity's show and others to comment on issues that usually have nothing to do with transgender people at all.[880] At the time neither CNN or MSNBC had any transgender contributors on salary, so Fox News was the pioneer.

Richard Grenell was the first openly gay man to serve in a cabinet position after Donald Trump appointed him to the Director of National Intelligence. And practically every time his name was mentioned by Establishment Republicans as a "great" choice for the position, it was followed by them happily highlighting "he's gay" as a virtue signal about how "diverse" and "inclusive" the Republican Party was becoming.

What did his sexual orientation have to do with his ability to be an intelligence analyst and brief the President of the United States about national security matters? His personal life should have been no more of concern than someone who's divorced, or a bachelor—or a guy who prefers to date blondes. But Republican pundits on TV couldn't be happier talking about how great it was that he's the first gay person appointed to a cabinet position by either political party (Pete Buttigieg would later be the second).

And what did Richard Grenell do for conservatism in America? He led the effort to encourage President Trump to call for the "decriminalization of homosexuality" throughout the world because various countries in Africa, the Middle East, and the Caribbean (68 total in the world) still criminalize LGBT conduct and propaganda.[881] Of all the issues facing our country and the world, that was Richard Grenell's top priority.

Charlie Kirk, founder of the Republican college club Turning Point USA and one of the most prominent voices in the Conservative movement, has been a pied piper leading the next generation of Conservatives to accept gay "marriage" and even gay men adopting children as normal.

During an interview in 2018 with YouTuber Dave Rubin, Conservative Inc.'s token gay friend, he said "I think it's cool you're married. It's great. And you should have all the same tax benefits [as heterosexual couples], adopt children, it's great."[882] Many so-called Conservatives hold this position now, but what they fail to acknowledge is when children become involved it's not about what two consenting adults are doing in the privacy of their own bedroom anymore, it's about what they're subjecting innocent children to, and what kind of an environment they're forcing them to live in.

Charlie Kirk has also welcomed drag queens into the Republican Party, posing with one in a photo at PolitiCon in 2019 who goes by the name "Lady MAGA," a Trump-supporting drag queen, who in a normal society would have been kicked out of the event immediately, not having Charlie Kirk pose for a picture with him while smiling and giving a thumbs up.[883] We don't need any "drag queens for Trump" trying to show how queer-friendly the Republican Party is. They're the kind of people who are ruining our party.

During an event in 2019 called Culture War that Turning Point USA sponsored, an attendee asked Charlie Kirk how anal sex helps the culture war, referring to Turning Point hiring a token Black gay guy—Rob Smith (who was on stage with him at the time) and denounced Charlie's palling around with queers in attempts to paint the Republican Party as not being anti-gay. Kirk then said the question was "weird" and insinuated the guy who asked it is a closeted gay himself and struggling with his sexuality.[884]

Rob Smith echoed this attack saying, "You seem to be really interested in gay sex…I'm pretty sure if you're into that, you can go find somebody to do that with."[885] This is the same tactic gays have always used whenever someone expresses disgust with them, which if you follow their logic would mean anyone who is opposed to pedophiles is secretly a pedophile, or anyone who doesn't want to hear about their parents' sex lives is actually turned on by it.

Charlie Kirk also claims to be a Christian, yet has done more to normalize homosexuality in the Conservative movement than perhaps anyone else. The unofficial Republican Party stance is now that gays—and gay "marriage," and gay adoption, and gays buying children through surrogacy, and them serving in the military is just fine, and they only draw the line at transgenderism for children and transgenders competing in women's sports.

The Conservative Political Action Conference (CPAC) chairman Matt Schlapp was asked during an interview with a Catholic news organization called Church Militant if gay men should be allowed to adopt children, and he was so caught off guard he could barely speak. "Yes or no. Should gay men be allowed to adopt young boys?" asked the host Michael Voris. Matt Schlapp responded, "Oh boy, ya know…I don't…I don't even know what… what…does our Church fight those positions? And does the, I don't know, the, what the policy position is of the Church and…"[886]

The host cuts him off, “Well, the teaching of the Church is that two men shouldn’t be together to begin with.” Matt Schlapp responds “Yeah, I know what the Church teaches in terms of sexual ethics. But I don’t know what it teaches, in terms, I don’t know what it lobbies for in these legislative chambers. I would say this: Obviously, um, it is, ah, we’ve gotten to this position where we’ve gotten away from this idea that having a father and a mother is awfully important.”[887]

A weak and pathetic answer from one of the most prominent “Conservatives” in America today. Less than a decade earlier such a response would end a Conservative’s career, but the Republican Party has moved so far left that they now tacitly support such abominations and are scared to death to oppose them in the extremely rare case someone even asks them about these issues anymore.

When Dave Rubin announced he and his “husband” bought two babies from surrogates after obtaining eggs from a fertility clinic and having them artificially inseminated (one with each of their sperm), they were congratulated by many of the top brand names in the “Conservative” movement including PragerU, the prestigious Conservative institution,[888] along with The Blaze, Glenn Beck’s media company,[889] Breitbart’s senior editor-at-large Joel Pollak,[890] critical race theory “expert” Christopher Rufo,[891] Megyn Kelly,[892] Megan McCain,[893] Kat Timpf (who works on Greg Gutfeld’s Fox News show),[894] and many others.

Imagine growing up as a child being raised by two gay men, and when you’re old enough to start learning about where babies come from and ask them where your mom is, they tell you they don’t know—and you’ll never know because egg donors are completely private so those who purchase the eggs will never know, and not even the children themselves will know. That’s what brand name Conservatives are now celebrating.[895]

Newsmax host Greg Kelly makes it clear in no uncertain terms that the U.S. military should go back to the old “Don’t Ask, Don’t Tell” policy basically forbidding gays from being allowed in the military at all because normal people don’t want to get stuck in a unit with one (a Democrat policy, by the way, put in place by Bill Clinton in 1993).[896] But have any Fox News hosts made such a seemingly bold statement?

Have any Republican members of Congress said anything in opposition to Obama allowing gays into the military in the last ten years (or mentioned the disturbing number of rapes they're committing)? Have any of them dared to oppose gay men adopting children? Or buying eggs from fertility clinics and renting surrogates who they have artificially inseminated, condemning the children to a life of never knowing who their mother is, and then further condemning the children to be raised by two men as their own narcissistic science project? Of course not. They're all lukewarm cowards. They all accept it as normal.

Which begs the question, how much of the Republican base has abandoned the party and doesn't even vote anymore because they're sick of it basically just trailing the Democrat agenda by ten years? How many people got so fed up with the Republican Party steadily moving to the left that they've thrown up their hands and no longer support them out of frustration because they don't feel they represent their interests and values anymore?

Neocons vs. Paleoconservatives

Few Conservatives today know that there are actually two basic kinds of conservatives, and the movement (along with the Republican Party) split into two different factions beginning back in the 1960s, resulting in the Neocons (Neo-conservatives or new Conservatives) taking control. Neocons are similar to RINOs (Republican in name only) but are particularly interested in foreign policy and are known for being war hawks who use the military industrial complex to intervene in the affairs of foreign countries to further the New World Order. They are globalists as opposed to nationalists, although they portray themselves as patriotic by flexing America's military power.

Paleoconservatives, on the other hand, are true Conservatives. They're the traditionalist Americans who tend to be Christian, oppose open borders and the LGBTQ agenda, and have a strong sense of national pride. Instead of being concerned with nation building in foreign countries, they prefer a more isolationist foreign policy and focus on localism. In other words, they don't support wars in the Middle East (like the War in Iraq), not just because they're almost always started by lies, but because they don't want the United States sticking its nose in other countries' business.

There are some other nuanced differences as well, such as Paleoconservatives tend to oppose free trade which they see as harming America's manufacturing sector by allowing cheap goods to be imported from foreign countries without making them pay tariffs, and instead support what's called trade protectionism.

The term paleo means older or ancient, just like the paleo diet refers to a diet humans are believed to have eaten during the Paleolithic Era (a long time ago), and is used to differentiate traditionalist or classical Conservatives from the new (or neo) Conservatives—the Neocons.[897] Ben Shapiro, for example, is a staunch Neocon who supported legalizing gay "marriage." He tries downplaying that position to Conservative audiences by saying he wouldn't personally attend a gay "wedding," but he does support it as an institution.

In response to someone who claimed he didn't, he answered "I've been libertarian on same-sex marriage for years, before Obergefell. But you couldn't be bothered to Google," referring to the 2015 Supreme Court case which ultimately legalized it.[898] Shapiro, like all Neocons, would also support any Middle Eastern war or military action that would either directly or indirectly protect Israel.

The Neocons were the ones who concocted the weapons of mass destruction hoax and the lie that Saddam Hussein had a relationship with al-Qaeda to dupe the American people (and the rest of the world) into going along with the invasion of Iraq in 2003 to carry out their Project for the New American Century. Three years earlier, the PNAC Neocon think tank had lamented their plan would be difficult "absent some catastrophic and catalyzing event—like a new Pearl Harbor."[899] The 9/11 attacks were their "New Pearl Harbor," and two years into the War on Terror the aim shifted from Afghanistan, where Osama Bin Laden was supposedly hiding out, to Iraq.

And contrary to popular belief, this wasn't just to "steal" their oil or preserve the petrodollar.[900] One of the main reasons was to protect Israel, "America's greatest ally,"[901] but you're not supposed to say this out loud though or post it on social media.[902] That's another "antisemitic trope" they say, so be careful.

In 1981 Israel bombed a nuclear reactor in Iraq out of concerns that the country would become a nuclear power and pose a danger to them since Iraq was allied with other Arab countries in the region during the Six-Day War (or the Third Arab-Israeli War) in 1967 which broke out as a result of ongoing hostilities between Israel and their Arab neighbors ever since the U.N. mandate in 1948 officially creating the State of Israel (which resulted in kicking 700,000 Palestinians out of their homes, an event known as the Palestinian expulsion).[903]

The Israeli-Palestine conflict is far beyond the scope of this book, but basically Israel remains concerned about its Arab neighbors, and Iraq was still considered a prime threat to them because of the possibility that they may acquire nuclear weapons in the future. So when George W. Bush was beating the war drums and saying Iraq posed a threat to the United States (which it didn't) and "our allies," he was talking about Israel.[904]

This is why Republicans like Mark Levin and others consider any talk about Neocons to be "antisemitic" and deem the word itself to be essentially an "antisemitic slur" because they want to protect Israel from the perception of having any influence over American foreign policy, despite AIPAC [the American Israel Public Affairs Committee]—a Jewish lobbying group that advocates for pro-Israeli policies, spending over $50 million dollars a year to do just that.[905]

And while publicly the standard political line from both Democrats and Republicans is that Israel is "America's greatest ally," privately—as the classified NSA documents leaked by Edward Snowden show, the country is considered a top espionage threat because of their "intelligence collection operations and manipulation/influence operations against the U.S. government, military, science & technology and Intelligence Community."[906]

Also, Al-Qaeda attacked the United States on 9/11, not because they "hate our freedom" as the Operation Mockingbird assets all sung in concert, but because of our financial and military backing of Israel which angers many Muslims around the world who side with the Palestinians in the ongoing territorial disputes in the region.[907] Inside job / false flag theories aside, this was still the case. One of the most prominent "conspiracy theories" of what happened is the LIHOP hypothesis, the "let it happen on purpose" theory, which doesn't negate Al-Qaeda's hatred for America or their involvement in planning and carrying out the attacks on 9/11 (even if they were aided and directed by the CIA or other intelligence agencies).

Years later when Congressman Ron Paul said that the attacks were "blowback for decades of US intervention in the Middle East" he was attacked for "blaming America," but the intelligence agencies and foreign policy experts all know the truth.[908]

This is why the Iranian government (and Muslim terrorist organizations like Al-Qaeda, ISIS, Hamas, etc.) call America the "Great Satan," and sometimes chant "Death to America."[909] No matter what side of the argument you're on (if any) regarding U.S. support for Israel, Zionism is explicitly a central part of Neoconservatism.[910]

Few people make the distinction anymore between Neocons and Paleoconservatives because the Neocons want to portray conservatism as if their kind of conservatism is the only kind, and try to frame Paleoconservatism (without using that term so people don't start looking into the Paleo/Neocon split) as an ancient relic like the idea of women being virgins on their wedding night—a political belief system that's no longer practical in our modern age.

William F. Buckley and his publication The National Review made it their goal to purge the Paleoconservatives from the Republican Party in the 1960s.[911] One of their prime targets was the John Birch Society which was formed in the late 1950s to oppose communism, but their hard stance against globalists, and globalist organizations like the United Nations, the Council on Foreign Relations, and the Bilderberg Group was seen as a hindrance to the New World Order, so the Neocons strategically worked to exile them.

The remaining Paloeconservatives who survived William F. Buckley's purge in the 1960s were mostly pushed out of mainstream Republican politics in the early 1980s as the rift continued to grow. These were people such as Pat Buchanan, Paul Gottfried, Joseph Sobran, Samuel Francis, Russell Kirk, as well as organizations like the Rockford Institute and the Philadelphia Society.[912]

The John Birch Society is still in existence today, though just a shell of its former self, and hasn't had any significant power since the 1970s. So for decades the Neocons have been the ones steering much of the Republican Party until Donald Trump came on the scene igniting a populist movement and shaking the political establishment to its core, resulting in the all-out war to impeach and imprison him.

Although the term is rarely used to describe the MAGA movement, much of it is paleoconservative. And while there are now countless "Conservative" media outlets, few make any distinctions about just what type of conservatism they promote. There are some exceptions however, including Taki's magazine, The New American (published by the John Birch Society), The American Conservative, Chronicles: A Magazine of American Culture, the Intercollegiate Review, and a few others.

There are also some organizations dedicated to the philosophy, such as the Charlemagne Institute (the publisher of Chronicles magazine), VDARE, the Family Research Council, the American Family Association, the Conservative Caucus, as well as the Constitution Party, the American Independent Party, and Gun Owners of America (a pro-2nd Amendment group that positions themselves further to the right than the NRA).

As mainstream conservatism in America continues to drift to the left we’ll likely see a resurgence of paleoconservatism (even if it doesn’t overtly use the term) as millions of Christians and Conservatives become activated and work to turn things back to the right, rejecting not just liberalism, but neoconservatism as well.

Politics as a Grift

There's a saying that every social cause starts off as a movement—then becomes a business, and then later turns into a grift (or swindle).[913] Not that long ago—in the 1990s, the Republican Party would have shunned many of the stars in "Conservative" media today. And any Republican that was afraid to take a Conservative stand on various issues (or adopted the same stance as the Democrats) would have been voted out of office.

If they started sucking up to resentful Black people who will forever hold a chip on their shoulder against Whites because of slavery 150 years ago, they would have been mocked for their pathetic pandering like Democrats. If Jews started complaining about Christmas celebrations at schools or the office, they would have been completely ignored, ridiculed, or told maybe they should move to Israel then. But today even most Christians are weak. And our weakness has only allowed our opponents to get stronger.

The moral, intellectual, and economic decay in the United States may be impossible to stop, let alone reverse, so sadly we may continue to see mainstream Republicans desperately clinging to power by adopting more positions held by Democrats. More social welfare programs for minorities, further embracing gays and transgenders; maybe even a universal basic income for those who are too lazy to hold down a job or maintain a career. At this point what has the mainstream Conservative movement even conserved?

I guess in their defense, the general population may have been slowly pushed so far left through cultural marxist Hollywood propaganda, social media molding their minds, and being raised in broken homes by single parents who were raised in a broken homes, and so on—the only way to hold onto any semblance of power on a national level may be to move left to the point where the Democrat Party used to stand as recent as the Obama administration, since Democrats have moved so far left they are literally marxists in comparison.

This problem brings us back to the Breitbart Doctrine, the idea popularized by Andrew Breitbart that politics is downstream from culture, meaning in order for political change (such as new bills to be passed into law) first the culture has to change, and people's sensibilities and tolerance for certain ideas or behaviors have to be primed to accept (or demand) them.

If there is any hope in saving America it starts in the home. It starts with building strong loving families which can then form into quality communities, which can extend into strong states, which can hopefully then come together into a strong country. But even if this is a pipe dream or a fool's errand, despite what happens to our own city, state, or country as whole, we can and must maintain our social circle of family and friends and still find joy and comfort from the simple things in life, no matter what we see on the news, social media, or coming out of Washington D.C.

Author's Note: Please take a moment to rate and review this book on Amazon.com or wherever you purchased it from to let others know what you think. This also helps to offset the trolls who keep giving my books fake one-star reviews when they haven't even read them. Almost all of the one-star reviews on my books are from NON-verified purchases which is a clear indication they are fraudulent, hence me adding this note.

These fraudulent ratings and reviews could also be part of a larger campaign trying to stop my message from spreading by attempting to tarnish my research through fake and defamatory reviews, so I really need your help to combat this as soon as possible.

Thank you!

Conclusion

Conservatives are traditionalists who realize that just because something is new, doesn't mean it's better. And when people rush into something new or try to reinvent the wheel, they often fall victim to the law of unintended consequences. Like when incandescent light bulbs were replaced by more energy efficient LED bulbs to help save electricity and reduce carbon emissions.

But in areas with a cold climate like Minnesota and New York, the snow can easily collect on the traffic lights, and since LED lights don't give off a lot of heat like the old incandescent ones, the snow doesn't melt—sometimes completely obscuring the lights at intersections and causing massive traffic problems.[914]

You've likely experienced updating your phone or computer's operating system to the "newest" and "best" software only to soon find major glitches that the developers overlooked which need to be fixed with another update they have to frantically release.[915] The same kinds of chaos occurs when Liberals try to overturn the natural social order and norms that the human race has been following since the beginning of time.

Marxists despise these practices because they despise everything normal. They're bitter and spiteful people who want to ruin others' fun because they themselves aren't having any. Like the fat girl at school who hates the lead cheerleader just because she's pretty and popular. Or someone who keys the paint of a nice car they see parked on the street because they're envious of the owner.

They're like the three-pack a day smoker coughing and wheezing from walking up a flight of stairs who then throw a fit when they're told that if they quit smoking it would really help. Liberals are in denial about their dysfunctional beliefs and behavior, and no matter how polite or well-intended criticism or advice is, they just get angry when people resist going along with them. But their problems aren't just affecting themselves. They're making society dysfunctional from their insistence that everyone else accept and celebrate their mental illnesses, perversions, laziness, and spitefulness.

And people who aren't afflicted with such disorders often cater to those who are in order to win over their political support to feed their appetites for power. They're gullible and easy to manipulate, so Democrats cater to dumb and lazy people since the party has shifted from once supporting the working class to supporting those who don't want to work and are just looking for handouts. The sheer number of people who don't have the dedication to go to work every day is scary.

And through social media they can easily connect with each other and organize online mobs—and form them in the real world as well. It's how communism took over China and other countries. The violent mobs organized and eventually became too powerful to resist. So we have to stop them here before it's too late.

But because of their viciousness they've already scared many people into silence. Widespread cowardice on our side earlier when they were weaker is what got us here, and allowed the Left to transform much of the United States into an almost unrecognizable dystopia.

Many old Conservatives championed small government and were afraid to use its power for our own purposes because they wanted to stay "principled" by not using the levers of government at all, and instead took a laissez faire approach. And it's been a losing strategy when facing an opponent who uses every possible means to win while Conservatives sit on the sidelines and say "they're being hypocrites" or "hey, that's not fair."

Conservatives' mantra about supporting "limited government" has been nothing but an embarrassing failure as a political strategy. It's time to use the existing power structure to achieve our goals for a change and to punish our enemies. Shrinking the size of government is a pipe dream. So we might as well use it to our advantage.

Conservatives and Christians have been far too timid for far too long. It's time to start giving the Left a taste of their own medicine and playing by some of their rules. Barraging businesses that go woke by flooding their social media feeds with negative comments and memes mocking them isn't enough. Boycotting woke companies isn't enough either. While that may cost them some loss of revenue, many won't even notice or care. You have to tell the store clerks that what the company is doing is pathetic (or perverted). You have to make the employees feel uncomfortable—even miserable.

If they can’t even get through a shift without being told off by a dozen customers every single day, they’re going to complain to their managers, and the managers are going to report to the corporate office that selling woke products or promoting anti-White “diversity” initiatives or the LGBTQ agenda is causing a hostile environment in the stores by customers. Many employees may agree with us, but out of fear of losing their jobs won’t say anything themselves. So it’s our job as the customers, because the customer is always right—to pressure them.

And while it’s not some random clerk’s fault what the corporation itself is doing, they are a vessel that can relay customers’ dissatisfaction to those higher up the food chain, and they are the public face of the business and what it represents. Fill their Yelp and Google listings with negative reviews. Better yet, pick up the phone and start calling local branches and sound off. And do it every time any company crosses the line. Post their phone numbers and email addresses on social media to encourage others.[916] They need to be sent a loud and sustained message. Same with the schools, and our local and state governments.

Look up your Congressman and Senators’ phone numbers (and those of the mayor and city council members) and save them in your contacts like you would anyone else you frequently call. They can (and do) ignore tweets and emails, but if their office phone is ringing off the hook all week and every time their aides or interns pick it up they get an earful from upset constituents, they’re not going to be able to just go about their day as usual. The Congressman, the mayor, the school (or whoever) will get the message, and as the cliché goes—the squeaky wheel gets the grease. It’s usually a small but vocal and active group that causes large societal changes because most people sit on the sidelines and say or do nothing.

Run for city council, mayor, and get on your local school board. Trying to fix the government by using a top down approach will have a limited effect because of how gigantic the bureaucracy is and the number of obstacles that need to be overcome to achieve major changes. As president, Donald Trump tried, and while he had some major victories (like gaining a Conservative majority in the Supreme Court), he could only shift our nation’s course a few degrees.

A bottom up approach is better in many regards because it can be done by ordinary people with limited resources, and being involved in local politics usually isn't as competitive as national offices because the field is less crowded.

Taking control of our local communities is not as difficult as most people think. Just a small handful of active people can take over city councils and school boards, and most people only think about voting on election years for major positions like the president, but local positions (and midterms) are just as important.

During COVID lockdowns, for example, in 2020 and 2021 many local Sheriffs (who are elected by the voters) refused to enforce state laws dictated by governors though executive orders which mandated restaurants not allow in-person dining—even Sheriffs in some major California cities refused to enforce the rule, and allowed businesses to stay open.[917]

Look up the recommended voter guide for your city which are put together by many local Republican parties and use it as a guide to choose candidates you're not familiar with for various positions that don't have their party affiliation listed next to their name on the ballot. Many positions, like school board members, judges, and sheriffs do not list whether a candidate is a Republican or a Democrat, so take advantage of the research and voter guide your local Republican Party puts together. A quick Google search should bring it up.

One of the goals of this book is to move the Overton Window, which is the spectrum of ideas about social issues and public policy that are seen as acceptable by the general public. There are a lot of issues and facts that the Republican Party, Conservatives, and Christians are afraid to talk about out loud, so I'm working to normalize those issues and introduce the terminology, concepts, and arguments to the masses so those seeds can be planted into the minds of millions and one day these truths will be so widely spoken about they'll be impossible to ignore.

We have to push (or pull) Republican lawmakers and political pundits into these discussions by bombarding them with questions, evidence, and arguments; and make addressing these issues unavoidable.

I also want people to be as well rounded as possible when it comes to media literacy. (I am a media analyst after all). Everyone should know about the Social Impact Agencies in Hollywood—the lobbying groups which work to have their clients' messages inserted into the storylines of popular shows and movies, disguising political propaganda as mere entertainment. (Something I detailed in my previous book Hollywood Propaganda: How TV, Movies, and Music Shape Our Culture).

Everyone should know the basic facts about Operation Mockingbird and how the "war on fake news" was launched immediately after Donald Trump beat Hillary Clinton in the 2016 election as a smokescreen to begin rolling out massive censorship on social media. (See my book The True Story of Fake News).

We should make sure it's common knowledge that as a result of this bogus "war on fake news" the Big Tech platforms completely changed the way they function, and how they've come to manipulate their algorithms to artificially boost certain content that reinforces their agenda, while systematically suppressing and censoring those who oppose it. People should know the history of how the mainstream media merged with the very platforms that were once created so users could bypass and replace them. (See my book The Liberal Media Industrial Complex).

A word of caution about becoming politically active though. Some people may want to start an organization or a group to fight for the cause, but there are enormous dangers to such an approach you should be aware of before even considering it. First of all, if a member of the group does something stupid, then the entire organization gets blamed. Not just blamed online or in the media, but it can be legally held liable.

If you or your organization holds an event or promotes a protest and someone gets hurt if violence breaks out, no matter which side started it or caused it, you may be held personally liable, either civilly or even criminally. Democrats have very well-funded law firms they use to financially cripple their opponents. And even if you win a case brought against you, the legal bills are enough to bankrupt most people just defending against them.

It may be better to become part of already well-established groups and then influence their members, and ultimately their leadership, to move them further right. Being part of a movement is often better than being part of an actual organization. One can be a supporter, leader, or an influencer in a movement while remaining completely independent, but this still puts you at risk for civil and criminal penalties if you're blamed for "inciting" violence by using political rhetoric that's too heated, or even standard political analogies talking about "fighting" or "war."

They'll get your private text messages, DMs, and emails, and use them as evidence against you just like they did to the Proud Boys and Oath Keepers.[918] And figures of speech and jokes will be framed as if you were being literal.

Be cautious about posting political messages on social media. Create anonymous accounts where possible, not using your name or your photo. And use a burner email address, not your usual one, in case the platform gets hacked and login information is published for our opponents to sift through (which does happen), allowing them to find other accounts on other platforms that use the same email address, leading them to find people's real identities.

Resist the urge to become a "famous" online personality. Many online accounts have gained hundreds of thousands of followers while keeping the identity of those who run them unknown. Teach your kids how they can ruin their life with one TikTok or Snapchat post that's deemed "racist," "antisemitic," "transphobic," etc. unless or until we end cancel culture.

Be careful not to cut off your nose to spite your face. Going on a rant and using the n-word to prove you don't care what the Thought Police say isn't worth getting fired from your job over or banned from social media. Future potential employers will Google your name during the hiring process and even if your rant doesn't make headlines—if you're named in tweets or Facebook posts, those are going to come up during their vetting process.

Even if you use a pseudonym for your social media presence, if you show your face there is an extremely high probability your actual identity will be found. There's facial recognition software that can find other photos of you online that were posted by your family or friends. Online sleuths can be ruthless and crafty in their quest to dox people. And someone who personally knows you may take it upon themselves to alert others who you are (like a former classmate, coworker, or ex-wife).

But it doesn't even have to be something you post online. These days if someone goes off on a "racist" rant in public that's caught on video, that video often goes viral and ultimately the person is identified, doxxed, and fired in hopes of appeasing the angry online mob who call and harass people's employers when they're the subject of a viral controversy.[919] So even if you're not posting on social media at all, social media can ruin your career from something you say in real life. It's a brave new world.

So pick your battles wisely. Some are in better positions to fight on certain fronts than others. If you're a retired veteran with a guaranteed pension and you have nothing to lose, that's different than an aspiring young college kid who could face a lifetime of limited career options if they happen to get the attention of the wrong people by pushing the envelope on certain controversial issues. With formidable foes dedicated to shutting down anyone speaking out too loudly about certain topics, people need to be careful before they end up with a target on their back. Each individual must carefully decide their own level of involvement.

And this shouldn't need to be said, but no matter how frustrated you get, no matter how angry and disgusted you feel because of the onslaught of attacks against Conservatives or our cultural or religious traditions, don't do anything violent unless it's in self-defense of an imminent and direct threat to your life or that of another.[920]

We've all seen how occasionally disgruntled and mentally disturbed people on the Left and the Right lash out in violence against their perceived enemies, and it always hurts whatever cause they thought they were fighting for. It gains widespread sympathy for the victims and casts whatever cause the perpetrator thought they were fighting for in an extremely negative and toxic light. So when I talk about The War on Conservatives—as far as our side is concerned, it's a political and metaphoric war. It's an information war. It's a battle of ideas, so don't be stupid like some misguided self-proclaimed "patriots" in the past who have lashed out in violence, or those who think that wearing camo and "training" with a dozen others in the woods to overthrow the government is going to have anything but disastrous consequences.

Even in situations that could be deemed self-defense, one wrong decision in a split second could cost you your freedom. Some people shoot armed robbers after they turn around and head for the door and are charged with 2nd degree manslaughter because technically the threat to their life was over because the perpetrator was leaving. Violence is always ugly and should be avoided at all costs. And don't try arguing or reasoning with Marxists in the street. Like Mr. Miyagi from The Karate Kid said, the best way to avoid a punch is to not be there.

If you haven't read my previous books, then you should know that the rabbit hole goes much deeper, and even though some of the topics are similar, each book provides a wealth of information and can help readers gain a much better understanding of how the interconnecting relationships between media, culture, and power function.

Books are one of the best forms of spreading knowledge, even in the so-called digital age (or the information age), or rather especially in the information age—because there is too much information and too many different sources trying to constantly bombard us with messages. People are drowning in information and have a difficult time sifting through it to find quality and meaningful content while avoiding all the useless drama, and pop culture gossip, propaganda, and spam.

We need to free ourselves from the digital sewage pipe that directs most people's attention. We don't need to be slaves to whatever hit show on HBO is trending or whatever new series Netflix or Hulu just launched. We need to manage our media diets in the same way we watch what foods we eat.

It's important to continue old traditions, and always put family first. Study intimate relationships and date with the purpose of finding a life partner and getting married, not just for having fun. Too many people get stuck with someone they're incompatible with in the areas of interpersonal relationships that matter most. They don't look at whether their interests, values, and goals are actually aligned until it's too late. Then it's not just their own happiness and wellbeing that suffers, it's that of their children and grandchildren down the road who have to grow up in broken or dysfunctional homes.

We may be living in a collapsing empire. Politically, financially, intellectually, and morally. Only Republican states or red districts, local communities, small towns, neighborhoods, and families can probably be preserved at this point. The United States as a whole however, is in huge trouble. Perhaps when things get so bad, the pendulum will start to swing back the other direction and society at large may begin healing. But it may not. The America we all knew and loved may be gone. We appear to be following the Tytler Cycle of Civilizations and in the end-stage of Democracy.[921]

But we can carry on the same principles in our own lives that the founding fathers established starting in 1776, in hopes of one day restoring the Republic, no matter how many generations it may take. And more importantly follow the examples set forth by Christ so that we may have the hope of glory.

[327] Orthodox Jews make up about 10% of Jews in the United States.

[328] In the United States, most Orthodox Jews are tolerant and respectful of Christians. In Israel, however, they tolerate tours of the Holy Land by Christians, but over there factions of Orthodox Jews firmly oppose Christians evangelizing (preaching) to them in their “Jewish country,” and numerous viral videos have captured groups of Orthodox Jews harassing Christians in Israel. Lehava is one such group which is considered ultra-Orthodox.

[329] While Orthodox Jews don't subscribe to the New Testament, both Christians and Orthodox Jews believe in the Old Testament and the values it teaches, while JINOs are typically liberal atheists who are even at odds with Orthodox Jews because JINOs prefer secularism and liberalism to traditional (religious) Judaism.

[366] There are numerous interpretations of Christianity and the Bible, and what being a Christian means. Some believe the Bible is 100% historical and literal, while others view the scriptures as allegorical or mythological but still conveying a divine message from God by symbolically representing of various psychological processes involving the Self and the Ego.

[376] The Bible calls Christians a Holy nation in 1 Peter 1:9 and in Matthew 23:37-39 it says Israel kills their prophets and their house will be left desolate until they believe in Jesus. Introduction

A lot of people say, “I don’t follow politics,” but the reality is that pop culture is politics. It’s woven into the fabric of movies, television shows, music—and now even professional sports. Just as art imitates life, life imitates art, and what is often seen as mere “entertainment” actually functions as a container to deliver carefully crafted pieces of propaganda intended to influence the audience as much as it is to entertain them.

Millions of people practically worship celebrities and blindly follow their lead, imitating characters’ hair styles, the way they dress, and even their attitudes and behaviors. People subconsciously absorb ideas and actions they see in the media and regurgitate them as part of their own personalities.

While many celebrities engage in political activism as a hobby during their off time, the more subtle power of Hollywood is using entertainment itself to influence. The ability to influence is a tool, and tools can do great things for humanity, but in the wrong hands easily turn into weapons.

In the 1980s, The Cosby Show brought a nice upper middle class Black family into the homes of millions of Americans, depicting the husband as a doctor and the wife as a lawyer, changing the way many looked at the possibility of Black people achieving higher education and making a better life for themselves. [1]

For Generation X kids who grew up during this time period we watched He-Man and GI Joe cartoons which always taught a valuable lesson, either through the plotline, or a brief PSA at the end. “So now you know, and knowing is half the battle!” Shows like Family Ties and Growing Pains often tackled serious issues kids and families sometimes faced, and as cheesy as those shows may seem today, by the end of the episode there was an obvious moral to the story that undoubtedly, however subtle, affected millions of people in a positive way.

And while there are still plenty of nice family shows on television today, they are surrounded by landmines consisting of the most degenerate characters and perverted plots one could imagine—shows so vile just a generation ago it would have been unthinkable that major networks would air such content.

A strategic and relentless campaign by LGBT activists has saturated television shows, movies, and even commercials with gay, lesbian, and transgender characters which is the sole reason they have become normalized in the minds of the masses. Despite denying there was a "gay agenda," you'll see that well-funded and highly organized groups have been lobbying Hollywood studios to promote and celebrate such characters. [2]

America went from having one television per household in the 1950s—prominently placed in the family room—to children as young as seven or eight years old carrying their own TV around in their pocket and being able to watch practically anything they want with virtually no adult supervision. [3] So not only has there been a stunning drop in the moral quality of content in recent years, the safeguards to prevent children from consuming it have all but vanished as well.

Joshua Meyrowitz, professor of Media Studies at the University of New Hampshire, points out, "Television dilutes the innocence of childhood and the authority of adults by undermining the system of information control that supported them. Television bypasses the year-by-year slices of knowledge given to children. It presents the same general experiences to adults and to children of all ages. Children may not understand everything that they see on television, but they are exposed to many aspects of adult life from which their parents (and traditional children's books) would have once shielded them." [4]

He continues, "Television and its visitors take children across the globe before parents even give them permission to cross the street." [5] How true is that?! And he said this in a book I've had since college—a book published back in 1995 when the Internet was just in its infancy, and a decade before social media would begin to wrap its tentacles around an entire generation of children.

Today, kids have access to unlimited adult content in the palm of their hand thanks to YouTube, Netflix, Snapchat and the rest. Parents don't know what to do, and trying to shield children from inappropriate content in today's online age would require living like the Amish. Pandora's Box has been opened.

Meanwhile, celebrities continue to speak out of both sides of their mouths—saying entertainment inspires, encourages, and teaches viewers about life, while at the same time denying that it can influence anyone in a negative way. About 100 years ago a British film industry paper called Bioscope once wrote that movies were the Christian church's "legitimate competitor in moulding the character of the nation." [6] Since then, the Church has lost out, and it's no longer a question of which institution has more influence.

The majority of people don't even realize what has happened. Professional hypnotherapist Dr. Rachel Copelan warned, "Most people drift into a common, everyday trance when they gaze into the light of the TV tube. Indirect hypnosis manipulates the minds of millions of unsuspecting viewers every day. Surreptitiously, subliminal persuasion leaves its mark upon the collective subconscious. Ideas implanted by commercials affect the health and behavior of all of us. We eat, drink, dress, and make love based on what we see and hear. Television has the power to lull the mind into a state of exaggerated suggestibility, opening it up to behavior control from the outside." [7]

Singer Miley Cyrus popularized "twerking" in 2013, a form of "dance" (if you can call it that) where girls rapidly shake their butt—an act that was instantly mimicked by millions of teens who now regularly post twerking videos on TikTok and Snapchat, etc. In the early 2000s we saw the "Jackass Effect"—where kids got hurt imitating the stunts they saw Johnny Knoxville and his friends doing on the popular MTV series. [8]

A college football-themed film in 1993 called The Program had a scene edited out when it was later released on DVD because at one point several of the players decided to lay down in the middle of a busy highway at night to show how "brave" they were. Of course, several groups of teenagers imitated the scene which resulted in at least one death and numerous others getting seriously injured when they were struck by a car. [9]

Edward Bernays, the man who is credited with being the father of public relations, was a 20th century genius who knew how to manipulate the media in order to shape public opinion around virtually any issue. He was hired by advertising agencies and even the U.S. government to deploy his methods for a variety of aims. [10] He's the man responsible for diamond engagement rings being the cultural standard and even convinced women that smoking cigarettes was an act of defiance against the patriarchy. [11]

The De Beers diamond monopoly and the tobacco industry paid him well for his ingenuity, and because of his knowledge of psychology and mass media he was able to play the public like a fiddle through a series of cleverly crafted press releases and ad campaigns.

In his 1928 book Propaganda , he admitted, “our minds are molded, our tastes formed, our ideas suggested, largely by men we have never heard of...in almost every act of our lives whether in the sphere of politics or business in our social conduct or our ethical thinking, we are dominated by the relatively small number of persons who understand the mental processes and social patterns of the masses. It is they who pull the wires that control the public mind, who harness old social forces and contrive new ways to bind and guide the world.” [12]

He even went so far as to say that those in control of the media “constitute an invisible government which is the true ruling power of our country.” [13]

Entertainment rules America. Charlie Sheen made it into the Guinness Book of World Records as the person to reach 1 million Twitter followers the fastest once joining. [14] Ellen DeGeneres set a world record for the most retweeted tweet after she posted a selfie taken with a group of other celebrities at the 2014 Oscars. [15] Music videos get more views than political speeches, and celebrities make more money while they sleep than police officers or fire fighters do risking their lives to keep their communities safe.

The majority of media today functions as a modern-day equivalent of the “bread and circuses” of ancient Rome, where people were pacified by games and food at the Colosseum, so they weren’t paying attention to the collapsing empire around them. Karl Marx famously said that religion was the “opiate of the masses,” but really its entertainment. It’s television sitcoms, sports, and anything that streams. It’s the trending list on Twitter and the viral hashtags on Instagram.

Entertainment is such a powerful medium for influencing people’s behavior that for several years the CIA actually secretly recruited and directed popular rappers in Cuba to write and perform “protest songs” denouncing their Communist leader Raul Castro in order to foment civil unrest and erode support for his regime. [16] It may seem like the plot out of a movie, but declassified documents obtained by the Associated Press years later show that’s exactly what they did. [17]

The CIA had a budget of millions of dollars for this program and used a front company (which is commonplace) named Creative Associates International in order to conceal their activities. [18] They literally created a talent agency to mold the music and careers of artists they thought could be used to influence Cubans to rise up against Raul Castro. [19] Similar operations have been run in America.

Shortly after President Trump's inauguration, the DJ Moby, who was fairly popular in the early 2000s, revealed that he had been in contact with "active and former CIA agents" who "confirmed" to him that Russia was "blackmailing" Trump and said they needed his help to get the word out. "So they passed on some information to me and they said, like, 'Look, you have more of a social media following than any of us do, can you please post some of these things just in a way that…sort of put it out there.'" [20] Deep State operatives reaching out to celebrities hoping to use them to smear Donald Trump—and that's just the tip of the iceberg.

In this book you'll learn in detail how the Hollywood elite are using their media conglomerates to wage a war on President Trump and his supporters, and not just by celebrities "speaking out," but by incorporating countless anti-Trump themes into their projects. You'll see who is behind the coordinated effort to promote climate change hysteria, how the entertainment industry was instrumental in getting the public to accept gay "marriage," and how they are waging a war against traditional family values, American culture, and even against God Himself.

The late Andrew Breitbart famously said that politics is downstream from culture, meaning if you want to change the laws in a country, you have to first change the culture. This saying became known as the Breitbart Doctrine because it captures the essence of power, propaganda, and politics and explains how many once fringe ideas and behaviors are now legally protected and any business, school, or landlord that dares to disagree can now be punished with the full force of the courts.

Within these pages you'll also learn that liberal Hollywood has some interesting bedfellows when it comes to promoting war, and you'll be shocked to find that the U.S. government often works hand in hand with major studios to produce what essentially amounts to propaganda films; and why there has been an explosion in plots promoting mass immigration, abortion, and socialism.

Not even sports coverage is immune from being turned into another mouthpiece for their agenda as the Left is now pulling out all of the stops hoping to succeed in their "cultural revolution." Let's now pull back the curtain and take a look around behind the scenes of Hollywood Propaganda .

The Politics of Entertainment

Television commercials try to sell you a product or a service despite the fact that most of the time the content of the commercials has nothing to do at all with what they’re actually selling. Celebrities drink a soda and react as if it gives them an orgasm. “Ahhh! Pepsi, the choice of a new generation” they say with a huge fake smile. Samuel L. Jackson shouts “What’s in your wallet!” as if it’s a punchline from a sitcom while he’s simply promoting a credit card. Ads for insurance featuring a caveman and a gecko are passed off as if they’re characters from a recurring comedy series, and the list goes on.

But it’s not just products or services that companies try to sell us through entertainment. It’s ideas. Hollywood propaganda is carefully woven into movies and TV shows with the intent of influencing the audience rather than merely entertain them. Sometimes the central plot serves as the propaganda which is coated in a thin layer of entertainment, but the writers and producers know, and often openly admit, what their true intentions are.

Film critic James Combs wrote, “The term propaganda comes from the Latin propagare , denoting the ability to produce and spread fertile messages that, once sown, will germinate in large human cultures,” adding, “Removed from its pejorative connotation, propaganda may be viewed objectively as a form of communication that has practical and influential consequences,” and can “sway relevant groups of people in order to achieve their purposes.” [21]

In the late 1980s a man named Jay Winsten, who worked as an associate dean at Harvard’s School of Public Health, launched a campaign to convince Hollywood producers to include messages about the dangers of drunk driving in TV shows along with the importance of using designated drivers. [22] It was called the Harvard Alcohol Project and soon the term “designated driver” was being used in shows like Cheers , L.A. Law , The Cosby Show , and countless others, catapulting it into the public lexicon. [23]

Before the 1980s there wasn’t much of a social stigma against driving drunk, but with a persistent propaganda campaign from groups like the Harvard Alcohol Project and MADD [Mothers Against Drunk Driving], the country as a whole began thinking differently about the issue.

More recently, special interest groups use their power to promote abortion, the gay agenda, Obamacare, climate change hysteria, and literally every one of their social justice crusades in the same way. But in these cases, instead of raising awareness for a public good, like stigmatizing drunk driving, they’re using their influence to push fringe political ideas into the mainstream and convince the masses to accept the most flagrant violations of morality and decency.

Social Impact Entertainment Today there are over 100 organizations dedicated to using entertainment to further political and social causes, and there’s even an Orwellian term for the propaganda they create—“Social Impact Entertainment.” In 2014 UCLA opened the Skoll Center for Social Impact Entertainment (SIE) which boasts to be “the first of its kind dedicated solely to advancing the power of entertainment and performing arts to inspire social change.” [24]

The department is committed to “exploring innovative approaches to curricular development for the emerging field of social impact entertainment, but also provide students and faculty with workshops, lectures, distinguished visiting artists programs and unique opportunities to focus their scholarly and creative work in this arena.” [25]

“It will launch research initiatives that explore the development of a new field in social impact entertainment research and practice; inspire students and faculty to use the power of story to make a difference and inspire social change; galvanize the public to action to foster positive social change; develop meaningful partnerships between the public and private sectors to create new models to drive social change; and engage local, national and global communities about how the industry impacts global society through film, television, animation, digital media and theater.” [26]

In 2019 they released a report titled “The State of SIE” [Social Impact Entertainment] where they said, “Given the magnitude of today’s challenges—climate change, economic inequality, forced migrations and any number of other problems—it’s easy for people to get discouraged about their capacity to make a difference in the world. But as the case studies in this report reveal, SIE can play a critical role in catalyzing significant change.” [27]

The report cited Al Gore’s documentary An Inconvenient Truth , which it said, “helped shift global opinions on climate change, one of the most contentious issues of our time, and mobilized a new generation of pioneering environmental activists.” [28]

It appears that the Skoll Center for Social Impact grew out of another UCLA program which had the same goals called the Global Media Center for Social Impact (GMI) which was founded a year earlier in 2013. Sandra de Castro Buffington, who was the director of the program, said, “Topics that have been traditionally taboo are showing up on series television and they’re being discussed, especially via social media, and because of this they don’t seem so controversial anymore. When something goes from being taboo to being openly discussed, it’s a predictor of mass behavior change.” [29]

An industry publication called Cinema of Change noted, “[The Global Media Center for Social Impact] provides the entertainment industry with free, on-demand access to leading experts and cutting-edge resources on topics such as health, immigration, racial justice, America’s prison crisis, the environment, LGBT/gender equality, learning and attention issues, youth sexuality, reproductive health and rights and more. From script reviews and writers’ room consultations to off-site visits and special events, GMI facilitates experiences for industry professionals that inspire them to create stories that entertain, engage, and empower viewers to make change on issues that matter to them.” [30]

Their website, GMImpact.org is now defunct, and it appears they morphed into UCLA’s Skoll Center for Social Impact in 2014, which was created with a $10 million dollar donation by billionaire Jeffrey Skoll, who made his money as the first president of e-Bay.

The Center for Media & Social Impact A similar SIE organization is located in Washington D.C. at American University called the Center for Media & Social Impact (CMSI). They describe themselves as “an innovation lab and research center that creates, studies and showcases media for social impact. Focusing on independent, documentary, entertainment, and public media, the Center bridges boundaries between scholars, producers and communication practitioners across media production, media impact and effects, public policy and audience engagement. The Center produces resources for the field and academic research; convenes conferences and events; and works collaboratively to understand and design media that matter.” [31]

They receive funding through various grants and list some of those contributors on their website, including Bill Gates, the Rockefeller Foundation, the Ford Foundation, the National Endowment for the Arts, and Univision.

In 2019 the Center for Media & Social Impact launched “Comedy Think Tanks” which aims to use comedy to promote social justice issues. The following year they released a report titled Comedy and Racial Justice in the Climate Crisis that “analyzes the value and importance of comedy for local public mobilization in climate change.” [32]

The report highlights “the unique potential of social justice comedy” and suggests it be used as a “mobilization strategy, and as disruptive creative expression inserted into a broader cultural conversation about climate change, centering communities of color and low-income people who are ‘hit first and worst’ by climate disasters.” [33]

It concludes, “Through the open-minded experience of co-creating with comedy professionals, social justice organizations can embrace the innovation and creativity that comedy can provide. Comedy can cut through cultural clutter, and it also entertains and invites feelings of play. This kind of light is needed in the climate movement, which can feel too complicated and difficult to engage disparate groups and communities beyond a stream of fatiguing outrage or clinical statistics.” [34]

Propper Daley Propper Daley is another “social impact agency” which was founded by Greg Propper and Mark Daley, who are close associates to Hillary Clinton. Before helping start the agency, Greg Propper actually worked for the Clinton Foundation, and when Hillary was running for president in 2016, Propper Daley helped organized fundraisers for her, bringing together stars like Leonardo DiCaprio, Tobey Maguire and others under the same roof. [35]

Previously they had organized meetings with writers from TV shows like Parks and Recreation , How I Met Your Mother , and Glee , to sit down with Chelsea Clinton to discuss how they could help promote some of the Clinton Foundation's initiatives. [36] Patti Miller, who worked for the foundation, admitted the meeting aimed to "bring together a cross section of the industry, with leading television comedy writers, hoping they can help us reach our audience with creative, funny content." [37]

In March 2019 Propper Daley held a private invite-only conference with 400 writers, producers and executives to discuss how they could use their positions to "think differently or with more nuance about certain characters or storylines and hopefully create a more empathetic public." [38] In other words, to lobby them to include more pro-gay and transgender storylines, and promote mass immigration, abortion, and other Leftist causes through their work.

GLAAD

GLAAD [the Gay and Lesbian Alliance Against Defamation] has been aggressively lobbying Hollywood for years to include gay and transgender characters in television series and films. One of their current aims is to pressure studios to include gay characters in 20% of films by the year 2021 and 50% of all films by the year 2024. [39]

Each year they release their Studio Responsibility Index , a report where they track their progress and complain that mainstream entertainment isn't gay enough. They even have what they call the "GLAAD Media Institute" that has drawn up a "roadmap for Hollywood to grow LGBTQ inclusion in film." [40]

Their 2018 Studio Responsibility Index says, "With wildly successful films like Wonder Woman and Black Panther proving that audiences want to see diverse stories that haven't been told before, there is simply no reason for major studios to have such low scores…At a time when the entertainment industry is holding much needed discussions about inclusion, now is the time to ensure the industry takes meaningful action and incorporates LGBTQ stories and creators as among priorities areas for growing diversity.” [41]

It goes on, “Studios must do better to include more LGBTQ characters, and construct those stories in a way that is directly tied to the film’s plot…Far too often LGBTQ characters and stories are relegated to subtext, and it is left up to the audience to interpret or read into a character as being LGBTQ. Audiences may not realize they are seeing an LGBTQ character unless they have outside knowledge of a real figure, have consumed source material for an adaptation, or have read external press confirmations. This is not enough…Our stories deserve to be seen on screen just as much as everyone else’s, not hidden away or left to guess work, but boldly and fully shown.” [42]

It’s really an open secret in Hollywood, but few people outside the industry are familiar with the intense (and very successful) lobbying efforts the organization engages in. Entertainment Weekly recently admitted that “GLAAD is changing Hollywood’s LGBTQ narrative—one script at a time,” and CEO Sarah Kate Ellis confirmed that as far back at the mid-1980s, “we realized we needed Hollywood to be telling our stories to humanize LGBTQ people. So we opened a chapter very quickly in Los Angeles, in Hollywood, and really the main focus was lobbying Hollywood to tell our stories.” [43]

I’ll cover this topic in more detail in “The LGBT Agenda” chapter because it’s one of the Left’s most aggressive efforts, and in the last few years they have successfully caused an influx of LGBT characters in major television series, and even convinced Disney and Sesame Street to get on board with their plans. [44]

United Nations The United Nations has a special program called the Creative Community Outreach Initiative to lobby producers and celebrities to help them promote various agendas as well. In 2009 they convinced producers of NBC’s Law and Order: Special Victims Unit to make an episode about child soldiers who were brainwashed by the Lord’s Resistance Army in Uganda. [45] The U.N. also convinced ABC’s Ugly Betty to incorporate the use of mosquito nets over beds to prevent the spread of malaria in Africa by having the lead character promote the (real) Nothing But Nets program which works to donate bed nets to people there. [46]

The United Nations has even launched a campaign called “The Unstereotype Alliance” which has been backed by consumer product giants Procter & Gamble and Unilever, along with the Big Tech companies like Google, Facebook and others to promote “social justice” through advertising campaigns for unrelated products. [47]

“Advertising is a reflection of culture and sometimes can be ahead of the curve and help effect change. We are proud to be a founding member of this UN sponsored initiative to ‘unstereotype’ through the power and breadth of our messaging. We are all in,” said a Microsoft executive. [48]

It used to be that commercials promoted the benefits of their products and did their best to avoid getting political because Republicans and Democrats both drink beer, eat hamburgers, and buy cars; and companies didn’t want to ostracize half of their potential customers by supporting any polarizing causes. But since the liberal pathogen has caused a zombie-like apocalypse in America recently, many large corporations have decided to take up the banner of “social justice,” and when lobbyists from the “Unstereotype” campaign make demands, companies often oblige.

This goes far beyond companies trying to be environmentally friendly, introducing recyclable packaging, or highlighting how they’re using renewable energy to power their factories. Nobody could really disagree with those practices. I’m talking about companies that actually now insult half of their potential customers in the hopes of gaining the unwavering support of a smaller segment of society because of their “woke” campaigns.

They don’t even see it as insulting people, they’re just so arrogant that they feel they need to “educate” people about social justice causes, or think they need to virtue signal about how much “they care” by jumping on the bandwagon. The Unstereotype Alliance has boasted of “smashing” gender roles in commercials so now they don’t depict cleaning as “women’s work,” and regularly feature interracial and homosexual couples to give them more “visibility.” [49]

Promoting Obamacare When President Obama was trying to get Obamacare passed into law, his administration was aided by a chorus of enthusiastic celebrities who used their voice to support the bill, but behind the scenes strings were being pulled to encourage them to speak up, and Hollywood studios were actually lobbied to include pro Obamacare messages in the plots of popular TV shows. [50]

One such lobbyist group called Hollywood, Health & Society works with studios to promote health based initiatives and were paid $500,000 to convince them to incorporate “the need for Obamacare” into storylines of network TV shows [51] An executive with the organization said, “Our experience has shown that the public gets just as much, if not more, information about current events and important issues from their favorite television shows and characters as they do from the news media…This grant will allow us to ensure that industry practitioners have up-to-date, relevant facts on health care reform to integrate into their storylines and projects.” [52]

Hollywood, Health & Society has become the one-stop-shop for organizations that want to have their messages covertly inserted into entertainment. Executive Kate Folb, admitted, “There was a time when there were so many organizations lobbying the entertainment industry on just their one issue, that it was just too much. They were all calling the same writers and trying to get meetings with the same shows. What happened was the industry stopped taking all of those calls because they became so overwhelmed. That’s part of the reason HH&S came into being: to help writers get what they need and keep them from getting overwhelmed with requests to include certain messages in their shows.” [53]

Another PR firm called Ogilvy Public Relations Worldwide was paid $900,000 to pitch Obamacare plots to major networks. They even tried to get major networks to shoot a reality show about “the trials and tribulations of families living without medical coverage.” [54]

“I’d like to see 10 of the major TV shows, or telenovelas, have people talking about ‘that health insurance thing,’” said Peter V. Lee, the California

Health Benefit Exchange's executive director, which hired the PR firm. "There are good story lines here." [55]

President Obama brought a bunch of actors and producers to the White House to ask them for their help promoting Obamacare, and soon they started happily doing so. [56] In October 2013, Jennifer Hudson starred in a Funny or Die skit designed to promote Obamacare where she played a Washington D.C. "fixer" or a "scandal manager" in a parody of ABC's series Scandal.

The "funny part" was that everyone who tried to hire her to fix their problems (like a college student without any health insurance, and a guy who was changing insurance companies but was worried they were going to drop him because of preexisting conditions), learned that there was no problem at all because of Obamacare. [57] It was a pathetic attempt at humor and to do such a lame skit under the Funny or Die banner made it even more sad, but they wanted to do their part to help the cause.

President Obama also appeared on Zach Galifianakis' Funny or Die skit "Between Two Ferns" for a scripted interview meant to be funny but was just another stunt to promote Obamacare. It worked, however, and when the segment was posted online it became the number one source of traffic to the new HealthCare.gov website. [58]

The White House Entertainment Advisory Council admitted, "This is a perfect example of a great partnership with Funny or Die stepping up in a big way. The site has a very robust traffic base of young men and women who are on the edge of the cultural zeitgeist. It has an organic reach, and now the traditional media will be talking about it for days." [59]

Under the Obama administration all of Hollywood was more than willing to support anything the White House wanted, but once Donald Trump took over the Oval Office everything changed as I will detail in the next chapter, the "War on Trump."

Abortion Planned Parenthood is America's largest abortion factory and most people have no idea they also have a special Arts & Entertainment Engagement department that reaches out to television studios and "feeds" them plot points they would like included in shows. [60] Few people outside of the industry know such a department exists and most would probably have a hard time believing it, but it does. And for eight years now they've been hosting an annual "Sex, Politics, Film, & TV Reception" at the Sundance Film Festival to "celebrate" films and television shows that promote abortion. [61]

Little press coverage has been given to Planned Parenthood's Arts & Entertainment Engagement department, but The Washington Post did mention their work once, saying, "For nearly 50 years, it has been legal to have an abortion in America yet stubbornly taboo to show one on television or film. But both those things are now changing." [62] The article went on to admit the existence of the abortion A&E department and list some of their "successes." I'll cover their activities in more detail in the "War on America" chapter, but for now you should at least know that such an apparatus exists and has been working behind the scenes for years.

Easy abortions cause many women to ignore the use of simple precautions to reduce the risk of pregnancy, and by softening the social stigma that has historically been associated with abortions, many young girls now see them as a regular part of life.

War on Trump It’s obvious that the “news” media has been waging a disinformation war against President Trump since the day he won the 2016 election—something I chronicled in my previous book The True Story of Fake News . But the entertainment industry has also dedicated much of their creative efforts to continuously casting him and everything he does in a negative light by weaving anti-Trump narratives into the plot lines of countless television dramas and sitcoms to ensure as many people as possible are inundated with the message. Stephen Colbert went so far as to produce an entire animated series for HBO called Our Cartoon President which is dedicated to mocking him.

Before becoming President, the media used to love Donald Trump. For decades he was a symbol of wealth and success, and throughout the 1980s and 90s made cameos in dozens of TV shows and movies like The Fresh Prince of Bel-Air , Spin City , WrestleMania , Home Alone 2 , Zoolander , and more. But all that changed after winning the 2016 election, when the Liberal Media Industrial Complex launched a war against him hoping to derail his administration and prevent him from cleaning up the corruption in Washington D.C. and bringing the government gravy train to a halt.

ABC's sitcom Black-ish revolves around an African American family and the issues they face as a Black middle-class family in America today, and shortly after the 2016 election there was an episode about how "terrified" everyone was about Trump's victory and what it would mean for Black people. [63]

For his entire professional life Donald Trump has been a friend of the Black community and had been given awards for all he did. [64] Every leader in the Black community from Jesse Jackson and Al Sharpton to Muhammad Ali had sung praises of him for decades, but now the media started gaslighting that he was a racist, hoping to get Black people to turn against him. [65]

In an episode of The Simpsons , Lisa is seen reading To Kill a Mockingbird while seated on the couch next to Homer, when he tells her, "Now just remember, it's set in the South a long time ago. The terrible racism you're reading about is now everywhere ." [66] Homer and Lisa then head off to the local mall and pass a TV news crew which is interviewing a group of men, one wearing a red hat. "Kent Brockman here interviewing three blue-collar men who voted for Trump. How do you feel now?" the reporter asks them. One of the men replies, "Please stop interviewing us," as if he's ashamed he voted for President Trump and realized he made a big mistake.

In an episode of the revived Murphy Brown series, a character (who is a reporter) was depicted as being attacked by rabid Trump supporters because of their hatred for the media. [67] While promoting the show Candice Bergen (who plays Murphy Brown) said Donald Trump winning the 2016 election was the motivation to revive it. [68] The original series which aired from 1988-1998 depicted Murphy Brown as an investigative journalist and news anchor, so producers thought with Trump's war on the media raging they could bring the show back and have Murphy Brown working to "expose" him.

Rolling Stone noted, "The season premiere climaxes with Murphy swapping insults with President Trump during a live broadcast (him via Twitter, her glaring at the camera). The second episode has her lecturing Sarah Huckabee Sanders about the fundamental dishonesty of her press briefings, while the third sees her verbally dismantling a barely-disguised version of Steve Bannon." [69] Literally the entire reason for bringing the show back was to use the angle of Trump vs the media, with Murphy Brown and other reporters being the underdogs and the "victims" of President Trump's attacks.

When NBC brought back Will & Grace in 2017 after initially ending the series in 2006, one new episode depicted a character walking into a cake shop because she's hosting a birthday party for the president and wants a cake that says Make America Great Again on it. While ordering the cake she makes a comment about how she'll be serving White Russians, a reference to the Democrats' obsession that the Trump campaign "conspired" with Russians to "steal" the 2016 election, adding, "But you don't need to know the guest list." [70] The baker then refused to bake the cake saying that the phrase "Make America Great Again" is racist. [71]

Vice News had a whole series called The Hunt for the Trump Tapes starring comedian Tom Arnold where he traveled around the world looking for the rumored "Trump pee tape" or a supposed recording of him saying the n-word. And just like the shows about people searching for Bigfoot that are somehow able to be drawn out for an hour each week despite never finding a shred of evidence, The Hunt for the Trump Tapes finally ended without uncovering a thing. [72]

Even the X-Files has included anti-Trump messages. The series, which originally ran from 1993-2002 was revived in 2016 for a few more seasons and in January 2018 the season premiere kicked off with the "Cigarette Smoking Man” narrating footage of President Trump’s inauguration which then cuts to a montage of clips including Vladimir Putin, people at voting booths, a KKK rally, and police confronting Black Lives Matter protesters while he continues to talk about the state of the country. [73] Robert Mueller is also depicted as the head of the FBI in the series, but “the bureau’s not in good standing with the White House.”

In one episode Scully tells Mulder “Sometimes I think the world is going to hell and we’re the only two people who can save it,” to which he responds, “The world is going to hell, Scully. And the president is working to bring down the FBI along with it.” [74] After an assassination attempt on Mulder he later discovers the perpetrator is a Russian contractor with a special security clearance given to him by “the Executive branch” of our government, insinuating the President was trying to have him killed. [75]

But the anti-Trump snides in sitcoms and dramas get much darker than just obsessing about how “terrible” President Trump is, or promoting the conspiracy theory that he’s a Russian agent. They’re openly calling for violence against his supporters, and want him to be assassinated.

Endorsing Violence The CBS legal drama The Good Fight posted a trailer on their official Twitter account which showed one of the main characters ranting about how “some speech” deserves “enforcement” and that it’s time to physically attack American citizens “unprovoked” who are engaging in speech that social justice warriors perceive as “racist.” [76]

To the Left, supporting the border wall is considered “racist” and all Trump voters are Nazis and they want us all to be silenced, jailed, or dead. The Good Fight clip also referred to Alt-Right leader Richard Spencer getting sucker punched while giving an interview in Washington D.C. and insinuated that anyone wearing a MAGA hat in public should face the same fate.

The show’s Twitter account also posted a picture showing a list of words stacked on top of each other reading, “Assassinate,” “President,” and “Trump.” [77] In one episode a character was arrested for participating in a riot, and during his court appearance when he was talking with his lawyer he told her that the judge was a Trump appointee and so he is "fucked." She advises him not to say anything radical, and he responds in a quiet voice, "Oh, like 'we need to assassinate the president?"

Later, when they're back at his house she says to him, "Tell me what you said today in court was a joke" to which he responds, "Why? You don't believe in regime change?"

"You're discussing a crime with your lawyer," she responds and then takes his pistol and unloads it. He looks at her, disappointed, and says, "This won't slow us down." [78]

In another episode one of the lead characters (Diane) goes on a rant about needing to get rid of President Trump and when she proposes spreading fake news about him, some of her colleagues push back thinking she's gone too far. She then responds, "I have a Smith & Wesson 64 [handgun] in my desk, and I'm this close to taking to the streets." [79]

The series even depicted the lawyers obtaining the fabled "Trump golden showers video" after getting a flash drive sent to them by a Russian woman who claimed to have been one of the prostitutes in the video. The Daily Beast , a garbage online outlet and waste of cyberspace, was happy that such a grotesque plot line was aired on network television, saying, "It allows the show to channel our collective anxieties and outrage better than most other series that grapple with our new political reality." [80]

Amazon produced a show for their Prime streaming service titled Hunters which is about a "diverse" group of vigilantes led by Al Pacino who go around assassinating people they think are closet "Nazis" working in the United States to revive the Third Reich. In one of the trailers posted online a "Nazi" could be seen wearing a red baseball cap with some white writing on it, looking almost identical to a Make America Great Again hat. [81]

"The best revenge, is revenge," says Al Pacino's character, who tells the vigilantes they "have to find them before they find us." The series could easily incite (and perhaps has incited) vigilantes to go out and attack supposed "Nazis" (meaning ordinary Trump supporters). The Left thinks free speech is "hate speech" and "hate speech" is "violence," so they justify physically attacking Trump supporters unprovoked because Antifa believes they're fighting actual Nazis.

The executive producer of Hunters is Jordan Peele, the Black director behind Get Out who has an axe to grind with White people, so it's not surprising he would be involved with a series that fetishizes torturing and killing them.

The Left always accuse others of exactly what they're guilty of themselves. It's a form psychological projection, as well as a gaslighting technique. They are so detached from reality that they lack the ability of introspection and can't see that they are the violent ones, while claiming that it's President Trump and his supporters. They're acting like fascists, while accusing President Trump of being one. They are the racists, spewing hatred of White people every day while claiming White people are conspiring to uphold the "systemic White supremacist system" in the United States simply because they exist.

Alec Baldwin says, "the near moral collapse of this country falls squarely in the lap of Trump's supporters," when in reality they are the immoral degenerates destroying the foundations of our Republic. [82]

Law and Order: SVU aired an episode about a character based on an amalgamation of Ann Coulter and Millie Weaver who was sexually assaulted by a suspected Antifa member, but because of her political views some of the police investigating the attack wrestled with sympathizing with her. The episode was titled "Info Wars."

At the end, the final twist was the attacker might not have been Antifa after all, but one of her own supporters (depicted as a vile White supremacist) because he got upset with her after she had turned down his advances the night before when they met at a bar. The "moral" of the story was Antifa are just peaceful protesters fighting against right-wing extremists, and while the victim was worried about them, thinking they were responsible for her assault, it was her own supporters who are the violent ones.

The series usually depicts White men as the criminals, often rapists, and avoids storylines about illegal aliens being the perpetrators or Latino gangs involved in sex trafficking even though the show is supposedly often inspired by actual events. And it is extra careful not to include very many Black people as perpetrators out of the usual concerns of supposedly perpetuating "stereotypes" about Black men and crime.

Actress Jessica Chastain once posted a link on Twitter to a Time magazine article denouncing Antifa, the Left's terrorist foot soldiers, adding

"If we resort to violence as a way to combat hate, we become what we are fighting," but then later posted a video tearfully apologizing after being barraged by social justice warriors saying that she was helping "Nazis" (meaning Trump supporters) by denouncing the increasing violence being waged against them.

"I'm making a video because my heart is very heavy," the apology began. "I've learned so much the past few days about the trauma many people are experiencing in our country. I've had the opportunity to listen, more than to speak. And [dramatic pause] it's really hard for me to express my feelings, my thoughts, in 140 characters on Twitter so here's my first video. I wanted you guys to know that I hear you. I want you to know that I'm committed to creating transformative social change. That I'm committed to dismantling systems of oppression. I share in the sadness of what is happening in the country. I hear you and you may never have met me, but I love you." [83] She literally cried and apologized for denouncing violence against Trump supporters!

Teen Vogue magazine declared "Antifa grows out of a larger revolutionary politics that aspires toward creating a better world, but the primary motivation is to stop racists from organizing." [84] A better world? If Donald Trump wins reelection, Antifa may feel they have no other option to stop him than to become overt terrorists like the Weather Underground or the Symbionese Liberation Army since every attempt from the last four years to demonize him and remove him through impeachment and the ballot box have failed.

Daily Show host Trevor Noah, who is from South Africa, says that Trump's demeanor and style is like "many African dictators" or those from the Middle East. [85] And virtually every celebrity with a talk show from the old bags on The View to Stephen Colbert and Jimmy Kimmel regularly paint the president as such. [86]

While everyone is familiar with Trump Derangement Syndrome—the irrational hatred and fear of President Trump, for the first time in modern history the chorus of Hollywood celebrities crossed the line far beyond their usual criticisms and hatred of a Republican president into openly calling for him to be assassinated.

Madonna famously said she "thought an awful lot about blowing up the White House." [87] Comedian Kathy Griffin did a photo shoot showing her holding Trump's bloody decapitated head which looked like an ISIS beheading. Griffin also said she wanted to beat down Donald Trump's then 11-year-old son Barron. [88]

At one of their shows in Mexico, Guns N' Roses brought a Donald Trump piñata on stage and invited their fans to beat on it. [89] At a Green Day concert in Oakland, California singer Billie Joe Armstrong shouted "Kill Donald Trump!" in the middle of a song. [90] Rapper Snoop Dogg "shot" Trump in the head in one of his music videos. [91] Marylin Manson "beheaded" him with a large knife in one of his. [92] Rapper Big Sean did a freestyle about murdering Donald Trump with an ice pick on a popular hip hop radio show. [93] All with no consequences whatsoever.

Actor Adam Pally, who starred in a time traveling comedy series called Making History , told TMZ that if time travel were possible he would go back and kill Donald Trump. [94] Johnny Depp went even further saying someone should assassinate him right now. "When was the last time an actor assassinated a president?" he asked a crowd. "It's been awhile, and maybe it's time," he concluded, referring to John Wilkes Booth (who was an actor) killing Abraham Lincoln. [95]

He faced no consequences whatsoever. He wasn't dropped by his management company, none of his movies were pulled from the streaming services; nothing!

Before she dropped out of the 2020 Presidential race, Kamala Harris joked with Ellen DeGeneres about killing Trump if she was stuck in an elevator with him. [96] Robert De Niro has said numerous times that he wants to punch President Trump in the face. Jim Carrey said he had a dream of murdering him with a golf club, and now draws pictures almost daily and posts them on his Twitter account depicting Trump and those in his administration as madmen hell-bent on destroying the earth.

Mickey Rourke said that he wants to beat him with a baseball bat. [97] After the Iranian government put an $80 million bounty on President Trump's head, comedian George Lopez responded on Instagram saying, "We'll do it for half." [98]

While hosting Saturday Night Live , comedian John Mulaney urged people to assassinate President Trump like Julius Caesar. "It is a Leap Year, as I said. Leap Year began in 45 B.C. under Julius Caesar. This is true, he started the Leap Year in order to correct the calendar and we still do it to this day," he began. [99] "Another thing that happened under Julius Caesar, he was such a powerful maniac that all the senators grabbed knives and they stabbed him to death. That would be an interesting thing if we brought that back now.” [100]

The atmosphere the media has created in the Trump era, where publicly wishing for his death has become commonplace, has incited numerous unhinged lunatics to attempt to storm the White House and Trump’s Mar-a-Lago resort in Florida where he often goes on holidays. [101] Yet with the exception of Kathy Griffin getting dropped by CNN as cohost of their New Year’s Eve coverage, none of the celebrities calling for his assassination have faced any consequences. Not legally or professionally.

Imagine the outrage if anyone even remotely suggested that Barack Obama should be assassinated, or hung for treason. Their career would have been over by the end of the day and their “terrorist threats” would have dominated the news cycle for an entire week.

The 25th Amendment Fantasies As you likely know, every few months throughout the Trump Administration the mainstream media repeats the same news cycle about the “possibility” that President Trump may be removed from office by enacting the 25th Amendment, which allows the expulsion of a president if the majority of his cabinet agree he is mentally unfit for office, which would result in the Vice President taking over.

Such pipe dreams have been fueled by gossip columnists like Michael Wolff in his tabloid trash books that are hailed by the media for his supposed “anonymous sources” inside the White House who say this possibility is “being discussed” every day. [102] The Left’s desperate hope that the 25th Amendment could end their Trump nightmare has caused the issue to get written into the plots of various political dramas on television, allowing those with Trump Derangement Syndrome to have the emotional satisfaction for a fleeting moment that it has actually happened. These plot lines also serve to plant seeds in people’s minds hoping they’ll grow and increase discussions and pressure about actually doing a such thing to President Trump.

The Showtime series Homeland , a spy thriller about the Department of Homeland Security investigating terrorist threats against the United States, is just one of numerous shows to include this plot point. “I am here to relieve you of your command,” says the character playing the Vice President to a flabbergasted now former President standing in the Oval office as he is informed of the decision. [103]

Before President Trump, such a topic was never addressed in any political drama or thriller. The 25th Amendment was an obscure provision few people ever heard of, but it’s included in the Constitution just in case the President becomes mentally incapacitated. Democrats, however, hoped to use it as a weapon.

CBS’s political drama Madam Secretary did the same thing. “I’ve talked to White House Counsel and the attorney general, and though there is a ‘fog of law’ surrounding Section 4 of the 25th Amendment, because it’s never been invoked, they assured me that if the heads of the executive departments plus the vice president vote by simple majority, the president will be removed from office, and Vice President Hurst will become the acting president.…If ever there were a time to set aside politics and do what’s best for the country, this is it,” says the White House Chief of Staff. [104]

After the Cabinet voted in favor of removing the President by enacting the 25th Amendment, he addressed the nation to announce that he would be stepping down and thanked them for putting their country first! “I thank the brave cabinet secretaries who voted to invoke the 25th Amendment. They are all true American heroes and patriots. They put their country ahead of their personal relationship with me. That’s what separates us from dictatorships and oligarchies. Without people of such courage, our democracy would be lost, and they will forever have my gratitude. And because of them, I have never felt more proud to be an American.” [105]

Kiefer Sutherland’s Designated Survivor series on ABC also aired a 25th Amendment fantasy, where his vice president plotted to invoke the power hoping to have him removed as President after notes about his therapy sessions were leaked to the public, causing concerns about his mental stability as he tried to cope with the death of his wife. [106]

Michael J. Fox guest-starred as the prosecutor for the Cabinet, which ultimately failed in removing Sutherland, but succeeded in making an entire episode about the 25th Amendment, which was the whole point in the first place.

Even The CW's superhero series Supergirl , a derivative of the Superman franchise that focuses on Superman's cousin, also aired an episode where Kara (aka Supergirl, who, like Clark Kent works as a reporter) published an exposé on the President conspiring with arch villain Lex Luther, resulting in the cabinet invoking the 25th Amendment to have him removed. As the characters are watching a news broadcast about the situation, one turns to Kara, congratulating her, saying, "Talk about the power of the press." [107]

She replies, "These have been some dark days. And I'll admit, there were some times where I thought we would never get out of it, but we didn't give up, and we kept chipping away, until we brought the truth to light. Can you believe the Fourth Estate saved the day?" [108] The "Fourth Estate" refers to the news media, which functions as an unofficial fourth branch of government that is supposed to help keep political power in check.

Are There Any Conservative Celebrities?

Sometimes people may wonder "why are there so few conservative celebrities?" The answer is that there may not be as few as it appears because they keep quiet about their politics knowing that if they were vocal about their beliefs it would virtually end their career. Being a conservative in Hollywood has always been difficult but in the Age of Trump, it has never been more dangerous.

There are a few rare exceptions like conservative comedians Dennis Miller, Larry the Cable Guy, and Jeff Foxworthy, but they are allowed to exist because they have a niche market, and only as long as they don't come out too hard against the Left. They won't do jokes about gays, transgenders, Black crime, or other topics they know will cause them to be canceled. They have to stay in their lane.

There are some Republican actors like Jon Voight, and Dean Cain who are public about their beliefs but open conservatives in Hollywood are mostly lower-level actors who make a good living, but aren't A-listers.

Those who want to be megastars know what needs to be done, and what must not be done—or said publicly.

James Woods says that after he was asked at a Hollywood Foreign Press Association junket (the organization that runs the Golden Globe awards) if he would support Hillary Clinton for president, he was blacklisted from Hollywood for saying no. [109]

After President Trump became elected Woods began tweeting support for him, and his tweets became increasingly political. He was later dropped by his talent agent who gave him no other reason than, “I don’t want to represent you anymore.” [110] Woods is now basically retired but still enjoys tweeting his disgust for liberals on a regular basis.

Kanye West says it took him a year to “have the confidence” to publicly support Trump and wear a MAGA hat. He would later say that wearing the hat “represented overcoming fear and doing what you felt no matter what anyone said.” [111] When Kanye was the musical guest on Saturday Night Live for the season premiere in 2018 he wore his MAGA hat on stage for his performance, and afterwards he started ranting about how the staff and producers were not happy about it.

“They said, ‘don’t go out there with that hat on.’ They bullied me backstage. They bullied me! And then they say I’m in a sunken place.” He then went on to say that ninety percent of news is liberal, “So it’s easy to make it seem like it’s so one-sided.” [112] He got a lot of backlash and was even called a White supremacist, but he is a big enough star to weather the storm and eccentric enough for many to dismiss his political views as him just “being Kanye.”

But there is no tolerance for ordinary actors or actresses just starting their career. Mean Girls was a movie and is now a play on Broadway, and one of the stars (Laura Leigh Turner) made headlines because someone snooping around her Twitter account noticed that she was following various popular conservatives, including President Trump and Sean Hannity. [113] She then un-followed Trump hoping to avoid any more negative attention.

Something similar happened to a contestant on The Bachelorette in the 2018 season when it was discovered that the frontrunner had “liked” various Instagram posts that made fun of feminists and illegal aliens. After making headlines for his “egregious behavior” he deleted his account so more wouldn’t be uncovered and issued a lengthy and pathetic apology. [114]

Because of the increasing persecution of conservative celebrities, actor Gary Sinise founded a “secret society” of sorts called the Friends of Abe in 2004 to function as a support group and networking organization for conservatives in the entertainment industry. “Abe” refers to Abraham Lincoln, and at one time the group supposedly had around 2000 members, including Kevin Sorbo, Jon Voight, Scott Baio, and Kelsey Grammer. They used to meet once a month and would host guest speakers like conservative pundits as well as Republican politicians.

When the organization filed for a 501(c)(3) tax exempt status in 2011, the Obama-controlled IRS demanded a list of their members in order to process their application which is not a requirement for a group to be granted a non-profit status. [115] It was during this same time that the IRS was later found to have discriminated against over 400 different conservative groups, especially if they had “Tea Party” in their name. [116] After getting some negative press for trying to find out the names of everyone associated with Friends of Abe, the IRS reluctantly approved them as a 501(c)(3).

It is said that they disbanded in 2017 over divisions about President Trump, but there are rumors that a new “Friends of Abe” may have formed, possibly under a different name. [117] Being a conservative in Hollywood has always been difficult, but in our modern age with political correctness run amok and Thought Police ready to destroy anyone’s career for having the “wrong” opinion, it has caused most conservatives in the entertainment industry to stay hiding in the closet.

It’s not just Donald Trump that Hollywood is waging war on—it’s what he represents. He’s a nationalist, not a globalist. He puts America First, and unlike most other recent presidents won’t surrender our sovereignty to the United Nations. But Hollywood isn’t just trying to destroy him and his supporters. They’re waging war on the entire country, our culture, our history, and our families.

Author's Note: Please take a moment to rate and review this book on Amazon.com, or wherever you purchased it from if you're reading the e-book, to let others know what you think. This also helps to offset the trolls who keep giving my books fake one-star reviews when they haven't even read them.

Almost all of the one-star reviews on Amazon for my last three books, "The Liberal Media Industrial Complex," "The True Story of Fake News," and "Liberalism: Find a Cure" are from NON-verified purchases which is a clear indication they are fraudulent, hence me adding this note.

It's just more proof that liberals are losers and can't play fair, so if you could help me combat them as soon as possible since you actually bought this book, that would be great!

Thank you!

War on America Since the Leftists are trying to overthrow the United States of America and replace our Republic with a socialist dictatorship they are heavily promoting illegal immigration, demonizing the police, and are relentlessly attacking American culture, customs, symbols, and holidays. This is all obvious today, but back in the late 1940s and early 50s there were widespread concerns about communists and communist sympathizers working in Hollywood who may use their positions to do just that.

Numerous individuals were blacklisted and basically banned from working in the industry to prevent them from spreading anti-American sentiments. In 1947, ten writers and directors refused to testify about their suspected communist ties or sympathies before the House Un-American Activities Committee, likely because they didn't want to incriminate themselves.

The communist purge back then was widely criticized as an overreaction and a witch hunt (often referred to as McCarthyism), but it's obvious—the seeds of Marxism have taken root in Hollywood and now, as Tim Allen said, being a conservative in that town today is like being a Jew in 1930s Germany. [118]

Orson Bean, who was a popular gameshow host in the 1960s, later noted, "Sitcoms and movies today hate old-fashioned values. There's more anti-American propaganda today than the Soviets could have ever worked into our culture through their covert party members who were writing screenplays." [119]

A former KGB Agent named Yuri Bezmenov who defected to Canada in the 1970s would later give a series of interviews and lectures in the United States detailing how the Soviet Union was working to undermine the United States as part of their long term goal to end our reign as the world's premier superpower. He described the process as "ideological subversion" which was comprised of four different parts: Demoralization, Destabilization, Crisis, and Normalization. [120]

He said the Marxists knew it would take an entire generation to accomplish, but were patiently and persistently working towards the goal. "What [ideological subversion] basically means is: to change the perception of reality of every American to such an extent that despite [an] abundance of information, no one is able to come to sensible conclusions in the interest of defending themselves, their families, their community, and their country," he explained. [121]

Basically, the communists planned to cause cultural chaos by encouraging Americans to embrace socially toxic ideas they knew would ultimately lead to self-destruction down the road.

It's obvious that each phase of the Ideological Subversion plan has been successful. Hollywood has warped the minds of tens of millions of people causing irreversible damage, brainwashing them into believing that America is an evil country built entirely on the backs of slaves while the greedy 1% control all the wealth, so why bother trying to earn an honest living.

They've destabilized the nuclear family causing a sociological crisis like the world has never seen, with the majority of children now being raised by single parents; they've normalized the most unhealthy sexual behaviors and lifestyles anyone could imagine; and recently we've been faced with numerous crises from the coronavirus pandemic to the ongoing racial conflicts from Black Lives Matter. All of which have thrown America into a tailspin.

The ongoing attacks on American culture are stunningly similar to the "Cultural Revolution" in China which was launched by communist dictator (and mass murderer) Mao Zedong in the 1960s to purge any remaining elements of capitalism from the country along with anything else that may be an obstacle to his power. The Communist Party claimed that although the capitalists had been overthrown they were "still trying to use the old ideas, culture, customs, and habits of the exploiting classes to corrupt the masses, capture their minds, and stage a comeback." [122]

To solidify his power Mao Zedong had his Red Guards (a network of student groups) violently target what were called the "Four Olds"—meaning old customs, old culture, old habits, and old ideas; in order to "transform education, literature and art, and all other parts of the superstructure that do not correspond to the socialist economic base, so as to facilitate the consolidation and development of the socialist system." [123]

This is exactly what the social justice warriors of today are doing in the United States by targeting gender norms, the nuclear family, American holidays, our history, capitalism, and free speech.

Socialism's Emergence in America Bernie Sanders popularized socialism perhaps more than anyone else in a generation, and now an increasing number of wealthy celebrities have taken up the cause. Mark Ruffalo was one of the first to endorse Sanders' presidential campaign. The Avengers star is worth over $30 million dollars and earned $6 million playing the Hulk in just one of the many Avengers films but he thinks "It's time for an economic revolution," and claims, "Capitalism today is failing us, killing us, and robbing from our children's future." [124]

John Cusack also endorsed Bernie Sanders and at one of his rallies said we need to end "predatory capitalism," which basically means forgive all debt and offer everyone free stuff paid for by those of us who work hard and save our money. [125] It's our fault that others frivolously spend their money on things they don't need instead of saving it or investing it, and now they feel they deserve ours. Jim Carrey, Britney Spears, and others are also encouraging Americans to "say yes to socialism." [126]

The Democratic candidates for president in 2020 were in a competition to see who could offer voters more free stuff: Free health care, free college, forgiving all student loans, reparations for Black people and gays, and more. Recently we've started seeing blatant anti-capitalism and pro-socialism themes in major movies and television shows which is exactly what Joseph McCarthy was worried communist sympathizers would do.

Such messages seem to have been glossed over in 2019's Joker by most viewers who were captivated by Joaquin Phoenix's disturbing performance, but they were actually at the core of the movement the Joker would come to lead. "Kill The Rich—A New Movement?" is the headline on a tabloid the Joker had in his apartment as civil unrest erupted in Gotham. "Fuck the rich! Fuck Thomas Wayne! That's what this whole fucking thing is about! Fuck the whole system!" screams one protester.

A reporter asks Mr. Wayne (Batman's father) about the "groundswell of anti-rich sentiments," adding, "It's almost as if our city's less fortunate residents are taking the side of the killer."

"What kind of coward would do something that cold-blooded?" he responds, speaking of Arthur Fleck killing three men who assaulted him on the subway, sparking his transformation into Joker. "Someone who hides behind a mask. Someone who's envious of those more fortunate than themselves."

At the very end when the Joker is a guest on a popular late-night talk show, he begins the interview saying, "It's been a rough few weeks Murray…ever since I killed those three Wall Street guys."

“Okay, I’m waiting for the punchline,” Murray (Robert De Niro) responds.

“There is no punchline. It’s not a joke.”

He goes on to rant about how awful society is and how nobody is civil anymore. “Do you think men like (billionaire) Thomas Wayne ever think what it’s like to be someone like me? To be somebody but themselves? They don’t!”

He continues ranting and gloats about the riots on the streets and the police officers who have been harmed and then shoots Murray in the face live on the air. The Joker is hailed as a hero by the mobs gathering in the streets for fighting back against the system. Throughout the riots some people are seen holding signs that say “Resist”—the same signs anti-Trump “Resistance” activists often use at their protests.

The hacking thriller Mr. Robot has been praised for its anti-capitalism themes. The main character “Elliot” wants to cause “the single biggest incident of wealth redistribution in history,” by deleting all financial records of credit card debt and mortgages. [127] The Atlantic said, “for the most part the show plays like an Occupy Wall Street fever dream.” [128] Another critic called it, “the anti-capitalist TV show we’ve been waiting for,” and praised it because it, “makes socialism a vibrant force again in popular culture.” [129]

Justin Timberlake stars in the 2011 film In Time about a future world where people are genetically programmed to stop aging at 25, and then die a year later if they can’t afford to buy any more “time.” Their remaining lifespan counts down on a timer implanted in their arm which shows how much longer they have to live. The rich people are able to afford more “time” and can live for hundreds of years, but the poor people can’t, and have to borrow “time” at high rates of interest. So Justin Timberlake decides to steal a whole bunch of “time” and distribute it to the poor people in order to “crash the system.” [130]

The Netflix series The Society is about a small town where all the adults mysteriously disappear, leaving a group of high schoolers stuck in what appears to be a parallel universe to fend for themselves while they struggle to build a new “society” in order to survive on their own.

After some of the kids decide to raid the local hardware store for supplies, fighting with each other as they scramble to take what they can, it results in a town meeting where the natural leader (the new “mayor,” who was student body president in their previous world) tells everyone they’re going to take inventory on all the food and other resources in the town and begin eating meals communally in the school cafeteria to ration it.

A group of the jocks are later shown laying around reflecting on what they had done to the hardware store and discussing the emerging government. One of them begins, “I’ve been thinking—what if we didn’t, like, take stuff? Like food or whatever. Wouldn’t be the worst thing in the world, right? Sharing. It could be like socialism. There’s no “I” in team, right?”

Another says it “kind of worked” in China because “everything’s made in China.”

“Well. Socialism it is,” they conclude. [131]

But sharing food and work responsibilities angers some of the rich kids from the town (the “haves”) who don’t want to give up their property to others (the “have nots”) or work at what they see as jobs that are beneath them, so a power struggle ensues and the “haves” organize a coup, seizing political power of the town proving how “ruthless” rich people are and the lengths they’ll go to maintain their lifestyle at the “expense” of others.

In season two of Amazon Prime’s Jack Ryan series, the cause for Venezuela’s economic and humanitarian crisis isn’t said to be from socialism failing the country, but because the president is a “nationalist.” The president’s opponent however, is “running against him on a social justice platform and on the strength of, in my humble opinion, just not being an asshole,” explains Jack Ryan. [132]

The Foundation for Economic Freedom denounced the series, pointing out that, “By making the villain of Jack Ryan a nationalist, the writers take a not-so-subtle jab at US President Donald Trump, whose ‘America First’ slogan has been described as nationalism ‘that betrays America’s values.’” [133]

The growing pro-socialist messages woven into the plots of TV series and movies caused the Orange County Register to ask, “Why does Hollywood smear capitalism, promote socialism?” [134] The answer is clear—the Marxists embedded in Hollywood are using their positions in the industry just as the Red Scare of the 1940s and 50s had feared.

In February 2020 a “Netflix for the Left” was launched called Means TV by a group of socialist film makers who helped produce campaign ads for Alexandria Ocasio-Cortez’s 2018 election to Congress. [135] It’s an “anti-capitalist” subscription service that streams documentaries, news shows, and even cartoons and comedies in order to “create the cultural foundation and need to build socialism in the U.S.” [136] It is an admittedly Marxist service that aims to incite people to rise up and “seize the means of production.” [137]

Black Lives Matter Riots of 2020

After a man named George Floyd, who was high on fentanyl and methamphetamine, [138] died while in police custody in Minneapolis, it kicked off nationwide riots and looting that went on for over a week. [139] They started locally in Minneapolis, Minnesota, where the Black community looted and burned businesses and even took over the local police station and burnt that down too. [140]

The riots and looting quickly spread to other cities across the country largely due to the mainstream media fanning the flames of racial tensions by reporting half-truths and gaslighting, giving gullible people the impression that African Americans are being systematically hunted by police and around every corner Black people minding their own business are confronted by “White supremacists.”

Celebrities were more than happy to pour gasoline on the fire, and many of them announced that they were donating money to bail out the rioters. Justin Timberlake, Chrissy Teigen, Steve Carell, Seth Rogan and many more declared that they were on the side of the mob and were helping to fund them. Others, including John Legend, Lizzo, Natalie Portman, Common, and more all signed a petition supporting the new anti-police agenda calling for police departments to be defunded and shut down. [141]

Just days later the Los Angeles mayor announced that he was cutting $100 to $150 million dollars from the LAPD budget and diverting the money to communities of color. [142] New York City mayor Bill de Blasio followed suit saying he too was cutting the NYPD budget by one billion dollars to defund the police. [143]

This just days after iconic stores like Macy’s on Fifth Avenue had been looted because police were too busy dealing with rioters in other parts of the city. “We don’t want no more police,” one protest leader told

Minneapolis mayor Jacob Frey before the mob ran him out of an event for not supporting the cause. [144]

Defunding and disbanding police departments as part the Black Lives Matter "revolution" certainly wasn't enough to satisfy the angry mob, so soon they began calling for all TV shows and movies about cops to be canceled. The Washington Post led the charge with the headline "Shut down all police movies and TV shows—Now," and just a few days later the popular "Cops" reality show was pulled from TV because it "glorified police." [145]

It had been on air for 33 seasons, beginning in 1989. Another popular cop reality show, Live PD, was also canceled. [146] These unscripted series show the dangers police officers face firsthand, but since they humanize them, the Marxists wanted the shows banned. And all this happened within two weeks of Black Lives Matter resurging.

They even targeted Paw Patrol , a cartoon for kids about dogs who work a variety of jobs like a dalmatian firefighter, a bulldog construction worker, and a German shepherd police officer. [147] The Left doesn't want children to have any positive depiction of police so they can more easily indoctrinate them into their nihilist cult and the "ACAB" (All Cops Are Bastards) ideology. It's a miracle Will Smith and Martin Lawrence didn't apologize for starring in the action comedy Bad Boys since it makes cops seem funny and cool.

Apple Music even disabled the search feature for a day, called Blackout Tuesday, to help raise "awareness" for Black Lives Matter—as if we all hadn't been hearing enough about them on the news and social media. Instead of letting people find the music they wanted to listen to, Apple replaced the Browse feature with a special curated playlist containing Black power music, including NWA's infamous "Fuck the Police." [148]

They continued marching in the streets for months claiming the United States is inherently racist against Black people and that they are being oppressed by "systemic racism" that keeps them from succeeding in life. This, while every major social media platform coddles them and even gives Black people special privileges and perks. [149] The terms of service forbidding "hate speech," harassment, and inciting violence are rarely enforced when such violations are made by non-White users.

During the 2020 Riots countless major corporations including Facebook, Twitter, Google, Amazon, Disney, McDonalds, Starbucks, Bank of America and many others released statements declaring their support for the Black Lives Matter movement and donated hundreds of thousands, or even millions of dollars each to Black communities and causes. [150]

Cable networks, including the Discovery Channel and the Disney Channel were airing Black Lives Matter PSAs, [151] and several video games including Call of Duty and FIFA 20 (soccer) added a "Black Lives Matter" message every-time the games were booted. [152]

Black Lives Matter is not about "ending racism" or "helping" Black people—it's a front for a neo-Marxist movement attempting to overthrow the United States government and uproot our Constitutional Republic. [153]

One of their original online manifestos (which has since been toned down a bit) read, "Black people will never achieve liberation under the current racialized capitalist system…The White supremacist, imperialistic, patriarchal systems needs not reform but radical transformation…We must remake the current U.S. political system in order to create a real democracy where Black people and all marginalized people can effectively exercise full political power." [154]

One of the original "founders" of the movement, Patrisse Cullors, openly admits she's a Marxist and her "intellectual influences" are Karl Marx, Vladimir Lenin, and Mao Zedong. [155] Other Black Lives Matter leaders like Yusra Khogali have written that White people are "subhuman" and are "genetic defects." [156]

They are also calling for a universal basic income [UBI], universal healthcare, reparations for slavery, the release of "all political prisoners" meaning Black people incarcerated for committing any crime, and want "a radical and sustainable redistribution of wealth." [157]

Such extremist ideas had been festering on the fringes of the Black power movement since the 1960s but now they have the unwavering support of virtually every celebrity and the entire Hollywood machine has been recalibrated to promote their cause.

Christianity Under Attack In order to destroy America, the conspirators are determined to eradicate faith in God and dismantle organized Christianity. Attacking Jesus and Christianity is a sacrament in Hollywood because the far-Left hates Jesus and everything He stands for. It's not an overstatement to say that many in key positions of power in the entertainment industry (and politics) are Satanists who will someday openly embrace Lucifer as the rebel angel kicked out of Heaven for defying God.

"I'm glad the Jews killed Christ," ranted comedian Sarah Silverman in one of her comedy specials. "Good. I'd fucking do it again!" she declares, as her audience agrees in laughter. [158] While accepting an Emmy Award one year Kathy Griffin said, "A lot of people come up here and they thank Jesus for this award. I want you to know that no one had less to do with this award than Jesus. He didn't help me a bit…so all I can say is suck it Jesus! This award is my god now!" [159]

I'm not saying people shouldn't be able to make fun of Christians, but no mainstream celebrity would dare make such insults or jokes about Muhammad because Muslims (and Jews) are vigorously protected against any criticism or mockery and only wonderful things can be said about them. Even a slightly edgy joke ignites a barrage of attacks with cries of "Islamophobia" or "anti-Semitism" and gears start moving in the well-funded and massive smear machines like the ADL and the SPLC which quickly move to destroy the person's career before they can utter another word.

Hating Christians is almost as necessary as believing in climate change if you're going to be a mainstream Hollywood celebrity. There are very few open Christians in Hollywood, most of them are has-beens like Kevin Sorbo and Kirk Cameron who have been basically blacklisted since being open about their faith.

Kevin Sorbo was banned from Comicon because he's a conservative and "pals with Sean Hannity." [160] He and other Christian actors are stuck doing low budget films that get little attention. They're allowed to exist (for now) as long as they never point out the Bible's teachings on homosexuality. Only watered down and generic Christian messages are allowed to be said.

After Guardians of the Galaxy star Chris Pratt appeared on The Late Show with Stephen Colbert and happened to discuss his "spirituality," many online began attacking him for being a Christian and attending a church. Actress Ellen Page (a lesbian) from the X-Men and Inception tweeted, “If you are a famous actor and you belong to an organization that hates a certain group of people, don’t be surprised if someone simply wonders why it’s not addressed. Being anti LGBTQ is wrong, there aren’t two sides. The damage it causes is severe. Full stop.” [161]

Singer Ellie Goulding threatened to back out of her scheduled performance at the 2019 Thanksgiving NFL halftime show if the Salvation Army didn’t pledge to donate money to LGBT causes. She got the idea after her Instagram comments were flooded with complaints from her fans because the Salvation Army was sponsoring the game to announce their annual Red Kettle Campaign (bell ringers) fundraiser for the homeless. [162] Since the Salvation Army is a Christian charity, Goulding’s fans freaked out, accusing them of being “homophobic” and “transphobic.”

They quickly bowed to the pressure and “disavowed” any anti-LGBT beliefs, which basically means they’re disavowing the Bible because even the New Testament denounces homosexuality in Romans 1:26-27 and 1st Corinthians 6:9-10. Many critics claim that only the Old Testament does, but the Book of Romans makes it clear that just because Jesus came to offer salvation doesn’t mean God’s law regarding homosexuality changed.

The Salvation Army also removed a “position statement” from their website that had made it clear “Scripture forbids sexual intimacy between members of the same sex,” and replaced it with one saying “We embrace people regardless of race, gender, ethnicity, sexual orientation, or gender identity.” [163] One of the world’s largest Christian charities whose very name “The Salvation Army” refers to the salvation of Christ, cowardly bowed down to the Leftist activists out of fear they would be branded “homophobic.”

Christians are easy targets since they’re much more passive than Jews and Muslims when attacked, and Hollywood loves to stereotype them as a bunch of superstitious bigots who don’t know how to have fun. In the rare case that there is a movie favorable to Christianity that gets widespread distribution, that too is attacked.

Passion of the Christ was deemed “anti-Semitic” because it depicts the story of Jesus’ arrest, sham trial, and crucifixion. [164] It was the most popular film about the events to be made and wasn’t a straight to DVD release like most others. With Mel Gibson behind it, the film became a huge success, which caused a tremendous backlash.

The ADL [Anti-Defamation League] denounced the film, saying it "continues its unambiguous portrayal of Jews as being responsible for the death of Jesus. There is no question in this film about who is responsible. At every single opportunity, Mr. Gibson's film reinforces the notion that the Jewish authorities and the Jewish mob are the ones ultimately responsible for the Crucifixion." [165] That's because that's what happened!

Technically, the Romans did it, but at the behest of the Jewish leadership in Jerusalem at the time. The Bible makes it very clear what led to Jesus being crucified. Pontius Pilate is quoted in Matthew 27:24 saying, "I am innocent of this man's blood," and "It is your responsibility!" meaning the Jewish Pharisees. They were the ones who conspired to have Jesus arrested and killed for "blasphemy" and being a "false" messiah. Pontius Pilate even offered to release Jesus, but the crowd demanded he release Barabbas instead, another man who was being detained for insurrection against Rome, and for murder. [166]

A critic for the New York Daily News called The Passion of the Christ , "the most virulently anti-Semitic movie made since the German propaganda films of the Second World War." [167] Many others angrily denounced the film when it came out in 2004. Some in the media even blamed it for a supposed "upsurge" in anti-Semitic hate crimes. [168]

When the History Channel miniseries The Bible was released in 2013, the same cries of "anti-Semitism" rang out. [169] The New York Times opinion editor Bari Weiss went so far as to say that it's a "conspiracy theory" that Jews killed Jesus. [170]

Even though most Christmas movies aren't overtly Christian and instead focus of the importance of families reuniting and spending time together, that doesn't mean they're not going to come under attack. As the war on western culture continues, the Marxists have set their sights on Christmas too.

Online liberal cesspool Salon.com ran a headline reading "Hallmark movies are fascist propaganda," and complained they promote "heteronormative whiteness" because there aren't enough LGBT characters or people of color in them. [171]

"Hallmark movies, with their emphasis on returning home and the pleasures of the small, domestic life, also send a not-at-all subtle signal of disdain for cosmopolitanism and curiosity about the larger world," Salon said, "which is exactly the sort of attitude that helps breed the kind of defensive White nationalism that we see growing in strength in the Donald Trump era." [172]

The article went on to say that because the Hallmark Channel airs so many Christmas movies, it is promoting, "a set of patriarchal and authoritarian values that are more about White evangelicals defining themselves as an ethnic group, and not about a genuine feeling of spirituality…The very fact that they're presented as harmless fluff makes it all the more insidious, the way they work to enforce very narrow, White, heteronormative, sexist, provincial ideas of what constitutes 'normal.'" [173]

The article wasn't satire. Salon.com has a deep-seated hatred of Christianity, conservatives and families, and is another cog in the Cultural Marxist machine working to destroy the United States.

Comedian Whitney Cummings was reported to the Human Resources department of a major Hollywood studio after she wished the crew of a TV show she was working on "Merry Christmas" when they wrapped up for the year. She made the revelation while speaking with Conan O'Brian the following December. "Last year, I was working on a TV show, [and] got in trouble with Human Resources for saying 'Merry Christmas' to an intern," she began. [174]

Conan asked her if she was being serious and she said it was a true story, elaborating, "I was leaving, like on the 18th or whatever…and I was like, 'Bye guys, Merry Christmas.'" When she returned from vacation after New Year's she was called to HR and scolded. She joked, "I don't even care how your Christmas was. It was just a formality. It's what you say when you leave." [175]

Conan O'Brien then replied, "In these times we're in, that could trigger someone or offend them if it's not their holiday." [176] She didn't say which network it was, but she's been involved with some major shows like NBC's Whitney (where she played the main character), as well as the CBS sitcom 2 Broke Girls, which she created and was a writer for.

While today it may seem impossible that Christmas movies may become a thing of the past, nobody could have ever guessed that reruns of the classic Dukes of Hazzard would get banned after the Confederate flag was deemed a "hate symbol" in 2015, or that Aunt Jemima pancake syrup, Eskimo Pie ice cream bars, and Uncle Ben’s Rice would be deemed “racially insensitive” and pulled from production a few years later. [177]

Once someone reminds liberals that the word Christmas is derived from Christ’s Mass and that it is actually a commemoration of the birth of Jesus, they may finally go over the edge and deem Christmas just as offensive as Columbus Day or the Fourth of July. And with the Muslim and Sikh populations increasing in the United States, the American standard of Christmas music playing in shopping malls and retail stores all month long every December may one day come to an end because it’s not “inclusive” and leaves non-Christians feeling “ostracized.”

Glorifying Satanism Since the Hollywood elite hate God and everything that is normal and good, it would only make sense that they have embraced Satan as their symbolic (or literal) master. The Church of Satan is an organization started by Anton LaVey in the 1960s which gained popularity among a few celebrities at the time like Sammy Davis Jr. and Jayne Mansfield. The “church” was really just Anton LaVey’s house, but he was a showman, so in the late 1960s and early 70s he was able to get some media attention for openly embracing satanism and engaging in various theatrical rituals and stunts (like serving an amputated leg for dinner that one of the members stole from a hospital he worked at). [178] While the group’s 15 minutes of fame soon faded away, satanism in Hollywood didn’t.

Rock stars and heavy metal bands in the 1980s and 90s continued to promote satanism through their music. Marilyn Manson, the self-described “anti-Christ superstar,” would often tear out pages from the Bible on stage as part of his shows. Of course he would never do that to a Quran because radical Muslims would put out a fatwa calling for him to be executed, not to mention he would be denounced as “Islamophobic,” but attacking Christians gets one hailed as a hero in Hollywood.

In the early 2010s we began to see an explosion of pop stars promoting a new brand of satanism, in the form of the Illuminati. The original Illuminati was a secret society founded in Bavaria, Germany in the late 1700s by a law professor at the University of Ingolstadt named Adam Weishaupt. While the Founding Fathers in America openly declared their views and goals to gain independence from the King of England, the Illuminati sought secrecy and subversion to escape the grasp of the Monarch in Germany.

After many of the members were discovered, rounded up and arrested, it was said the secret society was no more, but rumors have persisted for over two hundred years that they survived and continued on. The group's original plans—many of which had been discovered by seizing their letters of correspondence—detailed how the organization was structured to avoid collapsing if any of its cells were discovered. Some trace their symbols, slogans, and activities to the Skull & Bones secret society founded in 1832, and later to the Bohemian Grove, and the Bilderberg Group. [179]

Aside from being a mafia of sorts, consisting of powerful politicians, bankers, and businessmen—many people believe that these "Illuminati" members are privy to ancient philosophical secrets about the history of mankind and the "true" nature of divine forces.

Concerns and conspiracy theories about the Illuminati were mostly contained on the fringes of the Internet until the early 2010s when allegations of celebrity Illuminati involvement went viral through YouTube videos and social media postings. [180] Many rappers and pop stars began incorporating Illuminati symbols into their music videos and hinting that they were somehow a part of it. None of these musicians were members of Skull & Bones or attending the Bohemian Grove, but by promoting the Illuminati and satanism as cool, they laid the foundation for the widespread acceptance of satanism—or Luciferianism as it is also called.

Those who follow this secret doctrine believe that the God who created the world (and all living things) was actually a lower level god called the Demiurge (Jehovah), who essentially enslaved mankind through our very creation, either through malevolence or ignorance of its own lack of abilities; and so Satan/Lucifer, the "supreme" being of the Universe from this point of view, decided to enter the Demiurge's creation to "save" mankind by convincing Adam and Eve to eat from the tree of the knowledge of good and evil, giving them consciousness. [181] This strange belief that Satan is the savior, and God (the creator) is evil, is found at the core of most occult fraternities and secret societies. [182]

Such esoteric ideas had remained mostly hidden from public view for thousands of years, but now a large number of Hollywood celebrities seemed to be embracing the idea that Satan/Lucifer is good, and giving a wink and a nod that they too know the Illuminati secret. [183]

While the Illuminati fad in pop culture has passed, the open embrace of this idea—that Satan/Lucifer is actually the "savior"—will no doubt return someday and catch on like wildfire among the high priests of pop culture. A-list celebrities will declare that Satan is "king" and countless people will blindly follow their lead as they always do.

Bible prophecy predicts that one day a counterfeit Christ (the Antichrist) will declare that he is "God" and the ruler of the earth, and such proclamation will be welcomed by billions of people. And thanks to the massive cultural shifts that are taking place, the path is being paved for the widespread acceptance of the "secret doctrine" that Satan/Lucifer is really the "good" God and here to "save" mankind from the inept or malevolent creator who made a flawed world.

Abortion Because liberals celebrate hedonism, debauchery, and tend to live in the moment without any concern for the consequences, unwanted pregnancies are a common occurrence. And instead of accepting responsibility for their actions, they usually decide to kill the baby and have its remains vacuumed out of the womb, seeing such barbarism as no different than getting a wart removed. But they're upset that such a procedure has a negative stigma for so many people, so the Hollywood propaganda machine has been working behind the scenes to change that.

It's not enough for abortion activists to hope that writers will decide on their own to include pro-abortion messages in their scripts, so Planned Parenthood took it upon themselves to create their own entertainment liaison who lobbies studios to insert such themes on their behalf.

A woman named Caren Spruch is the current director of the Arts & Entertainment Engagement department at Planned Parenthood, and the Washington Post calls her their "secret weapon," admitting, "She encourages screenwriters to tell stories about abortion and works as a script doctor for those who do." [184] Spruch said that Planned Parenthood has advised studios on over 150 different movies and television shows since 2014. Their first project was a "comedy" called Obvious Child which is about a girl who has a one-night stand with some random guy after breaking up with her boyfriend and later finds out she's pregnant and gets an abortion on Valentine's Day. [185]

One of the many shows Planned Parenthood's entertainment liaison office helped "advise" is the Hulu series Shrill , which shows the lead character (Aidy Bryant) getting pregnant and deciding to have an abortion "before it becomes illegal." After killing the baby she tells her roommate she's glad she "got out of a huge fucking mess" and, "I feel very fucking powerful right now. And I just feel like I need to go out [and party]." [186]

A sociologist at the University of California, San Francisco wants more comedies about abortion to help destigmatize it. "The purpose of including an abortion plot line is simply to make jokes about abortion, recognizing that such satire is valuable for some people as both a means and an end," said Gretchen Sisson, PhD. [187]

She continued, "This should not be surprising: comedy has often been used as a subversive way of challenging predominant social structures," and she thinks abortion is "intuitive new ground for comedy to address." [188]

NBC's Parenthood included an episode where a character (played by Skyler Day) visited a Planned Parenthood clinic to get an abortion despite her boyfriend's wishes she keep the baby and the two "start a life" together. "If I have this baby, my life is over" she told him, and proceeded to kill the child.

Depicting characters getting an abortion was rare back in 2013 for network television, and the episode was celebrated for "bravely" tackling the topic. [189] The Huffington Post praised the episode as well, noting "Amy's mind was made up and there was nothing Drew could do to stop her." [190]

Melanie Roussell Newman, who works as Planned Parenthood's senior vice president of communications and culture, admitted, "We've seen pop culture change views around LGBTQ issues, for example, and pop culture has the power to challenge abortion stigma, too.” [191] Yes, that’s a real job position—they have a “communications and culture department” (as well as their Arts & Entertainment Engagement office).

One Planned Parenthood affiliate even said that there should be a cartoon where a Disney princess gets an abortion. [192] Many people believed the statement to be an Internet hoax, but it is real, and they later explained, “Planned Parenthood believes that pop culture—television shows, music, movies—has a critical role to play in educating the public and sparking meaningful conversations around sexual and reproductive health issues and policies, including abortion.” [193]

Another organization called the Center for Reproductive Rights was recently formed to promote abortion through entertainment. [194] Chairwoman Elizabeth Banks said her goal is to make abortion stigma-free and wants girls getting one to be seen as symbolic of “liberty itself.” [195]

Comedian Michelle Wolf had a short-lived show on Netflix where she once did a segment titled “Salute to Abortions” which consisted of her being joined on stage by a marching band as she shouted to the audience, “It doesn’t have to be a big deal, it’s actually a great deal! It’s about $300 dollars. That’s like six movie tickets.” The segment ended with her declaring, “God bless abortions, and God bless America!” [196] She later revealed that she herself had gotten one and it made her feel “very powerful” and “like God.” [197]

Actress Lena Dunham once admitted she wished she had gotten an abortion so should could “better understand” other women who have had them. [198] When actress “Busy Philipps” was at a pro-abortion rally in March 2020 she stood at the podium and screamed (literally screamed) about how glad she was to have gotten one when she was a teenager since it allowed her to become a star.

“Soon I would be driving my hybrid [car] to my beautiful fucking home…and I have all of this! All of it! Because I was allowed bodily autonomy at fifteen!” [199]

“I will not be shamed into being quiet. We will not be shamed into being quiet. Never again! I will never stop talking about my abortion or my periods or my experiences in childbirth, my episiotomies, my yeast infections, or my ovulation that lines up with the moon!” [200] After seeing her unhinged rant, one might think it was someone playing a character and doing a parody sketch of a pro-abortion activist, but she really meant it and screamed it at the top of her lungs. She was happy to sacrifice her baby for fame and fortune.

Bowing to China It’s interesting to note that Hollywood is increasingly bowing to China’s cultural standards in order to maintain distribution channels there. The Communist government has strict rules about which films are allowed to be seen in China, and in hopes of pleasing them, various plots are changed and scenes altered before they are put into production.

When the trailer for the Top Gun sequel was released, some eagle-eyed fans noticed that a Taiwanese flag patch which had been sown onto Tom Cruise’s jacket along with a few other country’s flags where his father had flown missions, was now missing. [201] Taiwan has been in an ongoing dispute with China trying to become an independent country, but China still claims the island as their territory and in another apparent attempt to appease the Chinese government, Top Gun producers removed the Taiwanese flag from Cruise’s jacket because it simply being there symbolized Taiwan was not part of China, but their own country.

DC Comics also censored a promotional image for a Batman comic that was posted on their Instagram and Twitter accounts after some people in China interpreted it as supporting Hong Kong in their struggle for independence. The picture showed Batman throwing a Molotov cocktail with the caption “the future is young.” [202]

Protests by separatists had been growing in Hong Kong, and mostly involved college age people using social media to organize, and some read too much into the Batman picture thinking it supported them, so DC Comics deleted it so it wouldn’t cause any issues with their distribution there.

The 2015 film Pixels starring Adam Sandler and Kevin James about aliens in the form of popular video game characters invading planet earth was altered so China wouldn’t get offended. While waging war against our planet—in one scene an Arkanoid paddle, similar to Breakout, was supposed to destroy part of the Great Wall of China since in the game players bounce a ball against bricks to break them apart, but the censors changed that scene to depict the object destroying the Taj Mahal in India instead. [203]

The zombie action movie World War Z was based on a book that described the virus outbreak turning people into zombies starting in China, which is ultimately nuked, leaving Lhasa, Tibet the largest remaining city in the world. But for the film, producers changed the location of the outbreak to Korea and of course China wasn't nuked because they had nothing to do with it.

Apparently the Chinese government has banned the distribution of any films featuring zombies, and the Hollywood Reporter noted that a sequel was in the works for World War Z but later canceled because Paramount wouldn't be able to distribute the film internationally there. [204] The Chinese market is huge, and if studios are pitched a film they know won't be allowed in China, they're often inclined to pass on making it altogether.

"You're not going to see something that's like Seven Years in Tibet anymore," said Larry Shinagawa, a college professor at Hawaii's Tokai International College. [205] The 1997 film which stars Brad Pitt takes place in the 1940s and 1950s when Tibet was struggling for independence from China, but that's too offensive to the Chinese these days and similar films may hurt distribution deals for other, unrelated projects.

Richard Gere's Red Corner (1997) was perhaps the last major film critical of Communist China to be made. In it, Gere plays a businessman who is framed for the murder of a Chinese general's daughter while on a trip there, and soon realizes how corrupt their legal system is.

In First Man (2018), a biopic about Neal Armstrong and the Apollo 11 landing on the moon, the film didn't show one of the most iconic scenes in history—Neal Armstrong and Buzz Aldrin planting the American flag on the moon once they arrived. When viewers noticed this strange omission Ryan Gosling, who played Armstrong, defended its absence saying landing on the moon was a "human achievement" not an American one. [206]

Others had their suspicions the scene wasn't depicted to avoid making the film too American in hopes it could be distributed in China. It doesn't make any sense that a movie about one of America's greatest achievements wouldn't proudly show the historic scene of the American flag being victoriously planted in the ground on the moon after we won the Space Race.

Ryan Gosling and the producers couldn’t admit to the public the real reason for omitting the scene, because it would shock filmgoers across the country and perhaps cause people to boycott the movie for downplaying our own greatness in attempts to make more money through distribution in China. Hollywood stays very quiet about the lengths they go to in hopes of achieving that.

Even the NBA has sold out to China. When the general manager of the Houston Rockets basketball team tweeted support for Hong Kong in the midst of growing protests there hoping to gain their independence, it sparked an enormous problem for the NBA because their games are broadcast in China since they are surprisingly very popular there. Adding to the problem was Chinese native Yao Ming (the 7-foot 6-inch star) had played for the Houston Rockets before retiring.

Stars like James Harden praised China saying “We apologize. You know, we love China.” [207] LeBron James said the coach “wasn’t educated” about the situation and that his tweet “harmed” people financially and could have “physically” harmed them as well. [208] Despite celebrity athletes always supporting “good causes” and denouncing racism, police shootings, and human rights abuses around the world, none of them were saying a word about how China treated their citizens or that one million Muslims have been locked up in re-education camps there. [209]

Immigration To say that the United States is being invaded by illegal immigrants is an understatement, but we’re now living in a period of time where certain facts are considered to be “hate speech” and the liberal media gaslights their audience trying to get them to deny their own lying eyes. Over 20 million illegal aliens have breached our border and are currently living in the United States, [210] most of which drain financial and social resources which they don’t even pay into—but to admit the extent of the illegal alien problem is strictly forbidden. In fact, the term

“illegal alien” is now considered “hate speech.” [211]

In 2019 almost 400,000 anchor babies were born in the United States from illegal alien mothers. In 48 of the 50 states there were more babies born by illegal alien mothers than ones who were born by women who are U.S. citizens. [212]

Flooding the United States with immigrants from third world countries is a primary objective of the globalists because it erodes patriotism, our cultural heritage, and hastens their planned economic collapse which they look to seize upon in order to launch their socialist revolution. During the early Democratic presidential debates for the 2020 election, every single Democrat candidate on stage raised their hand when asked if they support giving free healthcare to illegal aliens. [213]

There are even reports of Mexicans waiting (and hoping) for Donald Trump to lose his re-election bid in November 2020, who plan to then illegally enter the U.S. because they feel their chances of getting in and being able to stay will be almost assured. [214] The more illegals the better for Democrats, who hope to one day grant them all amnesty and make them U.S. citizens (and their new voter base), destroying any chances of Republicans winning a national election again for generations.

So aside from the Democrat Party and the mainstream “news” media calling for a nonstop influx of immigrants to bring this about, Hollywood is helping as much as they can as well. Often brief pro-illegal immigration messages will be inserted into the dialogue of a show or a character will comment how “terrible” President Trump’s immigration policies are, but now we’re even seeing entire television series dedicated to promoting illegal immigration and demonizing anyone who wants to secure the border.

We all know Hollywood loves to reboot old shows from decades ago, from Hawaii Five-0 and Murphy Brown to MacGyver , hoping to cash-in on the nostalgia original fans had for the series. One of those reboots was Party of Five , which originally aired in the 1990s and was about a family of five kids (ages one to twenty-four) who had to fend for themselves after both of their parents were killed in a car accident by a drunk driver.

But in 2020, it was rebooted to depict a Mexican family whose parents got deported because of President Trump's crackdown on illegal aliens! The five kids (who are anchor babies because they were born in the U.S.) are then left here to fend for themselves. [215] The show was canceled after just one season. [216]

In 2017, the New York Times expressed their frustration that there weren't enough illegal aliens in starring roles or television shows that focus on them and their struggles, so they called on studios to green-light more series about "Dreamers"—the millions of illegal aliens smuggled into the United States by their parents that President Obama gave amnesty to. [217] Producers listened, and soon plots about "innocent" illegal aliens being persecuted would become a common occurrence.

ICE Are the New Bogymen After Roseanne Barr's character was killed off and the series renamed The Connors due to her infamous "offensive tweet" about Obama administration official Valerie Jarrett, her daughter "Becky" in the show got knocked up by an illegal alien who worked as a busboy at the same Mexican restaurant she waitressed at. He later called her one day to let her know that he got caught up in an ICE (Immigration and Custom Enforcement) raid and she breaks down in tears out of fear that now the baby is going to have to grow up without a father because he's being deported. [218]

NBC's sitcom Superstore featured ICE agents coming to the fictional retail giant "Cloud 9" (the "superstore" at the center of the show) to arrest an illegal immigrant who works there in the season finale. Her fellow employees tried to help her escape the agents. [219]

Netflix's female prison drama Orange is the New Black also featured ICE agents as the bad guys who arrested a major character just when she was about to be released from prison for an unrelated crime, leaving her boyfriend waiting outside with a bouquet of flowers devastated that he wasn't getting reunited with her. [220]

In an episode of the CW's Two Sentences Horror Story, a Latino nanny fends off would-be robbers trying to break into the family's home that she works for, but when the heroic nanny makes the news, ICE agents discovered she was undocumented and soon paid her a visit, thus the horrifying twist at the end. [221]

Charisse L'Pree Corsbie-Massay, a professor at the Newhouse School of Public Communications at Syracuse University, says, "ICE has emerged as a villain in popular discourse, and now we're seeing that on screen. But these ICE agents are one-off characters with no lines and no names. They're just representations of ICE, the faceless government entity. Their only role is to play the villain to our characters." [222]

Pamela Rutledge, the director of the Media Psychology Research Center, said, "Making ICE agents as bad guys exacerbates the political fission surrounding the immigration issues…Whether you agree or disagree with current policies, it is important to understand how fiction can inform beliefs on current issues where most people have little actual experience." [223]

During the Trump administration we've seen more open border messages being sprinkled into shows than ever before. In Showtime's Shameless one character (Frank Gallagher) played by William H. Macy, announces he's having a keg party at his house and is charging people 10 bucks at the door to get in, and adds that unlike this "piece of shit country," his "border" turns away no one. [224]

Pop singer Kesha released a song and music video dedicated to DACA illegal aliens (Dreamers) called "Hymn" where she sings, "Even the stars and the moon don't shine quite like we do. Dreamers searchin' for the truth. After all we've been through, no, we won't stand and salute [the flag]." [225]

The medical drama Grey's Anatomy had an episode about an illegal immigrant who reluctantly takes her daughter to the hospital to finally get healthcare she's been neglecting out of fear that she would get deported. Lobbying agency Hollywood, Health & Society convinced the writers to include that plot point to highlight the concerns illegal aliens have about getting deported if they go to a hospital. [226]

Even the rebooted Twilight Zone on CBS featured an episode where "welcoming illegal immigrants" was the "moral of the story" at the end. An upper middle class woman’s housekeeper is detained by ICE and scheduled to be deported, and despite working for the family for over a decade, the family’s friends seem fairly callous about her situation. “These people know the risks when they come here,” a neighbor says. [227]

The homeowner herself, Eve, is later revealed to be an illegal immigrant as well—from another dimension, who came to ours thirty years ago to live among humans on earth after fleeing terrible living conditions on her own planet. In the end, she is also detained and hauled off screaming, now facing deportation herself, back to where she came from.

The episode concludes with narrator Jordan Peele giving the “moral” of the story, saying, “We are all immigrants from somewhere, be it another city, another country, or another dimension. As a child, Eve Martin escaped to what should have been a better world. A world where the skies are blue. But now those skies have darkened, and the land below them is a place she is no longer welcome. For Eve Martin, there’s no passport to be stamped for passage out of the Twilight Zone.” [228]

Other Attempts There were reports that Jane the Virgin star Gina Rodriguez was hoping to produce a TV series about a college student who found out they were an undocumented immigrant, and reportedly had a pilot episode made for the CW network, but so far it hasn’t been picked up. [229] Then CBS reportedly bought the rights and hoped they could get the show to air under the working title of Rafa the Great . [230]

Gina Rodriquez is also trying to get another show called Have Mercy produced, which is about a Latina doctor who immigrates to Miami but is unable to practice medicine in the United States for whatever reason (probably because the medical school she went to is considered substandard), and so she decides to open an illegal clinic run out of her apartment to help her Latino neighbors. [231]

CBS shot a pilot episode for In the Country We Love , based on Diane Guerreros’s memoir of having her parents deported back to Columbia when she was a teenager, but it doesn't appear to have been picked up. [232] Probably because it's too similar to the Party of Five reboot.

Another planned series called Casa (Spanish for Home) was shopped around which is about a family of immigrants who have to fend for themselves after their parents are deported. [233] It's unknown if the idea was dropped because it's identical to the Party of Five reboot, or if the series was just rebranded as that. It's likely numerous different scripts about the same premise floated around Hollywood before one of them finally got picked up since it's such a predictable plot, and several different writers probably thought it was the next big idea.

DACA dramas are becoming "TV's new obsession" in the United States. [234] Even Apple TV, which has recently joined the television production business, produced an immigration series called Little America about a 12-year-old boy from India whose parents were deported, and he is left to run his father's hotel. Each episode tries to "go beyond the headlines to look at the funny, romantic, heartfelt, inspiring and unexpected lives of immigrants in America, at a time when their stories are more relevant than ever." [235]

In 2019 Netflix released a documentary titled After the Raid which follows the lives of several people in a small town in Tennessee after ICE officers conducted a roundup of illegal aliens there in order to guilt trip White people into feeling bad for the "Latino families" that were "broken up." [236] Netflix is also producing a documentary series about illegal aliens with singer/actress Selena Gomez called Living Undocumented , which follows around eight families that are at risk of being deported.

Gomez told the Hollywood Reporter that, "I chose to produce this series, Living Undocumented , because over the past few years, the word 'immigrant' has seemingly become a negative word. My hope is that the series can shed light on what it's like to live in this country as an undocumented immigrant firsthand, from the courageous people who have chosen to share their stories." [237]

Executive producer Aaron Saidman said, "Living Undocumented is designed to illuminate one of the most important issues of our time. But rather than discussing this issue with only statistics and policy debates, we wanted viewers to hear directly from the immigrants themselves, in their own words, with all the power and emotion that these stories reflect." [238]

It's not just TV shows. For years feature length films have been subtly promoting immigration. District 9 put a unique spin on an alien invasion story by depicting the aliens arriving to earth, not to kill us and conquer our planet, but apparently in a desperate search of a new home. The friendly aliens were malnourished and weak from their long journey and presumably came here looking for help, only to be mistreated by humans and forced to live in a slum called "District 9" that serves as a giant internment camp surrounded by barbed wire and armed guards.

In the end, the lead "immigration" official who had previously harassed and abused the aliens is turned into one himself after being exposed to a DNA-mutating agent, and is forced to live in District 9 as one of them. The entire film was a cheesy allegory about racial segregation and xenophobia. [239]

In Machete (2010), Danny Trejo plays an illegal immigrant and vigilante living in Texas who is seen as a folk hero for killing a bunch of evil White people trying to stop illegal immigration. The film's catchphrase is "We didn't cross the border, the border crossed us." The White people are depicted as stupid or evil and at one point Robert DeNiro's character, who is part of a volunteer border patrol group, even murders a Mexican kid after they catch him trying to cross the border. "Welcome to America," he says, just before pulling the trigger. Danny Trejo then kills all the White "devils."

When some people denounced the film for seemingly encouraging anti-White violence, the Southern Poverty Law Center stepped in to defend it, calling it, "an argument for comprehensive immigration reform," [240] meaning an argument for open borders since the bad guys in the film (aside from the Mexican drug cartel) were White people who didn't want illegal aliens crossing the border into the United States.

Elysium is a 2013 science fiction action film starring Matt Damon about a futuristic society where most of the inhabitants of earth live in extreme poverty and lack basic healthcare, while a small elite group live in luxury on a space station (called Elysium) that orbits the planet. Those not authorized to land on Elysium are deemed illegal immigrants and are "deported" or even have their aircraft shot down before reaching it. [241] Matt Damon's best friends' daughter has leukemia and is in need a medical treatment, so he helps smuggle her to the space station to save her, despite the elite's best efforts to stop him.

A film critic from Variety wrote that Elysium was, “one of the more openly socialist political agendas of any Hollywood movie in memory, beating the drum loudly not just for universal healthcare, but for open borders, unconditional amnesty, and the abolition of class distinctions as well.” [242]

Entertainment Weekly critic Sean Smith said, “If you are a member of the 1 percent (referring to the Occupy Wall Street movement which was occurring at the time the film was released), Elysium is a horror movie. For everyone else, it’s one step shy of a call to arms.” [243]

Mexican Drug Cartels Are Good Action films need “bad guys,” and for generations those bad guys have often been Mexican or Colombian drug cartels, but now those kinds of plots have been deemed xenophobic and racist out of concerns that they cast Latinos in a negative light. When the trailer dropped for Sylvester Stallone’s latest Rambo film (Last Blood) it showed the iconic character fighting against a Mexican drug cartel and liberals immediately called it “xenophobic” and “anti-Mexican” propaganda. [244]

Rambo’s adopted niece, who is of Mexican descent, runs away to Mexico hoping to find her birth mother, but is kidnapped by the cartel and forced into prostitution, but leave it to liberals to defend sex trafficking and get upset because an iconic American film hero hunts down and kills the traffickers! The Daily Beast said the film was “designed to prove the president’s claim that we need to Build That Wall,” and that “Rambo has gone full MAGA.” [245]

One reviewer called it “deeply xenophobic” and said that the film “should be end of line for the character.” [246] Another critic called it a “hyper-violent xenophobic revenge fantasy” and said “It’s all a setup for Last Blood to live out every assault rifle owner’s worst fears and most insane fantasies about Mexico. The only way it could be more transparent is if Stallone had growled ‘I. Am. The Wall!’ in his best Judge Dredd voice.”

[247] Some idiot even called it a "radicalizing recruitment video," for right wing extremists. [248]

On Rotten Tomatoes it got only a 27% positive rating from critics, while 85% of viewers gave it a thumbs up—a disparity often seen on Rotten Tomatoes where critics now trash politically incorrect comedy specials and movies that are well-received by viewers.

In 2018, Sicario: Day of the Soldado was released starring Josh Brolin and Benicio del Toro who battle drug cartels in the stereotypical fashion, and it too set off a wave of crying critics, one saying "it doubles down on violent fantasies about another Mexican-American War," and "feels like a piece of state-sanctioned propaganda, a MAGA-sploitation thriller that does not see humanity in our neighbors." [249]

Jennifer Garner starred in a film called Peppermint (2018) in which her husband and daughter are murdered by a drug cartel, so she becomes a vigilante hunting and killing them. The New Yorker called the movie "racist" and "ignorant." [250] Another critic said it was "irresponsible" to make movies where the bad guys are Mexican drug cartels anymore because they "portray Latinos as animals." [251] NBC News said the film "is a poorly written blockbuster filled with racist stereotypes. Hollywood should know better." [252]

Until the Trump era, nobody thought that films about fighting Mexican drug cartels were problematic, but because of the hyper-vigilant Twitter outrage mobs that organize harassment campaigns hoping to stomp out any opposing ideas, the entire plot point may be all but abandoned by studios out of fear that their movies will be poorly reviewed by critics who deem them "racist."

The Immigration Endgame Pat Buchanon warned in his 2002 book The Death of the West that, "Uncontrolled immigration threatens to deconstruct the nation we grew up in and convert America into a conglomeration of peoples with almost nothing in common—not history, heroes, language, culture, faith, or ancestors." [253]

He goes on, “Millions have no desire to learn English or become citizens. America is not their home; Mexico is; and they wish to remain proud Mexicans. They have come here to work. Rather than assimilate, they create Little Tijuanas in U.S. cities, just as Cubans have created a Little Havana in Miami…With their own radio and TV stations, newspapers, films, and magazines, the Mexican Americans are creating an Hispanic culture separate and apart from America’s larger culture. They are becoming a nation within a nation.” [254]

Many Latinos actually want to create a new country in the Southwest called Aztlan that would include California, Arizona, New Mexico, Texas, and other states in the region. [255] The name refers to a mythical homeland of the Aztecs which Chicanos (Mexicans) want to restore. Mario Obledo, the president of the League of United Latin American Citizens, said, “California is going to be a Mexican State. We are going to control all the institutions. If people don’t like it, they should leave.” [256] Never mind that if California was still part of Mexico the water wouldn’t be safe to drink.

On college campuses in the Southwest various Chicano student groups exist to further the cause, including MEChA (the Chicano Student Movement of Aztlan) and La Raza (recently renamed to UnidosUS). These groups (and others) are really acting as agents of a foreign government, which means they should have to register with the Department of Justice as such, but it’s doubtful any members of La Raza, MEChA, or any other pro-illegal alien activist groups have.

For the globalists plan for the New World Order to be complete, first large regions of the various continents must be merged into unions that act as the governing bodies for those countries, and then their different currencies merged into a single unit as well. The European Union (EU) and their common currency (the Euro) is the model for the rest of the world. Plans to merge the United States, Canada, and Mexico into the “North American Union” (NAU) which would use a new common currency (called the Amero), have been drafted, and the schemers are waiting for the day they can force their agenda through. [257]

Similar regional mergers, such as the Asian Union, the Middle Eastern Union, and the African Union, are also in the plan, which would each have their own common currency as well. And once they are all formed, the final step would be to merge all of those regional unions into a single global governing system along with each of their respective currencies, ultimately forming a one world government and a single digital global currency.

War on White People Despite Hollywood’s insistence on wanting to end all bigotry and promote “tolerance” for everything; there is a growing anti-White sentiment where White people are regularly demonized, ostracized, and blamed for all the problems in the world. At the same time, Hollywood does everything they can to portray Blacks and Latinos as perpetual victims of “whiteness” whose lives have been ruined for generations because of “White privilege.” According to Hollywood, Black people never do anything wrong, or if they do it’s a result of the circumstances in their life which put them in that position because of “systematic” and “institutional racism” at the hands of White people.

John Langley, the creator of the reality show COPS, admitted he purposefully didn’t allow many segments which involved police confrontations with Black suspects, and instead aired more where White people were being detained and arrested because he didn’t want to promote the “stereotype” that Black people tend to be criminals. [258] Never mind Department of Justice statistics which show that Black people make up approximately 13% of the population in the United States, but are responsible for close to 50% of the total murders. [259] Just pointing out statistics like that is considered to be racist, and the ADL considers 13/50 a “numeric hate symbol.” [260]

“Diversity” is a code word meaning less White people, and in recent years Hollywood has been obsessed with what liberals believe are too many White people starring in films and TV shows. In 2015 after the Academy Award nominees were announced, the hashtag #OscarsSoWhite went viral from people complaining that there weren’t any Black people nominated for Best Actor or Best Actress that year. [261] In their minds Black people are the best , and it must have been because of “racism” that none happened to be nominated for those spots that year.

From that point on their foot was in the door, and each year after that there would be more scrutiny over how many “people of color” were nominated and which actors won, and how many White people starred in TV shows and films. Every time nominees were mentioned, media reports would flood the Internet about the “lack of diversity” and how “problematic” it was. [262]

“Why do snubs for women and people of color keep happening?” they would ask every time half of the nominees weren’t Black or Latino. [263] Fans of Jenifer Lopez were so upset that she wasn’t nominated for Best Actress for her role as a stripper in Hustlers they took to Twitter (as usual) to complain about it, demanding “Justice for J. Lo.” [264] In the film she plays one of a group of strippers who drug and then defraud rich men who come into their club, running up their credit cards. Not exactly Oscar material, but she must have gotten “snubbed” because she’s Latino!

Others were equally upset that Jamie Foxx (Just Mercy), Lupita Nyong’o (Us), Awkwafina (The Farewell), and Eddie Murphy (Dolemite Is My Name) weren’t nominated for anything either one year. All because of “racism,” not that they had mediocre performances or others who happened to be White made more of an impact.

When Toy Story 4 was nominated for Best Animated Feature at the Golden Globes, some lunatics voiced their concerns that none of the toys in the franchise were Black! [265] Keep in mind that Woody, Bow Peep, and Buzz Light Year are the only “human” toys. The rest are ones like Mr. Potato Head, a dog, a pig, a dinosaur, etc. The Hollywood Reporter complained about the “near-absence of people of color,” despite two toys being voiced by the Black comedy duo Jordan Peele and Keegan-Michael Key, but that’s not good enough.

Their review went on to complain that not only are each of the lead toys Caucasian, but a new character (Forky) is a “very white fork.” [266] The toy is homemade, created out of a plastic spork, some stick-on googly eyes, and has pipe cleaners for arms. It’s a spork, it doesn’t have a race, but the lunatic film reviewer saw it as another “Caucasian” toy because it’s white, which most plastic utensils are.

The reviewer was also upset because, “in many ways [Toy Story 4’s] worldview seems like an Eisenhower-era fantasy, a vision of America that might have come from the most die-hard reactionary: lovely if you’re wealthy and White, but alarming if you’re Black or brown or gay or a member of any other minority—in other words, more than half the U.S. population.” [267]

There weren’t enough Black people in Joker to please some critics either, even though Joaquin Phoenix’s character starts dating a neighbor of his who is a single Black mother. Time magazine complained that her character had too small of a role, saying, “In Joker, Black women are visible but they are not seen,” whatever the hell that means. [268]

The review went on to complain about the roles other Black people had in the film such as the Joker’s social worker. She doesn’t really listen to his problems and is just going through the motions, thus missing another opportunity to possibly steer him away from ultimately becoming a psychotic killer. That's casting a Black person in a negative light, and "racist." Another Black character, a random woman on a bus, scolds him to stop "bothering" her son when all he was doing was being nice to the kid, and that's perpetuating "racism" too by furthering the "angry Black woman" stereotype.

The 2019 film Little Women, which is based on a novel written in 1868 about four young girls living during the Civil War and coming of age, is also "too White." A writer for Teen Vogue , a Marxist publication dedicated to perverting the minds of teen girls, wrote that when old literary classics are made into films, they need to "better incorporate diversity." [269]

Another critic said that it "romanticizes White privilege" and that "casual racism is merely the start of its problems." They concluded that "Little Women is, indeed, rooted in the advantages of bourgeois White womanhood." [270] We can't have films anymore where the story just so happens to be about people who are White, because that's not "diverse" enough.

The Hollywood Reporter complained that Christmas movies on the Hallmark Channel don't have enough Black people in them and "struggles to give diversity a home for the holidays." [271] Their complaint begins with a snarky, "While other networks are viewing the holidays with an eye toward inclusion, Hallmark is delivering the dream of a white Christmas, just like the one's audiences used to know," and then notes, "Of the network's record 24 original holiday movies this season, four of them have Black leads," but "that's down from last year, when five of its 21 original holiday movies had Black leads." [272] Others have complained about Hallmark movies being "too White" as well. [273]

In my previous book Liberalism: Find a Cure I detailed how many on the Left are upset that Santa Claus is White, and are now calling him a symbol of "White supremacy." [274] Some are so determined to destroy Santa's image that publishing giant Harper Collins released a book called Santa's Husband which depicts him as a homosexual "married" to a Black man. CNN gleefully gave the author airtime to promote the book when it came out. [275]

Director Tim Burton, the man behind Edward Scissorhands (1990), Beetlejuice (1988), and The Nightmare Before Christmas (1993) angered the Diversity Police because he didn't cast a "diverse group of characters" in his movie Miss Peregrine's Home for Peculiar Children (2016) since Samuel L. Jackson was the only Black person in it. He began trending on Twitter from so many "woke" people calling him a racist. [276]

Actor Jonah Hill said that "real change" in the industry will come only when White men no longer run the studios and streaming companies. [277] While celebrities obsessively complain about too many White people being in positions of power in Hollywood and starring in too many shows (and winning too many awards); none of them would ever commit the cardinal sin of the entertainment industry by asking about Jewish influence in Hollywood. [278]

Everyone knows that would kill their career overnight no matter how earnestly or tactfully it was brought up, but complaining about too many White men having positions of power in the industry has become a rallying cry for social justice warriors.

There are numerous specials on Comedy Central and Netflix which feature Black and Latino comedians whose entire act is basically making fun of White people, which is fine—and sometimes funny, but we all know the double standard. Few White comedians will dare make jokes about Blacks or Latinos. Jokes about Asians used to be acceptable, but those too would be career suicide today. Blacks and Latinos can "joke" about how they "hate White people" or complain about "the problem with White people" and often their distain is obvious, and their "jokes" are just thinly veiled racism—but that's just fine.

Black sitcoms often include subplots about how the families are living in a hostile country and White people around every corner hate them. [279] An entire episode of ABC's sitcom Black-ish was about how "America hates Black people" with a lead character telling members of her family that repeatedly throughout the show. [280]

90's Sitcoms Now "Too White"

Since "diversity" dominates these days, many classic shows from the past are now seen in hindsight as "racist" because there are "too many" White people in them. Beverly Hills 90210 , Seinfeld , Home Improvement , Everybody Loves Raymond , Growing Pains , Family Ties , Cheers , Frasier , Full House , Dawson's Creek , Friends , and more all "lack diversity." [281]

Even with the rash of revivals and reboots, critics are upset that many of the shows' racial makeup remained the same. The Hollywood Reporter complained about the "blinding whiteness of nostalgia TV." [282] In the return of Roseanne , however, producers ensured there was some "diversity" by depicting her son D.J. as having married a Black woman and has a Black daughter with her. [283]

Friends star David Schwimmer would later suggest that his show be rebooted with an all-Black or Asian group of friends. He went on to virtue signal that, "I campaigned for years to have Ross [his character] date women of color. One of the first girlfriends I had on the show was an Asian American woman, and later I dated African American women. That was a very conscious push on my part." [284]

These days White people are considered racist if they prefer dating only White people. [285] No other race faces the same pressures for personal relationships and families to become more "racially diverse"—only White people.

And despite David Schwimmer's hopes for a "Black Friends" reboot, that show has already been made—and before Friends. It was called Living Single , and Friends was basically an all-White reboot of that show, but there will never be enough "diversity" in sitcoms and feature films. No matter how many shows feature an all-Black cast, or star Black characters, the Left will never be satisfied.

There were plenty of Black sitcoms in the 1990s, like The Fresh Prince of Bel-Air , Family Matters , A Different World , Martin , Roc , Hangin' with Mr. Cooper , The Hughleys , The Wayans Bros , The Cosby Show , and many more. All with Black stars and few, if any, White actors involved, but God forbid sitcoms exist with a White-only cast! Of course Black-only shows were made long before the 90s, and continue to be made today—like Empire , Power , Black-ish , Grown-ish , and many others, and nobody complains that there aren't any White lead actors or threaten to boycott those shows for not being "diverse" enough.

Not Enough Mexicans The mayor of Los Angeles, Eric Garcetti, wants to double the number of Latinos in TV shows and movies within the next ten years, and launched a project called “LA Collab” in order to “connect Latinx talent, executives, and creators to opportunities in the entertainment industry.” [286] Latinx , if you’re wondering, is the new politically correct gender neutral term for Latino , since even that is problematic these days, but that’s a topic for a whole other book. [287]

Los Angeles County contains 4.9 million Hispanics and now there are at least 60 million of them living in the United States (20 million of which are illegal aliens), so Hollywood is doing everything they can to cater to them. For example, Jimmy Kimmel’s little sidekick Guillermo—who speaks broken English—is paid $500,000 dollars a year to stand off to the side of the stage and laugh at his jokes and chime in once in a while with his catch phrase, “That’s right Jimmy!” Before becoming a fixture on air for the show he worked as a security guard in the parking lot of ABC Studios making $8.00 an hour. [288]

There have also been a flood of TV shows starring Latinos in recent years, including the Magnum PI reboot, but there will never be enough to satisfy the social justice warriors. Every show and movie must have a “diverse” cast (meaning fewer White people). Every popular series must have a Black, Asian, and Latino equivalent.

Soon there will probably be growing calls for Arab versions of hit shows, since those of Middle Eastern descent will clamor about being “under-represented” in American entertainment. And after that it will be the Indians (or Native Americans, or Indigenous people, or whatever politically correct term they’re calling themselves these days), and then probably the Eskimos. We’re sliding down a slippery slope of stupidity with no end.

Obsessed with White Sins of the Past The one kind of movie Hollywood loves to make more than crime thrillers or action-adventures are ones that highlight how “racist” White people are. “Historical dramas” about how awful White people are and how the films "reflect what's still happening today" come out every year. Some of them are Black revenge fantasies like Django Unchained. Actor Jamie Foxx even bragged about killing a bunch of White people in the film when he was a featured guest on Saturday Night Live , saying, "I get to kill all the White people, how great is that?" [289]

The film incited some Black people to vent their fantasies of killing White people themselves, flooding Twitter with their hatred in tweets like, "Django got me wanting to kill White people!" and "After watching Django, all I wanna do is shoot White people." [290]

Of course, you can't tell disgruntled Blacks who hate America to "go back to Africa," because that would be "racist." Everything is "racist" to liberals. Black people's obsession with racism of the past can be seen in the obvious double standard of demanding White people not be "allowed" to say "the n-word" even while singing along to popular rap songs.

Kendrick Lamar brought a fan on stage to perform one of his songs with him in 2018, but stopped the show mid-performance because the girl (who was White) rapped along to the original lyrics which included the word "nigga" in the hook. After about 30 seconds he told the DJ to stop the music and started staring at the girl. "Am I not cool enough for you, bro?" she asks, thinking that her rapping wasn't good enough. He went on to tell her the "rules" and said she had to bleep that word. She apologized, and then they started again. [291]

When Latino actress Gina Rodriguez sang a few lines from a rap song that included "nigga" in the lyrics (as most rap songs do) and posted it on her Instagram, Blacks (and SJW Whites) freaked out so bad she became the top trend on Twitter. [292] She then apologized. The same thing happened when a star of the Bachelorette was singing along to a rap song on Instagram Live. [293] Most Black people get more upset when a White person says the word than they do when gang bangers end up killing an innocent kid in their neighborhood with a stray bullet.

As Black radio host Jessie Lee Peterson points out, "They're not [actually] offended! They pretend to be in order to scare White folks and shake 'em down for stuff." [294] Imagine if White people demanded that Black people weren’t allowed to use certain words! Democrats in Congress would hold hearings and pass a resolution denouncing such outrageous word policing and it would be a national scandal, but the word “nigga” mustn’t be uttered out loud by White people, because it’s their word.

On the Lookout for Racism Many Black people (and White SJWs) are so hyper-sensitive and obsessed with racism that they hallucinate and often see it where none exists. For example, Roseanne Barr was fired from her hit TV show within just a few hours after making a joke about Valerie Jarrett, a former advisor to Barack Obama, when she tweeted that Valerie looked like a character from the Planet of the Apes movies; and if you saw a side by side photo of her and that character, you would know why Rosanne said that. But it turns out that Valerie Jarett is half Black, although you would never guess from looking at her. Rosanne later explained, “I thought the bitch was White!” which most people did. [295]

Her show was number one on ABC, but the network immediately fired her and then continued the show, calling it The Conners after killing off her character with an opioid overdose from pain pills she was taking for knee pain. [296] Of course Rosanne is not a racist, and in the 1990s the original series promoted a lot of liberal propaganda, but once someone starts trending on Twitter after getting the attention of the perpetually offended online activists, most companies feel they need to appease the mob by firing the person even if they didn’t do anything wrong.

Hollywood’s dogma is so rigid that if anyone dares doubt that all Trump supporters are racist they will be denounced for “supporting White supremacy,” as a star of Queer Eye for the Straight Guy realized when he simply said that “not all Republicans are racist.” [297] Jonathan Van Ness trended on Twitter from so many people attacking him for simply stating what should be obvious, but defending conservatives in any way is seen as a major transgression.

Sometimes when popular novels are made into movies, the studios feel the need to add some racism to “remind” the audience how terrible White people are. When Tom Clancy’s bestselling book The Sum of All Fears was turned into a film starring Morgan Freeman and Ben Affleck, the plot was changed from Palestinian terrorists trying to dupe the United States and Russia into a nuclear war because of the United States’ support for Israel, to a story about White supremacists trying to trick the two super powers into a nuclear war so they could build a Whites only Europe. [298]

The movie was so different from the book that when Tom Clancy introduced himself on the DVD commentary he said he was the person who “wrote the book they ignored.” [299]

Actors Denounce “White Privilege”

If White celebrities don’t regularly denounce their own “White privilege” and falsely claim that their success is due to the color of their skin, then they may become a suspected White supremacist themselves, and aren’t seen as an ally of the Black community. Chelsea Handler even hosted a Netflix show called “Hello, Privilege, It’s Me, Chelsea” which examined “White privilege” and followed her around as she traveled across the country endlessly apologizing for being White and talking with other people about how terrible White people have made America. [300]

Jon Stewart even issued an apology for having too many White people on the staff of The Daily Show when he was the host. [301] He hadn’t even been the host for five years and nobody was concerned about it, but he too was “sorry” and began doing various interviews to give his two cents about how America needs more “diversity.” He also called for Black people to be paid reparations. [302]

When Netflix released a trailer for a forthcoming series about the crimes of serial killer Ted Bundy (played by Zac Efron), people were shocked how it glamorized him and made Bundy seem like a rock star instead of a monster. [303] Pushing back against the criticism, Zac Efron said the film highlights Ted Bundy’s “White privilege” and he believed the only reason Bundy got away with his crimes for so long was because he was a “clean-cut White dude.” [304]

After the Black Lives Matter riots in the summer of 2020 the media became even more obsessed with demonizing White people, and there was an endless flood of celebrities apologizing for their “White privilege” and even producing PSAs about how sorry they are and how they “take responsibility.” [305]

Poor Jimmy Fallon looked like he was being held at gunpoint when he interviewed the author of “White Fragility,” a book about how White people have ruined America for Black people. He had her on The Tonight Show to lecture the audience about White people’s “inevitable and often unaware racist assumptions and behaviors,” and called White people “a-holes” because we make life “miserable” for Black people. [306]

He went along with the agenda so well that he sat there agreeing with everything she said, even when she said that he was a racist but didn’t even know it. “When I’m talking about the racism that I have, the racism that you have, it’s the result of living in a society in which racism is the foundation. We all absorb it,” she said. “There’s no way we could exempt ourselves from it.” [307]

There’s no way White people can’t be racist she says! The title of the segment posted on the Tonight Show YouTube channel is “Dr. Robin DiAngelo Wants White People to Stop Saying They’re Not Racist,” because she thinks we all are! [308]

Watchmen When the Watchmen comic book was turned into a television series on HBO, of all the villains that the superheroes could have been fighting, the producers decided to have them tackle the “problems brought about by White supremacist forces.” [309] The series creator said, “In a traditional superhero movie, the bad guys are fighting the aliens and when they beat the aliens, the aliens go back to their planet and everybody wins. There’s no defeating White supremacy. It’s not going anywhere, but it felt like it was a pretty formidable foe.” [310]

The HBO series kicked off depicting the Tulsa Race Riot of 1921, where mobs of Blacks and Whites fought and killed each other after a Black man was arrested for assaulting a White woman and a group of armed Black men came to the jail out of concern that the man had been lynched, which wasn't true. The series started with this to set the stage that "not much" has changed in the United Sates, and Black people are still supposedly being lynched on a regular basis.

The show revolves around a modern day fictional White supremacist group in Tulsa, Oklahoma called the Seventh Kavalry, who "wage war" against the local police because the city has decided to pay reparations to Black people. In order to protect themselves from the White supremacists, police hide their identities by wearing masks and costumes.

The original Watchmen comic book series and the 2009 movie depicted the superheroes fighting crime at the height of the Cold War between the United States and the Soviet Union. Obviously many fans were disappointed in the HBO series turning the vigilantes into social justice warriors and force-feeding more identity politics to the audience, but critics were eager to defend the show. Vox said, "Some Watchmen fans are mad that HBO's version is political. But Watchmen has always been political." [311] Others blamed "right-wing trolls" who gave it negative reviews online. [312]

CBS's Supernatural Drama "Evil"

CBS has a drama which is a cheap knockoff of the X-Files called Evil where a "skeptical" forensic psychologist (who's Black) works with a Catholic priest to investigate supposed supernatural events. And in one episode the skeptic investigates a case of a girl who was pronounced legally dead, but later "came back to life" once her body was moved to the morgue. After concluding his investigation he figured out that the "resurrected" girl did not experience a miracle, but was the victim of racism because she's Black!

Once he cracked the case, he heads to the office of a senior official at the hospital with two stacks of medical records, saying, "Turned out to be hyperinflation [of the lungs], and undiagnosed COPD…But it wasn't the paramedics fault."

That's when he drops the files on the man's desk. "What are those?" he asks.

"The emergency life-saving efforts of this hospital over the last year. A hundred and seventy-six in all," he replies, looking smug.

"Okay."

"These are your Caucasian patients" he says, placing his hand on one of the stacks. "Did you know that on average during a code your doctors perform fifty-eight minutes of chest compressions and rescue breathing on Caucasian patients?

"No. I didn't."

"And these are your African American patients. Your doctors on average perform chest compressions and rescue breathing twenty-three minutes on them. Patients like Naomi Clark" (the Black girl who supposedly died and came back to life).

"It is the stated position of this hospital that it does not distinguish on the basis of race," the hospital executive responds.

"Naomi Clark came back to life in the morgue because your E.R. staff called her time of death thirty minutes earlier than if she were White. That's why this wasn't a miracle. It was implicit racism," he concludes.

"I think you should get out of here," the executive responds. Talk about running out of ideas! Who could come up with such a ridiculous plot? And that was the big climax of the episode!

BlacKkKlansman BlacKkKlansman (2018) directed by Spike Lee was based on a true story about a Black detective in Colorado who investigates the Ku Klux Klan in the 1970s. His partner, who is White, goes undercover and infiltrates the KKK while the Black detective is the brains behind the operation.

There's a scene where David Duke (played by Topher Grace from That '70s Show) is making a toast to a group of people and talks about how great it is to be a White man in America and part of the "real America" and then says "I want to thank you so much for never putting your country second. America first!” he declares as he holds up a glass of champagne. “America first!” he repeats, to cheers from the crowd. [313]

That phrase, as you know, was popularized by President Trump, and that scene was included in the film as another attempt to tie David Duke to Donald Trump, even though Trump has denounced David Duke numerous times over the last few decades. [314]

During an interview about the film, Topher Grace said, “This is the first script when I read it that’s really of the Trump Administration.” [315] Of course, it’s not. It’s about a Black detective and his partner investigating a local chapter of the KKK for allegedly conspiring to bomb a civil rights rally, but Spike Lee decided to use the 50-year-old story to try and tie the events to President Trump.

“Cracka”

In a series called CRACKA, a neo-Nazi is sent to a parallel universe that takes place in the 1800s where Whites are the slaves and Black people are in control of America. “Cracka,” being an insult that angry Blacks love to call White people, a ghettoized derivative of “cracker.” In the trailer, before the Nazi is transported back in time to the alternate reality, he and his friends attack a random Black man and his car is shown to have a “Trump 2020” bumper sticker on it.

The series slogan is “You stole our freedom, now we steal yours.” It isn’t meant to put Whites in the shoes of Blacks to make them reflect on the injustices of the past, instead CRACKA is a Black revenge fantasy. Posts on the series official Facebook page are filled with anti-White rhetoric like “You’re in our world now!” [316] The trailer was released on Juneteenth (June 19th) the date that commemorates the freeing of the slaves, and before the comments were turned off many viewers were expressing their excitement about watching White people “get what they deserve.”

Trayvon Martin’s mom endorsed the series saying, “I applaud the bravery and vision for the creation of CRACKA .” [317]

Magical Negroes and White Saviors Since most liberals see racism everywhere, they’re not even happy when films depict a Black person possessing a unique quality that is used to help others who happen to be White. That is what they call employing the “magical negro” trope. Spike Lee went off on The Legend of Bagger Vance because Will Smith’s character comes to help Matt Damon win a golf tournament that takes place in Georgia in the 1930s. “Blacks are getting lynched left and right, and [Bagger Vance is] more concerned about improving Matt Damon’s golf swing!... I gotta sit down; I get mad just thinking about it. They’re still doing the same old thing ... recycling the noble savage and the happy slave,” he said. [318]

Whoopi Goldberg’s character in Ghost has been criticized as a “magical negro” (by Black people) because she helps the spirt of Patrick Swayze communicate with his widow after he dies. [319] Michael Clarke Duncan’s character in The Green Mile also upset some Black people because he has the power to heal sickness and disease and ends up using his ability on several White people who worked at a prison he was being held in, despite being on death row for a crime he didn’t commit. [320] It seems some Black people hate Whites so bad that they can’t stand to see a Black person do anything nice to them. No good deed goes unpunished, as the saying goes, and when well-meaning Hollywood studios produce films of White people helping minorities, that too is criticized as being a racist trope called the “White savior narrative.”

In Finding Forester , Sean Connery’s character is a reclusive but well-known writer who crosses paths with a Black teen who plays basketball in the courts across the street from his apartment. Connery learns the kid has a gift for writing that he helps encourage, and later the boy is accused of plagiarism because his teacher doesn’t think he has the ability to write as good as he does, but Connery vouches for him in a surprise appearance at the school preventing him from failing the class.

In The Blind Side (2009) Sandra Bullock is considered a White savior for taking in a Black homeless kid named Big Mike who becomes a football star thanks to her help. One critic said the Blind Side , "peddles the most insidious kind of racism, one in which whiteys are virtuous saviors, coming to the rescue of Blacks who become superfluous in narratives that are supposed to be about them." [321]

Others attacked the film because they felt it depicted Sandra Bullock saving Big Mike from inner-city Black people who were all "poor and violent." [322] Apparently they would have been happier if she just left him to waste away in the ghetto. White people are often damned if they do, and damned if they don't.

Other popular films liberals got upset about because they feature "White saviors" are Dangerous Minds (because a White teacher helps educate Black and Latino students in a poverty stricken part of the city), and even Gran Torino because Clint Eastwood helps his Asian neighbors fight against a Black gang in Detroit. [323]

Cool Runnings , a film about a Jamaican bobsled team, was attacked because the Jamaicans wouldn't have made it to the Olympics without the "White savior" (John Candy) their trainer. [324] Even Avatar has been accused of this since a White character using a remote control avatar of an alien body helps the alien race save their planet from human invaders looking to take their natural resources. [325]

In the 1980s Diff'rent Strokes was a popular sitcom about a rich White man living in Manhattan who adopts two Black orphans from Harlem. At the time the series covered a lot of serious issues like racism, drug use, and even child molestation. But today some see it as another example of a "White savior" plot.

One online magazine even included Diff'rent Strokes on its "50 Most Racist TV Shows" list, writing sarcastically, "Save us, Mr. White Man! Come rescue us from Harlem and let us come live with you in yo' giant Park Avenue mansion where our po' deceased mama onced worked her fingers to the bone cleaning up after yo' wrinkled White ass! We's cute, Mista Drummond, we ain't gwine start no trouble." [326]

MTV's Anti-White Agenda In 2015, MTV aired a documentary titled "White People" that was hosted by a homosexual illegal alien named Jose Antonio Vargas who traveled around America shaming White people about their “privilege” and lecturing them for not being concerned enough about minorities. [327]

The following year MTV News released a video with “New Year’s resolutions for White guys” because we’re all such terrible people we need to be educated by Blacks and Latinos on how we can be better. “Try to recognize that America was never ‘great’ for anyone who wasn’t a White guy,” begins one presenter. [328]

“Nobody who has Black friends says that they have Black friends, and just because you have Black friends doesn’t mean you’re not racist. You can be racist with Black friends,” says another.

“Look, guys, we know nobody’s perfect, but honestly, you can do a little better in 2017.”

They surprisingly deleted the video due to the backlash but their obsession with “White privilege” continues. MTV produced a YouTube show called “Decoded” where the host uncovered White people’s hidden “racism” that she sees around every corner, including decoding “micro-aggressions” and “the problem with White beauty standards.”

The usual complaints about Halloween costumes being “cultural appropriation” (and thus offensive) have also been covered. Each week for several years beginning in 2015 the show would release a new episode where the host found more problems to blame on White people or ways White people are supposedly being racist.

White Replacement in Media Recently another obsession we’ve seen in Hollywood is remaking popular movies or sequels and replacing the main character (if they happen to be White) with a Black actor in the name of “diversity.” It’s actually considered to be a “White supremacist conspiracy theory” to talk about White populations being “replaced” through mass immigration, but that is exactly what Hollywood has been doing to various characters in order to stamp out “whiteness.” [329]

Generation Xers remember the musical Annie being about the curly redhead orphan, but when it was remade in 2014, Annie was Black with an afro. When the live-action remake of The Little Mermaid was announced, it was also revealed that the red-headed mermaid Ariel would be played by a Black actress instead. [330]

When a reboot of Buffy the Vampire Slayer was announced the show cast an African-American actress as Buffy, who was originally played by Sarah Michelle Gueller in the 1990s series. [331] Two years later the show still hadn’t made it to air, which likely means the pilot was so horrible it didn’t get picked up. But due to the low standards of what is considered “entertainment” today, that may change if they rework the script or decide to just dump it on Netflix or Hulu. Activists also began pushing for James Bond to be played by a Black man, and it was later announced that a Black woman would play Agent 007, taking over Bond’s famous codename. [332]

In 2010 when The Karate Kid reboot was released it starred Jaden Smith, Will Smith’s son, who is of course Black. In 2018, Spider-Man: Into the Spider-Verse depicted the kid who becomes Spider Man as biracial—being half Black, half Latino. [333] There are growing calls to depict Superman as Black in future films as well. [334]

In the 2015 remake of Fantastic Four, Johnny Storm (the human torch character) who is White in the first two films (as well as in the comics) was played by Michael B. Jordan, a Black man. [335] This, despite being depicted as the brother of a fellow “Fantastic Four” member, Sue Storm, who is White.

Samuel L. Jackson plays Nick Fury in The Avengers series even though the character is White in the comics. In the late 1990s a made for TV movie titled Nick Fury: Agent of S.H.I.E.L.D . aired on FOX where the character was true to the comic depiction (played by David Hasselhoff), but when Marvel launched their Avengers film series they chose Samuel L. Jackson for more “diversity.” Another comic book superhero called Domino was turned Black when she made an appearance in Deadpool 2 .

After the original actress who played Batwoman in The CW television series didn't renew her contract, she was replaced by a Black girl. [336] ABC announced plans to reboot The Wonder Years , a hit coming-of-age comedy-drama about a typical kid growing up in suburban America in the late 1960s, only this time…you guessed it—the family is Black. [337]

For Black History Month (February) in 2020, Barnes & Noble planned to release special editions of various literary classics like The Wizard of Oz , Romeo and Juliet , and Alice in Wonderland with new covers depicting the lead characters as African Americans. They called it the Diverse Editions program, but canceled their plan after critics complained that it was "literary blackface" and said they should have just promoted actual books written by people of color instead of doing something so dumb. [338]

When Harry Potter was turned into a play, a Black actress was chosen to play the character Hermione Granger, who is described as White in the books, and was played by Emma Watson in the films. Writer J.K. Rowling later denied that she wrote the character as White, but in the books she is specifically described as such. [339]

Other films are being remade with modern day "Black" versions, like Steel Magnolias , originally released in 1989 about a group of women and how they cope with the death of one of their friends, and then remade in 2012 starring all Black women. The romantic comedy About Last Night (1986), about couples entering into committed relationships for the first time in their lives, was remade in 2014 starring an all-Black cast. And there have been others, including Cinderella , Death at a Funeral , and more. [340]

Remaking a "Black" version of a film is quite different than changing a well-established character like Orphan Annie or the Little Mermaid, but when race-swapping happens to Black characters, it's denounced as "whitewashing."

How About Entertainment For Whites?

Once Whites are a minority in the United States (estimated to occur in 2045), will it then be okay to have a White Entertainment Channel like Black people have BET [Black Entertainment Television]? Will White people be able to have a Miss White USA pageant since Blacks, Latinos, and Asians have their own beauty pageants for their race? Once Whites become a minority in America can we have White students clubs on college campuses just like the Black, Asian and Latino student organizations? Will it be okay for a White person to say that they are proud to be White? No, it won't.

The special interest groups for Blacks and Latinos will get unhinged and scream that "White supremacy" is trying to resurrect itself and loads of "White allies" will join in on the chorus denouncing their fellow White people to show solidarity with people of color. "White people had their turn," they'll say, and don't deserve to be proud of their race or culture because they enslaved Black people 400 years ago.

"We ended White supremacy and must ensure it never returns," they'll say. White people must forever bow down to the new Latino/Black/Asian majority and live the rest of their lives in servitude to the new ruling class to atone for the sins of our White ancestors, they will demand.

Of course Black people ignore the fact that virtually all countries in the ancient world had slaves. Maybe we should point out that the Egyptians (Africans) enslaved the Jews. And that Black Muslim tribes in Africa actually sold other Africans to the European slave traders who brought them to North America. [341] Africa is also the world's leader in modern-day slavery, where millions of people remain trapped in forced labor. [342]

When the question is raised about a White counterpart to BET or White-only shows and movies, the knee jerk reaction is to always claim that the majority of mainstream entertainment is produced for White people. But with forced diversity being injected into almost every single television show, movie, and even commercials which all do their best to have an equal number of White, Black, Asian, and Latino characters, the claim that White people have entertainment that is a reflection of our own family, community, and culture is rapidly becoming null and void.

Since most "White" homogeneous entertainment has been "diversified" and turned into a heterogenous multicultural mishmash, this just adds to the justification that such shows should be created and maintained. But just pointing out these issues is enough to get one tarred and feathered as a "neo-Nazi," then deplatformed from social media, and "White nationalist" added to the first sentence of their Wikipedia page. [343]

Film and Television Liaison Offices

Most people think that propaganda films were just something produced by Nazi Germany or perhaps are still made by communist regimes in North Korea or China, but the truth is the United States is the world's biggest producer of such material. For example, during World War II our government commissioned a series of documentary films called Why We Fight which were designed to encourage Americans to support the war. Animated segments of the films were produced by Walt Disney Studios. [344]

Disney actually produced various cartoons throughout World War II featuring Donald Duck for this same purpose. One such film titled The Spirit of ’43 encouraged Americans to file and pay their income taxes in order to help fund the war effort. “Taxes...To Defeat the Axis” was the film’s tagline which was commissioned by the U.S. Treasury Secretary at the time. [345] The title, “Spirt of ’43 ” was a play off the old patriotic sentiment from the American Revolutionary war which was captured by the slogan “The Spirit of ’76.”

Another Disney war propaganda film from the era was Der Fuehrer’s Face (originally titled Donald Duck in Nutzi Land), which encouraged Americans to buy war bonds to help fund World War II. In the film Donald Duck has a nightmare where he is forced to work at a munitions factory in Nazi Germany, but then wakes up in “home sweet home” and has a renewed love for America. [346] Donald Duck also starred in a short anti-Japanese propaganda film during World War II, where he parachuted into a Pacific island jungle to “wipe out” a Japanese airfield. [347]

While it’s simple to make the case that these films were for a good cause, the point is that propaganda is more pervasive than people realize, and the avenues used to reach the masses aiming to persuade them are so vast that even popular cartoon characters are employed.

Most people think war propaganda films disguised as innocent entertainment is just something from the World War II era, but the practice continued—and so did the sophistication. During the height of the Cold War in the 1980s the film Red Dawn (starring Patrick Swayze and Charlie Sheen) depicted the Soviet Union invading the United States only to be confronted by a group of high school kids who form a militia called “the Wolverines” (named after their school’s mascot) and help fight off the communists, saving their town.

It was remade in 2012 with North Korea being the invaders this time, who just so happened to be in the crosshairs of the Department of Defense which considered them part of the “axis of evil.” Hollywood didn’t just think this would be a neat plotline, the film (and many others) was actually produced with the help of the Department of Defense. An open secret in Hollywood, but something rarely ever mentioned because it would spoil the “fun,” is that the U.S. government works hand in hand with writers and directors to craft blockbuster propaganda films that reinforce American foreign policy objectives. [348]

During the War on Terror in the early to mid 2000s, millions of Americans were subjected to pro-torture propaganda through Kiefer Sutherland's popular series 24 which began airing just two months after the September 11th attacks in 2001. Torturing suspected terrorists or people detained who were believed to have information about Al Qaeda was a hot topic of debate at the time, and Kiefer Sutherland was on national television with a new episode each week to show Americans that torturing the "bad guys" was "necessary" to save the world. [349]

Over a decade later the popular entertainment industry publication Variety would admit that "Liberal Hollywood carried water for torture." [350] The article pointed out, "Not only has torture become more frequent since the Sept. 11 terror attacks, but the acceptance of those depictions in entertainment has been cited as a point of reference—and even an endorsement of the tactics." [351]

Zero Dark Thirty , the 2013 dramatization depicting the hunt for Osama Bin Laden, falsely depicted torture as the reason information was obtained that led to the location of his compound after years of the terror leader eluding U.S. forces. Torturing detainees had nothing to do with discovering his hideout, but the film essentially rewrote history in the minds of millions who saw it and believe it tells the real story of how it unfolded. [352]

When he was Secretary of Defense, Leon Panetta gave classified details about the raid to the producers to help them make the film. [353] Zero Dark Thirty later received several Oscar nominations.

Most movie lovers have no idea that many big budget blockbuster films are produced with the direct help and oversight of the United States government. How else do you think the Hollywood studios get access to aircraft carriers, F-16 jets, tanks, and other sophisticated military equipment? They can't just rent those kinds of things from a prop house. They get them from the government.

The stars will never talk about this when doing the talk show circuit promoting their films. It's kind of a trade secret really, but in the industry it's widely known that various departments of the government have what are called entertainment liaison offices which work with producers and screenwriters to get them the equipment they want. Of course there is a price for this. It's not monetary though—it comes in the form of script approval.

The U.S. Army isn't going to lend a bunch of tanks to a producer for a film showing the dark side of war, or one that questions the WMD hoax that was used to justify invading Iraq in 2003, for example. Movies must always celebrate war and glorify it, and never doubt the reasons for starting one. Such deals have been made for films like Zero Dark Thirty, Red Dawn, Top Gun , American Sniper , and hundreds of others. Some have called this form of entertainment "government-subsidized propaganda." [354]

Freedom of Information requests revealed that the Department of Defense has been involved in over 800 films and television shows between 1911 and 2017, many of them since 2001 because of the War on Terror that started shortly after the 9/11 attacks. [355] It's not just the Army, Navy, Marines, and Air Force, however. The CIA has their own Entertainment Liaison Office and has also been involved in the production of dozens of different films and television shows since at least 1947. [356]

These entertainment liaison offices also include agreements that get active duty military personnel to be extras in movies when a scene calls for a large number of uniformed troops. That way the director gets their shot of hundreds of soldiers on the battlefield, but also saves the money they would have had to pay all the extras to be there. Mark Wahlberg plays a Navy SEAL deployed in Afghanistan in Lone Survivor , which is based on a true story derived from Marcus Luttrell's biography about his experiences there in 2005, and thanks to the Department of Defense Entertainment Liaison Office the film was shot in New Mexico on Kirtland Air Force Base. [357] That way the studio didn't have to recreate an entire military base, they were able to use a real one.

Fortune magazine calls this "Hollywood's Military Complex" and explained, "Even in an age of special effects, it's exponentially cheaper to film on actual military ships with real military advisers. Despite action sequences and an A-list lead, Captain Phillips cost about $55 million to make (compared with a visual effects fest like Gravity , which cost about $100 million). The fulcrum of Hollywood's unlikely partnership is Phil Strub, a former film school student and Navy videographer, now the entertainment liaison at the Department of Defense." [358]

Fortune goes on to say, "Scripts of movies helmed by Michael Bay, Ridley Scott, and Steven Spielberg are regularly sent to an ascetic office at the Pentagon in hopes of procuring military cooperation. If he [Phil Strub] signs off, the filmmakers stand to access the most awesome arsenal in the world, and in turn, the image and message of the American armed forces get projected before a global audience.” [359]

An official who works in the Department of Defense’s Entertainment Liaison Office confirmed they maintain control over the scripts, saying, “We make sure the Department and facilities and people are portrayed in the most accurate and positive light possible.” [360] That’s a nice way of saying, if anything in the film paints the government or war in a bad light, you’re not getting your equipment.

Before an agreement is made to allow the use of government equipment (and locations), the Entertainment Liaison Office carefully reviews a script and then raises any possible concerns with the producer; and if they’re willing to change certain dialog or plot points then the government will give them basically anything they need as long as the movie will serve as an infomercial for the military.

They can be quite picky even about the smallest detail. For example, in the original script of Hulk , the laboratory which caused Dr. Banner’s condition was a government lab, but documents obtained by a Freedom of Information Request show that the Department of Defense requested it be just a “lab” and not associated with the government at all. [361]

The Army Times admitted that “filmmakers can ask the Pentagon for assistance on their projects, from consultation on uniforms and military procedures to use of real military aircraft and equipment.” [362] Or as Phil Strub, who was the head of Department of Defense’s Entertainment Liaison Office for almost thirty years put it, “The relationship between Hollywood and the Pentagon has been described as a mutual exploitation. We’re after military portrayal, and they’re after our equipment.” [363]

Sure these films are entertaining and dramatic, but they’ll only tell half the story about why a conflict actually started, and what the costs will be. They also serve a secondary purpose by encouraging people to join the military because war is painted as exciting and glorious and always for a just cause, never because of misinformation or lies (as in the case of the War in Iraq).

“We want these movies to help us in terms of recruitment and retention,” admitted the Department of Defense. [364] The original Top Gun starring Tom Cruise was said to have spiked enrollment in the Air Force to record levels. They even called it the “Top Gun Effect” and in some cities Air Force recruiters literally set up tables outside movie theaters. [365]

Katy Perry’s music video “Part of Me” was actually shot at Camp Pendleton, a massive Marine base in San Diego, California, thanks to help from the Entertainment Liaison Office. [366] In the video she finds out her boyfriend is cheating on her and doesn’t know what to do with her life, so she ends up joining the Marines.

The entire rest of the music video is literally a recruitment commercial, showing her dressed in uniform completing basic training, shooting an M-16, and riding in an Amphibious Assault Vehicle. The video also includes actual Marines as extras, marching alongside her and storming a beach with helicopters flying overhead—all provided by Camp Pendleton.

Even the creators of the popular “Call of Duty” video game series consult with the Department of Defense’s Entertainment Liaison Office in order to get access to advisors in hopes of creating more realistic video games. [367]

While the government enthusiastically helps produce movies, TV shows, and music videos that will reinforce their preferred narratives, big budget anti-war films or those which depict some of the horrors of war like Platoon (1986), Apocalypse Now (1979), and Full Metal Jacket (1987) have to go without any of this assistance. Sometimes the studios have to actually rent military vehicles and equipment from foreign governments and film outside of the United States to get their projects made.

When Platoon came out, Oliver Stone, who wrote and directed the film, said, “I hope people go to see what the war was really like. That’s the statement. And once you see it, you have to think about it for yourself. Think about what you think about war. Think about what it really is, as opposed to the fantasy comic book stuff of Top Gun.” [368] He also said that the main character (played by Charlie Sheen) was actually based on his own experience of being in Vietnam, and how at first he wanted to do his “patriotic duty” for his country, but after seeing the horrors of the war first hand and later learning about the lies that got us there, he began to resent the U.S. government for what they had done.

During the Iraq and Afghanistan wars in the early 2000s, George. W. Bush issued a ban on any photos and video of the coffins being unloaded from airplanes after soldiers’ remains were brought back to the United States. [369] It was widely known that support for the Vietnam War dramatically dropped when people began seeing footage of the tens of thousands of coffins returning, not to mention pictures of wounded soldiers, and so the Bush Administration did everything they could trying to prevent a similar situation by censoring the details of the casualties in Iraq and Afghanistan.

It wasn't just George W. Bush and the neocons' policies that caused needless death and destruction because of our involvement in the Middle East, however. Barack Obama became known as the "Drone King" for using the newly popular remote-control aircraft which ended up killing a stunning number of innocent civilians while the American mainstream media provided him cover by barely, if ever, mentioning it. [370]

First Lady Michelle Obama played her part to help promote the Military Industrial Complex during the Obama administration. She actually appeared at the Oscars in 2013 via satellite to announce the winner of Best Picture which was given to Argo , a movie about the CIA covertly working with Hollywood movie producers so their agents could pose as film makers working on a science fiction movie in order to infiltrate Iran so they could rescue American hostages being held there. [371]

That same year Homeland won Golden Globe awards for the Best Actress (Claire Danes), Best Actor (Damian Lewis), and Best TV Drama for their Showtime series depicting a returning veteran secretly siding with Al Qaeda. [372] This narrative parroted a report released by the Department of Homeland Security a few years earlier that warned returning veterans should be considered possible domestic terrorists out of concerns they may join right-wing extremist organizations after supposedly having a difficult time re-integrating into their communities. [373]

The real reason for the report, which angered veterans groups when it was made public, may have been concerns that many soldiers were disgruntled with the U.S. government after learning that the reason for starting the War in Iraq (the "weapons of mass destruction" Saddam Hussein supposedly had), turned out to be a lie.

In March 2012 a 30-minute documentary titled Kony 2012 was posted to YouTube and immediately went viral. The film promoted a campaign to capture or kill the African warlord Joseph Kony, leader of the Lord's Resistance Army. Kony 2012 was the first YouTube video ever to get one million "likes" and was called the most viral video ever at the time. [374]

Celebrities from Justin Bieber to Kim Kardashian helped spread it through their social media accounts and a few weeks later the U.S. Senate passed a resolution condemning Joseph Kony and agreed to send troops from the African Union to help find him. [375]

The film’s surprising popularity was no accident. It was produced by a charity called “Invisible Children” which used a high-power public relations firm called Sunshine Sachs Associates to promote it. That PR firm was co-founded by a man named Ken Sunshine who has close ties with Barack Obama.

Many people became suspicious of Kony 2012 immediately since the video seemed to come out of nowhere and went viral so quickly. In hindsight it appears it was a carefully crafted propaganda campaign to promote the United States getting involved in another conflict halfway around the world. [376]

The Military Industrial Complex had been eager to become more invested in the fight against Joseph Kony and the Lord’s Resistance Army, but since they weren’t a threat to the United States and had no direct connections to us, drumming up support to go after him would have been impossible. But thanks to the viral Kony 2012 video, everyone was talking about him, and despite living in a country few Americans could even find on a map (Uganda), he became public enemy number one.

The CIA In Hollywood In the 1990s the CIA appointed a man named Chase Brandon as a their liaison to Hollywood, and he began helping the agency produce dozens of films and television shows for major studios and television networks, including documentaries on the History Channel. [377] Chase Brandon retired in 2007 and was replaced by a man named Paul Barry who continues with the task. [378] Former CIA officer Bob Baer said, “All these people that run studios—they go to Washington, they hang around with senators, they hang around with CIA directors, and everybody’s on board.” [379]

Just a few weeks after the 9/11 attacks CBS launched a new series about the CIA called The Agency , which was shot on location at the actual

CIA headquarters, and largely focused on the hunt for Osama Bin Laden and how the CIA was tirelessly working to keep America safe.

The director of The Recruit (2003) a spy thriller starring Al Pacino and Colin Farrell, was invited to visit the CIA's headquarters in Langley, Virginia so he could "understand how the space worked and looked." [380] He wasn't just brought there for a tour, the CIA's Entertainment Liaison Office was involved in the production of the film to make sure it didn't cast the CIA as a whole in a negative light, only Al Pacino's character who is a corrupt agent and is eventually discovered.

Over a decade later, The Atlantic would publish a story titled, "How the CIA Hoodwinked Hollywood" which explained, "The agency has established a very active spin machine in the heart of the entertainment capital, which works strenuously to make sure the cloak-and-dagger world is presented in heroic terms. Since the mid-1990s, but especially after 9/11, American screenwriters, directors, and producers have traded positive portrayal of the spy profession in film or television projects for special access and favors at CIA headquarters." [381]

Robert DeNiro played a retired CIA officer in Meet the Parents who famously hooks Ben Stiller up to a lie detector as part of his over-protective antics to determine if Stiller can be trusted to marry his daughter. Apparently the original script included a brief scene showing "torture manuals" on DeNiro's book shelf once Stiller stumbled across his secret office in the basement and learned of his future father in law's true identity, but the CIA told the studio not to include them on the shelf since they would cast the Agency in a negative light. [382]

Not all films about the CIA show them in a positive light, however. Those movies have to be made without the help of any government agency. Matt Damon stars in The Bourne Identity (2002) which is loosely based on the CIA's very real mind control experiments called MK-ULTRA. [383] Needless to say the CIA would rather sweep that under the rug and didn't provide any assistance in its production.

Syriana (2005) starring George Clooney focuses on the CIA's involvement in the Middle East where they engage in numerous shady activities behind the scenes in order to maintain control of major fields in the region—another film they prefer would have never been made.

Spy Game (2001), starring Robert Redford and Brad Pitt shows the CIA turning their back on one of their operatives in order to avoid jeopardizing a trade deal that is about to be signed between the United States and China. The Agency wouldn't have anything to do with that film because it showed senior management in an "insensitive light" [384] when in reality it showed the complexities of international relations and the difficult and sometimes coldblooded decisions that are made behind the scenes to maintain American superiority in the world.

In his book Operation Hollywood: How the Pentagon Shapes and Censors Movies , David Robb concludes, "No society is free that allows its military to control the arts. In America, it is not only unconscionable, it is also unconstitutional." [385] He's certainly not alone in thinking that. Many legal experts believe that entertainment liaison offices actually violate the First Amendment because they only help producers whose films portray the U.S. government, the military, and various other agencies, in a favorable light.

This kind of selective help is equivalent to the government refusing to allow certain groups from reserving local town hall venues because of what those groups or their leaders believe.

Constitutional Law professor Irwin Chemerinsky, who teaches at the University of Southern California argues, "The government cannot favor some speech due to its viewpoint and disfavor others because of its viewpoint. The court has said that when the government is giving financial benefits, it can't decide who to give to, or not give to, based on the viewpoint expressed." [386]

He and others say this one-sided favoritism is no different that if the government gave one particular religious group material support or financial favors while denying those same benefits to others. [387]

Some Actors Are Real CIA Assets Aside from the CIA aiding in the production of various films and television shows, their involvement in the entertainment industry goes much further and sounds like something right out of a movie. A former CIA officer named John Rizzo wrote a memoir called Company Man: Thirty Years of Crisis and Controversy in the CIA , where he admitted the agency regularly works with production companies that allow CIA operatives to work undercover as members of film crews when a film is being shot on location in a foreign country. [388]

"Among businesses in general, the CIA has long had a special relationship with the entertainment industry, devoting considerable attention to fostering relationships with Hollywood movers and shakers—studio executives, producers, directors, and big-name actors," Rizzo explains. [389]

He also said that some celebrities have been enlisted as CIA assets through the agency's National Resources Division, which recruits foreign students studying in America, business people here on work visas, and even foreign diplomats the Agency wants to become spies for the United States when they return to their home countries.

Once initiated, the celebrities are used to relay information to the CIA about foreign leaders they meet since they'll often speak more candidly with a celebrity than with diplomats or reporters due to being star struck and letting their guard down. [390]

"These are people who have made a lot of money basically making stuff up. A lot of them, at least the smarter and more self-aware ones, realize that what they do makes them ridiculously rich but is also ephemeral and meaningless in the larger scheme of things," Rizzo says. "So they're receptive to helping the CIA in any way they can, probably in equal parts because they are sincerely patriotic and because it gives them a taste of real-life intrigue and excitement." [391]

In his book he also says that a major film star once approached the CIA himself, wanting to work with them, "just out of his patriotic duty," after the actor learned that another major studio had a relationship with the agency. Rizzo says the actor asked his handler for $50,000 of cocaine for his services, which the agency allegedly refused. [392]

When Ben Affleck was promoting his film Argo (2012), which is based on the true story of the CIA working undercover with a film studio to infiltrate Iran to rescue American hostages under the guise of shooting a movie there, he was asked by a reporter if he thought there were any actors working as CIA operatives in Hollywood today. "I think there are probably quite a few. Yes, I think probably Hollywood is full of CIA agents and we just don't know it, and I wouldn't be surprised at all to discover that this was extremely common," he responded. [393]

Knowing what happened with the Iranian hostage rescue and working on other films that are overseen by the CIA's Entertainment Liaison Office, Ben Affleck would certainly be in a position to know. He also starred in The Sum of All Fears (2002) where he played a CIA analyst, another film that was produced with the help of Chase Brandon, the agency's entertainment liaison at the time. [394]

Affleck's (now ex) wife Jennifer Garner also played a CIA agent in ABC's action thriller Alias, which the Central Intelligence Agency consulted on, so he is obviously very familiar with how close the agency works with Hollywood.

The FBI and Hollywood The FBI has their hand in Hollywood too. On their website they admit, "If you are a writer, author, or producer who wants to feature the FBI, we may be able to work with you to create an accurate portrayal of the Bureau. We've been doing it since the 1930s." [395] They call this office the Investigative Publicity and Public Affairs Unit (IPPAU), and they work with "domestic and international screenwriters, producers, authors, and other industry personnel associated with TV programs, documentaries, made-for-TV movies, books, and motion pictures." [396]

J. Edgar Hoover, the infamously corrupt founding father of the FBI (and its director for almost 50 years), used his position to bully Hollywood studios into dropping certain actors from projects and got scripts changed that would have shown the agency in a negative light.

John Wayne was chosen to be the narrator for a television series called "The FBI" for the ABC network in the 1960s, but because of his connections to the right-wing John Birch Society, Hoover "vetoed" John Wayne's involvement and had ABC remove him from the project "in order to prevent any possible criticism of the Bureau by using someone with known John Birch Society connections.” [397]

J. Edgar Hoover also used his position to target anti-Vietnam war musicians like Jimmy Hendrix, Janis Joplin, and especially John Lennon, who he was concerned threatened President Nixon’s chances of getting reelected, so Hoover tried to have him deported back to England because he was once arrested for possession of marijuana. [398]

Operation Mockingbird In the news industry, intelligence agencies enjoy similar influence and have deeply embedded operatives and developed covert relationships for decades. In the 1970s a Congressional hearing uncovered a secret program called Operation Mockingbird which involved the CIA infiltrating television news networks, newspapers, and magazines, and paying off reporters and editors to do the agency’s bidding. [399]

At the time there were widespread concerns that the CIA was involved in numerous corrupt and illegal activities, including spying on American citizens and assassinating foreign leaders, so Congress investigated the agency and happened to learn of their secret dealings with the media.

At one point during the hearing William Colby, the head of the CIA then, was asked if the agency had operatives working for any television networks. He refused to answer the question and said that it’s something he would rather “get into” in an “executive session,” meaning behind closed doors with just a small number of senators authorized to have access to classified information. [400]

The former president of CBS, Sig Mickelson, was later asked if he thought despite Operation Mockingbird being uncovered, was the CIA still engaged in the same type of operations. “Yeah, I would think probably, for a reporter it would probably continue today, but because of all the revelations of the period of the 1970s, it seems to me a reporter has to be a lot more circumspect when doing it now or he runs the risk of at least being looked at with considerable disfavor by the public. I think you've got to be much more careful about it." [401]

Anyone who followed the "Russiagate" scandal and the conspiracy to bring down the Trump administration by claiming he's a secret Russian agent, knows in their gut that various intelligence agencies (the "Deep State") continue to work closely with the mainstream media in order to push their agenda.

I cover Operation Mockingbird in detail in my previous book, The True Story of Fake News , which I encourage you to order from Amazon or download the e-book from any of the major e-book stores if you're interested in learning more about the subject. Decades have gone by since the name "Operation Mockingbird" has been mentioned on national television, and when you learn just how deep the CIA burrowed their way into the various news networks, it's chilling, especially in light of their ruthless and relentless war on President Trump.

Climate Change Many of Hollywood’s concerns about the environment, specifically global warming (or “climate change” as they have rebranded it) aren’t really about keeping our air clean, preserving delicate ecosystems, or developing green energy, but instead is just a smokescreen to hide their true intentions.

Obviously we should take care of the environment, not litter, recycle, and be good stewards of the earth, but the fanatical doomsday warnings about global warming are designed to mobilize people to accept exorbitant carbon taxes and embrace the implementation of enormous new socialist programs. [402]

Alexandria Ocasio-Cortez’s senior aide and puppet master admitted, “The interesting thing about the Green New Deal is it wasn’t originally a climate thing at all…Do you guys think of it as a climate thing? Because we really think of it as a how-do-you-change-the-entire-economy thing.” [403] Ocasio-Cortez said the plan was aiming for “a new national social, industrial and economic mobilization on a scale not seen since World War II and the New Deal,” in order to “provide unprecedented levels of prosperity and economic security for all people of the United States.” [404]

Celebrities have always been “tree huggers” and concerned about the environment—which is a good cause, but their hysterical rhetoric about what humans are doing to the planet is getting increasingly radical to the point that they are literally claiming the human race will soon go extinct if we don’t listen to them, and any day now when we peer outside the windows of our homes it will be as if we’re looking at a scene from a disaster movie.

Because of all the “end of the world” fear mongering about climate change, some children are getting what is called “eco-anxiety” which child psychologists describe as “a form of anxiety about where the world is heading when it comes to climate change.” [405] This is what caused Greta Thunberg, the teenage climate change activist from Sweden, to begin skipping school thinking she was helping save the world.

Once she caught the eye of the climate change lobby, they adopted her as their spokesperson and threw the weight of their massive propaganda machine behind her to propel her to international stardom as a child prodigy who is trying to save the planet. Time magazine even put her on the cover for their 2019 Person of the Year issue. [406]

Recently there have been increasing calls for geoengineering, something that was said to be conspiracy theory just a few years ago. [407] Some scientists want to spray little particles of glitter into the atmosphere to block out some of the sun’s rays hoping that will keep the earth slightly cooler to offset the supposed “global warming” that’s happening. Meanwhile geoengineering advocates ignore the law of unintended consequences, and nobody knows what kind of environmental disasters doing such a thing would cause.

Like everything liberals do, their claims of “living green” are rife with hypocrisy. Just one trip on their private jet spews more pollution into the air than several months’ worth of daily commutes on the freeway in a car. [408] Just one of Al Gore’s homes uses more than 20 times the amount of energy as an average home, costing an estimated $30,000 a year in utilities for the gas and electricity. [409]

Arnold Schwarzenegger said fossil fuel executives should be sued for “first degree murder” because their industry is “killing” the planet. [410] Arnold apparently forgot that he was the first civilian to buy a Hummer in 1992 when the extra-large gas guzzling military vehicle became commercially available. It famously got about 10 miles a gallon. [411]

Recently Hollywood has been inserting messages about global warming hysteria into almost everything. During the Miss Universe 2019 pageant one of the contestants was asked, “Are leaders of today doing enough to protect future generations from climate change?” Steve Harvey, the host, then rolled his eyes as soon as he was done reading the question off the card. [412]

Hollywood, Health & Society (the organization that helped inject storylines about Obamacare into TV shows) also lobbies Hollywood studios about climate change. They specifically have been focusing on comedy shows because as Lizz Winstead, a writer for The Daily Show points out, “Comedians have become trusted as people who observe the world and talk about it truthfully. Because they’re not beholden to anyone, they can call bullshit when they see it.” [413] That may have been true before “Cancel Culture,” but that’s a whole other topic.

The organization’s website openly states, “Hollywood, Health & Society assists with research, providing a range of information from experts for storylines on topics, from rising seas to melting glaciers, the increase of extreme weather to the spread of infectious diseases, from the Arctic to L.A.” [414] But they’re certainly not the only ones lobbying Hollywood to warn viewers about the issue.

In 2011 the Secretary General of the United Nations traveled to Hollywood during Oscar week in order to encourage industry insiders to make more films about climate change. [415] The U.N. famously recruits celebrities like Angelina Jolie and George Clooney as “ambassadors” to further their agendas since so many people view celebrities as experts in everything. Knowing that few people watch documentary films, the U.N. focused on getting the issues incorporated into television series and movies.

Ban Ki-moon, the Secretary General of the U.N. at the time, told attendees, “Animate these stories. Set them to music! Give them life! Together we can have a blockbuster impact on the world.” [416] Another speaker at the event said, “There’s a huge gap between what governments can do, given political constraints, and what they should do. That’s where you come in…We need you to make it sexy and cool to bring about the energy revolution that has to happen.” [417]

Executives working for the FOX television network (not to be confused with Fox News) once openly admitted the network uses their shows to promote concerns about global warming. Chairman Gary Newman admitted in a promotional video the company put out years ago to brag about their efforts that, “We want to set an example in our industry and other industries that no matter what the size of your carbon footprint is, you can make a difference...The biggest thing we have done is inserting messages about the environment into some of our content.” [418]

The Simpsons , King of the Hill , Family Guy , 24 , and many other FOX shows have all included warnings about climate change, sometimes very brief, but they are there. For example, in a scene from Family Guy when a character is looking around at a car dealership he asks “what kind of jerk would drive one of those?” when he comes across a Hummer.

Another FOX television executive, Dana Walden, said, “the most powerful way that we could communicate the commitment on behalf of our company was to change the practices within the production as well as work in a message about global warming, about environmental changes, and about empowering people to take responsibility.” [419]

The most infamous global warming propaganda is Al Gore’s “documentary” An Inconvenient Truth which helped jump start global warming hysteria. Devastated by losing the 2000 election to George W. Bush, Al Gore found meaning in his life traveling around the world giving his doomsday predictions to anyone who would listen.

But documentary films don’t have the same impact that big budget action movies do. Jesse Bryant, who organizes an environmental film festival at Yale University, said, “It’s great to publish academic journals on the issues but the real breakthrough is when pop culture stories are hinted towards this cliff that we are all heading off.” [420]

The Film that Started it All?

Kevin Costner’s Waterworld was perhaps the first major film used to promote fears of global warming. Released in 1995 the story takes place around the year 2500 when the polar ice caps have melted and the entire earth is covered with water, forcing citizens to live on boats. At the time, it was the most expensive film ever made, costing around 175 million dollars, and turned out to be an epic flop. [421]

An interesting spin on the climate change hysteria was The Day After Tomorrow (2004) which, unlike Waterworld , depicted the earth freezing from climate change. It's based on a crazy "non-fiction" book titled The Coming Global Superstorm written in 1999 by UFO buff Art Bell and another guy named Whitley Strieber.

Dennis Quaid plays a climatologist who realizes that the melting of the polar ice caps has disrupted the ocean currents and caused an enormous polar vortex which drops the earth's temperature below freezing. Soon dozens of feet of snow fall everywhere from the disruptive weather patterns, trapping everyone inside.

There's even a scene where the vice president, who looks like Dick Cheney, was chastised for not listening to scientists earlier about the looming disaster global warming would cause. [422] The film was widely mocked as ridiculous and had the opposite effect that was intended. Instead of raising awareness for the "dangers" of climate change, The Day After Tomorrow became a prime example of how absurd those fears were.

Vanity Fair is upset that there aren't more films about climate change, saying, "Fifteen years after The Day After Tomorrow, movies about climate change remain rare, and never as serious as the problem itself." [423] The article recommended that the next Fast & Furious film depict the gang driving electric vehicles instead of ones with "gas-guzzling" combustion engines to "set an example." At the bottom of the article it has a note that reads, "This story is part of Covering Climate Now, a global collaboration of more than 220 news outlets to strengthen coverage of the climate story." [424]

Perhaps the writer got the idea of Fast & Furious using electric vehicles from Pixar's animated film Cars 2 , which casts Big Oil as the bad guy, conspiring to prevent an alternative (more environmentally friendly) fuel from catching on. [425]

A 2012 film called Beasts of the Southern Wild depicts planet earth on the verge of a climate catastrophe that ends up ultimately flooding a bayou village and causing dangerous prehistoric beasts which were frozen in the polar ice caps to become free and roam the earth again when they melt.

Snowpiercer (2013) starring Chris Evans is about a future where climate change made the earth freeze over due to a failed attempt by scientists trying to use geoengineering to stop it, so the humans who remain have to live on a train that constantly travels around the world non-stop.

Why do they have to live on a train, and not in a building with a furnace to keep them warm, you ask?

Because that would defeat the point of the movie about the train being an allegory for “classism” and the hierarchy of society separating the rich from the poor. The upper class members live in the cars closest to the engine, in luxury, while the poor masses are stuck living in the cars at the end of the train, in poverty. [426]

One science blog said the “Frozen earth in ‘Snowpiercer’ is a grim (and possible) future for our warming planet.” [427] Others liked that it wasn’t just another “climate change dystopia film” but was what they called the first geoengineering dystopia film. [428] It seems some who are concerned about climate change also doubt that geoengineering could solve the problem and think hopes of geoengineering (like spraying glitter in the atmosphere to block some of the sun’s rays) are only addressing the symptoms, and not the cause of global warming. In May 2020 the TNT television network aired a reboot of the film as a television series which is said to take place in the year 2021.

The 2014 science fiction film Interstellar revolved around the human race having to find another planet to live on because of dust storms and crop failures, and while not mentioning the words “climate change,” many saw the subtle message it was trying to make. Green Peace noted, “Interstellar has the potential to play a positive role in the climate movement. It can urge those who already see the impact of climate change to take activist action. And for others who have up to now have ignored the science, they may think again.” [429]

But the message was too subtle for some critics. The Atlantic complained that “climate change” is never explicitly mentioned in the film, and instead of trying to solve the “mistakes” humans have made on earth that “caused” the planet’s destruction, the characters instead decided to abandon earth and try to start over somewhere else. [430] They were upset that the space opera aspects of the film and the issues of time travel overshadowed concerns about why Matthew McConaughey and his crew had to leave the earth in the first place.

It’s interesting to point out that both Jeff Bezos and Elon Musk have aerospace companies and want to colonize other planets out of fear that, because of climate change and “limited resources,” earth may become uninhabitable in the future. [431]

In Downsizing (2017) Matt Damon and Kristen Wiig play a couple who plan to undergo a new scientific shrinking procedure similar to Honey I Shrunk the Kids , but this time on purpose, along with thousands of other people in order to all live in miniature communities so they will use a much smaller amount of earth's natural resources. By "downsizing" they also reduce the amount of pollution they create, and help slow climate change.

Another "benefit" is that by living in the miniaturized communities everything costs less since building materials and food go much further, making ordinary middle class people wealthy in their new life. But only 3% of the population opts for "downsizing," meaning it has little effect on saving the earth from overpopulation. In the end the people who didn't succumb to the procedure are said to be on the verge of all dying from global warming, but the miniature "downsized" people were all safe in an underground bunker, and they will be the ones to repopulate the earth once the climate calamity finally ends.

In Geostorm (2017) special weather-controlling satellites are put in space to save the planet from all the climate change we've caused, only to get sabotaged and turned into weapons of mass destruction. [432] Despite the film's over the top special effects showing major cities around the world being completely destroyed, climate change alarmists felt it was a good try regardless since it helped raise awareness for the "ecological tipping point" they fear we are approaching and were glad that climate change had been a common theme in several movies that year. [433]

Ethan Hawke stars in First Reformed (2017) where he plays a minister struggling with his faith after his son died in the War in Iraq because he encouraged him to enlist in the military as part of the "family tradition." The earth is on the verge of being uninhabitable because of climate change, and at one point a woman calls him to ask if he will counsel her boyfriend out of concern for his environmental extremist views.

The woman later finds a suicide vest her boyfriend made that he planned to use to fight back against the industrialists who ruined the planet. Hawke takes it but agrees not to call the police, hoping he can talk some sense into the man and avoid getting him in trouble. The minister then researches climate change for himself, starts to agree with the man's extremist views, and begins planning to use the suicide vest himself to kill a wealthy factory owner and others who aren't good stewards of the earth.

Writer and director Paul Schrader said the film reflects his own "despair" over the "climate crisis." [434]

Equally corny was the 2018 version of The Predator where a key part of the plot was when the humans figured out why the creatures had returned to the earth after the incident depicted in the original film. The aliens, it turns out, were worried that climate change was going to make humans extinct soon, so the creatures came to earth to collect our DNA for their own genetic experiments before it was no longer available!

"How long before climate change renders this planet unlivable? Two generations? One?" asks a federal agent trying to kill the creatures. Then it suddenly dawns on the lead scientist, played by Olivia Munn. "That's why their visits are increasing. They're trying to snap up all of our best DNA before we're gone." [435] That's literally the reason given in the film as to why they returned to earth! Climate change was going to kill us!

HBO's Years and Years aired an entire episode focusing on the issue. The series follows a political family over the course of 15 years, with each episode taking place in a different time period, and one in the year 2025 depicts the north pole as having melted because of global warming.

A lead character (Edith Lyons) says, "We keep saying, 'you've got ten more years to sort out climate change, you've got ten more years to sort out flooding, you've got ten more years to sort out the rain forest.' We've been saying that for 30 years. It's too late. We've run out of time. Everyone knows it." [436]

The show goes on to warn that most people will soon starve from floods destroying crops and those who survive will have to live in small huts and only have their memories of what life was like before the climate catastrophe.

Aquaman (2018) starring Jason Momoa depicted the King of Atlantis "Orm" starting a war with humans because of the decades of pollution we have been dumping into the ocean. Despite its pro-environmental message, some critics were upset that the words "global warming" were never actually explicitly mentioned in the film.

"Aquaman shows, with unfortunate clarity, that the superhero film genre is ill-equipped to take on serious subjects," said one critic. "Superhero stories love to imagine the end of the world, but don't have much to offer in the face of actual global catastrophes." [437]

“Aquaman” Jason Momoa took the role very seriously however. When actor Chris Pratt posted a picture on his Instagram showing himself after a workout, he got “called out” by Momoa for drinking from a “single-use” plastic water bottle. Pratt then apologized. [438] Even if you recycle your plastic water bottle, that’s not environmentally friendly enough, so now the extremists are shaming people who don’t drink out of re-usable water bottles instead.

In the Marvel superhero film Venom , the villain who is using his personal space exploration company to search for other inhabitable planets because “overpopulation and climate change” are going to make earth “uninhabitable” in just “literally” one more generation. [439] It’s by accident that one of their probes discovers an alien symbiotic lifeform that is brought back to earth, creating the “Venom” superhero by merging with a man’s DNA.

“Thanos Did Nothing Wrong”

Fighting climate change often involves reducing the earth’s population, since the more people there are living on the planet, the larger our supposed accumulative carbon footprint is, and it’s under this rationale that some environmentalists sided with Avengers villain Thanos in his quest to kill half of all life in the Universe.

In the movies, that’s his goal once he obtains all of the “Infinity Stones” which would grant him supernatural power, and some critics began arguing that instead of being a psychotic villain, Thanos “did nothing wrong.” The saying “Thanos did nothing wrong” had become a popular Internet meme from nihilist fans who sided with him, but some on the Left took it seriously thinking that it would help save the earth.

Forbes magazine asked “Is Thanos right about overpopulation? His rationale seems to make sense if we consider our own planet. Since the Industrial Revolution, the world population has grown rapidly. The figure is currently over 7.6 billion and is projected to reach 10 billion in 2050… Fewer people ought to mean more food and less hunger, and might lower the risk of an epidemic when overcrowding enables the spread of disease. Human activity is driving a loss of biodiversity, with about 25% of animals and plants now threatened with extinction, so halving the population would help other species. As a consequence, you could conclude that by eliminating 50% of all humans, Thanos did the Earth a huge favor.” [440]

Their review concluded, “you could indeed argue that Thanos did nothing wrong—and in the long run, the villain might have actually saved the world.” [441]

Population Control The idea of dramatically reducing the earth’s population in order to “save” it is actually something that environmental extremists have been promoting for decades. Back in the late 1960s, Stanford University professor Paul R. Ehrlich published a book titled The Population Bomb, which warned that within the next ten years society would collapse from massive famines because there were too many people on the planet using too many resources. [442]

Despite the book being wildly inaccurate and over 50 years later the predictions laughable, many activists are still warning that we need to immediately reduce the population to save the planet. [443] Some celebrities like Miley Cyrus have even said they’re not going to have children because of climate change. [444] Alexandria Ocasio-Cortez has also said she too isn’t sure whether or not she wants to have kids for the same reason. [445] Many others are blaming couples who have children for contributing to the “problem.” [446]

With Transhumanism appearing to be on the horizon which promises to extend our lifespan by hundreds of years (or indefinitely), [447] proponents are becoming increasingly concerned that this will cause the earth’s natural resources to become even more rapidly depleted because if people are able to quadruple their lifespan, that also means they’ll end up using four times as much energy, food, and other natural resources as well. [448]

The mysterious Georgia Guidestones monument located in the small town of Elberton, Georgia, was erected in 1980 to declare the “need” for such actions. The 19-foot-tall monument consists of four slabs of granite planted into the ground with 10 “commandments” engraved on each side, written in eight different languages. [449]

The first of the ten “commandments” is to reduce the planet’s population down to 500 million, an over 90% reduction from its current 7.5 billion. The “Guidestones” were commissioned and paid for by an unknown man using the pseudonym R.C. Christian who said he represented a group that wanted the monument built to send the world a message. [450]

Sports “News”

Unlike politics and religion, sports is supposed to be the one universal activity that people can enjoy or discuss without the usual controversies associated with the human condition. One would expect that sports news shows and networks would be the last place you’d hear about politics, let alone be subjected to political propaganda, but unfortunately that’s not true these days.

In the past, sports and politics would occasionally intersect but usually only when a star athlete joined a political cause and their involvement was part of a human-interest story. It was usually void of much controversy because often their activities weren’t divisive or controversial, but instead humanitarian in nature.

But recently many sports writers, websites, and television networks have become liberal propaganda outlets, promoting left wing causes and putting athletes on pedestals who become token symbols of the liberal agenda. The entire NBA and NFL endorse the Black Lives Matter movement and have turned Colin Kaepernick, the former San Francisco 49ers player who refused to stand during the National Anthem before games, into a hero for starting the trend.

When the 2020 NBA season began after a long delay from the COVID-19 pandemic, many of the players wore special jerseys with “social justice” messages printed on them in place of their last names on the back. [451] The league had worked with Nike to make the “Black Lives Matter” jerseys. This was in response to the protests (and riots) that spread across the country that summer when it became mandatory for sports leagues to condemn White people for “systemically” ruining Black people’s lives. Several basketball stadiums even painted “Black Lives Matter” on the courts. [452]

The NFL also kicked off the 2020 season with the “Black National Anthem” being performed at the start of each game during week one in order to help “raise awareness” of “systemic racism” in America. [453] The

"Black National Anthem" is a song titled "Lift Ev'ry Voice And Sing" that many Black people consider to be "their" national anthem, instead of the Star Spangled Banner.

Even NASCAR became political in 2020 when they banned drivers and fans from displaying any Confederate flags at the races just two days after the league's only (half) Black driver Bubba Wallace made the demand. [454] Then a week and a half later someone allegedly hung a "noose" in his garage at the Talladega Superspeedway in Alabama right before a big race. Bubba became a hero overnight from the media endlessly reporting that a "racist" NASCAR fan upset at him for getting the Confederate flag banned must have snuck into his garage and hung the "noose" for revenge.

At the race the next day Bubba was given a parade as he rolled out onto the track to show how the entire league supported him for being so "brave" for what he had gone through. [455] Only, as I'm sure you know, the "noose" turned out to be the handle on the end of the rope which is used to pull open the garage doors at the track. [456] But Bubba had become a star overnight and was a NASCAR hero for standing up against the imaginary "hate crime" that 15 FBI agents wasted their time investigating. [457]

After Amazon obtained the naming rights to Seattle's NHL arena, formerly called Key Arena, they changed the name to Climate Pledge Arena to "raise awareness" for climate change, so now fans can't watch a hockey game in Seattle without the constant reminder to be on the lookout for global warming. [458] Not even the Super Bowl Halftime shows are safe from becoming avenues to deliver political messages with musical guests sometimes incorporating "social justice" propaganda into their performances. [459]

Sportswriter Bryan Curtis noted, "There was a time when filling your column with liberal ideas on race, class, gender, and labor policy got you dubbed a 'sociologist.' These days, such views are more likely to get you a job." [460]

Sports broadcaster Jason Whitlock said, "ESPN and most of the mainstream media have lurched farther left. That's a complaint from middle America and, in my opinion, objective America. ESPN's own ombudsman acknowledged ESPN's hardcore progressive slant." [461]

Speaking about Fox Sports 1, a competitor to ESPN, he said, "I think we're the alternative for sports fans who respect and like traditional sports values. I think we're the alternative for mainstream sports fans, Little League coaches, athletes, sports moms and dads. I think we're the alternative for people who want to hear authentic conversation and debate rather than words crafted for Twitter applause. I think we're the alternative for middle America, blue-collar sports fans. I think we're the alternative for people who don't think every misspoken word is a fireable offense. ESPN caters to the elite, safe-space crowd. We cater to the people who love to tailgate and knock down a six-pack." [462]

Michael Brendan Dougherty, editor of The Slurve baseball newsletter, wrote, "It's also true that conservative ideas tend to be slower off the block. Because they are defenders of tradition, conservatives' arguments often strike liberals as either an unreflective devotion to the way things are (or were), or as being too subtle to be credible." [463]

For the 2015 season the NBA teamed up with Sheryl Sandberg, a radical feminist and top executive at Facebook, to promote her "Lean In" campaign which nagged men to, "take more responsibility for housework and child care," and said they need to "do their fair share of daily chores." [464] The campaign aired commercials on TV during basketball games which used NBA players like LeBron James and Stephen Curry to lecture men to help out more around the house with laundry and other chores. [465]

In 2015 ESPN gave Caitlyn Jenner the Arthur Ashe Courage Award, choosing "her" over others—including double amputee Noah Galloway, who is an Iraq War veteran—and despite missing one arm and one leg became a competitive distance runner, CrossFit athlete, and won third place on Dancing With the Stars . [466]

Caitlyn Jenner was also chosen over fellow nominee Lauren Hill, a college basketball player who lost her fight with a brain tumor. [467] Surprisingly, veteran sports broadcaster Bob Costas admitted choosing Caitlyn Jenner was a "crass exploitation play," saying, "In the broad world of sports, I'm pretty sure they could've found someone—and this is not anything against Caitlyn Jenner—who was much closer actively involved in sports, who would've been deserving of what that award represents." [468] Caitlyn Jenner hadn't played competitive sports since the 1980s (when "she" was Bruce). Sports Illustrated also put "her" on the cover at the age of 66 wearing the gold metal "she" won at the 1976 Olympics as Bruce, forty years earlier. [469]

Not long after this, ESPN fired baseball analyst Curt Schilling because he posted a meme on his personal Facebook page criticizing new transgender bathroom laws which allow biological males to use women's bathrooms, locker rooms, and showers. [470] The meme simply consisted of a man dressed as a woman with the caption, "Let him in to the restroom with your daughter or else you're a narrow minded, judgmental, unloving, racist bigot, who needs to die!"

ESPN's President John Skipper was asked if the "perceived political shift" in sports becoming political was a "conscious decision" by the network. He responded, "It is accurate that the Walt Disney Company and ESPN are committed to diversity and inclusion. These are long-standing values that drive fundamental fairness while providing us with the widest possible pool of talent to create the smartest and most creative staff. We do not view this as a political stance but as a human stance. We do not think tolerance is the domain of a particular political philosophy." [471]

One conservative employee at ESPN revealed, "If you're a Republican or conservative, you feel the need to talk in whispers. There's even a fear of putting Fox News on a TV [in the office]." [472]

Speaking shortly after the 2016 Presidential election, ESPN's public editor Jim Brady said, "As it turns out, ESPN is far from immune from the political fever that has afflicted so much of the country over the past year. Internally, there's a feeling among many staffers—both liberal and conservative—that the company's perceived move leftward has had a stifling effect on discourse inside the company and has affected its public-facing products. Consumers have sensed that same leftward movement, alienating some." [473]

Sportscaster Joe Buck is uncomfortable with sports recently becoming political, saying, "Unless I'm completely wrong, and I know in this case I'm not, nobody's tuning into the 49ers-Cowboys game to hear my political opinions, whether it's about Trump, or Kaepernick or Flint, Michigan. That's not why they're watching a football game. It's misplaced. I hear guys doing it at times. It seems self-serving. Like they want to inject themselves into the conversation. Wait for a talk show. Go on Bill Maher's show. Bill O'Reilly. Whoever. I think people watch these games to get away from that stuff. I think you risk alienating and upsetting a lot of people when you start going down that rabbit hole." [474]

NFL Promotes "Social Justice"

Shortly into the 2017 season, NFL players and owners issued a joint statement saying they held an important meeting to, "discuss plans to utilize our platform to promote equality and effectuate positive change. We agreed that these are common issues and pledged to meet again to continue this work together." [475] Then Roger Goodell, NFL Commissioner, sent a letter to the Senate Judiciary Committee encouraging them to pass the Sentencing Reform and Corrections Act of 2017, which would reduce the prison sentences for drug offenders.

A few months later the NFL announced the creation of their new "Inspire Change" initiative which involves giving millions of dollars in grants to "social justice" causes, including "helping schools implement more comprehensive African-American history education programs." [476]

The NFL also started becoming concerned that the tradition of using beautiful women as cheerleaders was "sexist," so for the 2018 season they introduced male "cheerleaders" for the first time. The Los Angeles Rams and the New Orleans Saints were the first two teams to add them, and they're not there to help the girls perform stunts by tossing them into the air and catching them. They dance with the girls and do all the same routines on the sidelines, even holding pom-poms. [477] Instead of being denounced as stupid or weird, they were hailed by the liberal media for "making history." [478]

Nike also decided to get into politics recently. In September 2018 the sportswear giant put out a new ad featuring Colin Kaepernick to celebrate the 30th anniversary of the company's "Just Do It" campaign. While it was a polarizing choice, pushing half of their potential customers away who despise Kaepernick for his anti-American and anti-police activism, Nike's revenue increased over the previous year's quarter. [479]

Under their new business model they don't care how many of their previous customers will never buy a Nike product again because with Kaepernick as their new poster boy the company's focus is now on the fanatics who will buy Nike gear even more because it reflects their social justice warrior identity. [480]

As everyone knows, Black people dominate the NBA and NFL—and other sports like long distance running; but NBC Sports president Pete Bevacqua is worried that too many White people play golf. "Golf hasn't had the best history," he says. "Golf needs more diversity. How do you get more minorities playing the game, how do you get more women playing the game? I think all of golf understands that, whether it's the LPGA, the PGA Tour, the USGA, the PGA of America, Augusta National." [481]

Imagine a sports broadcaster saying there's too many Black people in the NBA, or that it needs more "racial diversity!" They would be fired within the hour, but as I detailed in the "War on White People" chapter, the liberal media has no problem with anti-White racism, and in fact encourages it.

Jemele Hill (a proud Black woman) who was co-host of SportsCenter, called President Trump a "White supremacist" in 2017 without any repercussions from the network. [482] Such an outrageous comment from the host of ESPN's flagship show drew criticism from White House Press Secretary Sarah Huckabee Sanders and even President Trump himself. Many had become accustomed to hearing such slander from CNN and MSNBC panelists, but coming from an ESPN host took things to a new level of depravity.

"Pride Night"

All major sports leagues now host an annual "Pride Night" where they celebrate LGBT people, decorate their stadiums with rainbows, and bring special guests to the games from the gay (and transgender) community. To make sure everything is gay enough they even have gay men's choirs sing the national anthem. [483] Today, most—if not all—NBA teams now host one each year, but it's not just the NBA.

The NFL launched their own annual "Pride Night" as well, to "heighten sensitivity to the LGBTQ community" and show their "commitment to an inclusive environment in which all employees are welcome." [484] As of 2018, every major league baseball team except one hosted an annual Pride Night. [485] The following year the one hold out (the Yankees) gave in and held their first "Legacy of Pride" night and even awarded scholarships to various LGBT students. [486]

Even the NHL has an annual Pride Night, where they too decorate the stadiums in rainbow colors and players even use hockey sticks wrapped in rainbow colored tape to show support for the LGBT community. [487] You can’t even go to a hockey game these days without LGBT propaganda being shoved in your face.

The Super Bowl Since the Super Bowl is the most-watched event on television every year, the NFL and their sponsors can’t pass up the opportunity to spread liberal propaganda to as many people as possible. Lately we’ve been seeing an increasing amount of Super Bowl commercials pushing a political agenda, from Audi using a car commercial to complain about the (non-existent) “gender pay gap” to a lumber company denouncing President Trump’s plan to build a wall on the U.S. / Mexico border. [488] The NFL has also reportedly refused to air pro Second Amendment commercials. [489]

Even the Halftime show, which might be the last place one would expect to push a political agenda, isn’t immune. In 2016, Beyonce was the featured artist and turned her performance into a dedication to the Black Panthers and Black Lives Matter. [490] The following year, with tensions still high from the recent Presidential election, Lady Gaga also used the spotlight to promote a political agenda, although a lot more subtle than Beyonce the year before.

Many people missed it, but it was there, and it was undeniable if you knew what to look for. [491] Gaga gave a shoutout to the anti-Trump protesters who were (at the time) out protesting the new president’s temporary travel ban from seven countries which had been identified as hotbeds of terrorism. [492]

When Jennifer Lopez and Shakira performed in a sex-charged halftime show that included stripper poles, booty shaking, and crotch-grabbing; they also depicted “kids in cages” as a way to denounce President Trump’s immigration policy of detaining people who cross illegally into our country. [493] Both Jennifer Lopez and Shakira are of Latin descent, and at one point during their performance they started singing in Spanish to cater to the tens of millions of non-assimilating immigrants who are occupying areas in American cities.

After the New England Patriots visited the White House following their 2017 Super Bowl win, the New York Times tweeted out two side by side photos, one showing when the Patriots visited the White House in 2015 when Barack Obama was president, and the other from the current visit, giving the impression that far fewer players showed up because they didn't want to have anything to do with President Trump. [494]

The official Patriots Twitter account then issued a statement saying, "These photos lack context. Facts: In 2015, over 40 football staff were on the stairs. In 2017, they were seated on the South Lawn." [495] Countless other people called out the New York Times for their fake news, and of course President Trump took to Twitter to denounce them as well. [496]

The next day the New York Times sports editor Jason Stallman apologized, saying, "Bad tweet by me. Terrible tweet. I wish I could say it's complicated, but no, this one is pretty straightforward: I'm an idiot. It was my idea, it was my execution, it was my blunder. I made a decision in about four minutes that clearly warranted much more time. Once we learned more, we tried to fix everything as much as possible as swiftly as possible and as transparently as possible. Of course, at that point the damage was done. I just needed to own it." [497]

But that wasn't the only politicizing of the Patriot's White House visit. Rob Gronkowski, who played tight end, interrupted Sean Spicer's press briefing that day asking if he needed any help [arguing with the fake news] in a hilarious stunt that had Spicer and the press corps laughing, but ESPN's Max Kellerman didn't think it was funny at all.

"When the press corps is cracking up at a press secretary because of an athlete's presence there, so he's lending something to the proceedings, the athlete is, and the press corps is, you know, they're having a rollicking good time…that's a very bad thing. That's an unhealthy thing to have happened," he complained on air. [498]

Kellerman went on to say that Gronkowski's prank "normalized" Sean Spicer, who he insists worked for an "authoritarian" administration. [499]

Layoffs Many people were growing tired of politics being intertwined with sports coverage, especially when the issues weren't even remotely related, and polls began showing it was causing some viewers to tune out. [500] In April 2017 ESPN laid off about 100 people, including several on-air personalities, and six months later laid off another 150 people. [501]

This was after ESPN had reportedly lost an average of 15,000 subscribers a day in October alone, totaling an estimated decline of 465,000 for the month. [502] In the fiscal year of 2018 they lost two million subscribers. [503] While some of the loss can be ascribed to cord-cutters ditching cable in favor of streaming services, a significant portion was due to fans becoming sick of the players protesting during the national anthem. [504]

In October 2019 the sports news website Deadspin sent out a memo to their editors and staff telling them to stick to sports and stop covering politics since the website had steadily drifted into regularly complaining about President Trump. The memo said in part, "Deadspin will write only about sports and that which is relevant to sports in some way." [505] The editor-in-chief then decided to plaster the entire website with political and pop culture news in protest, and was immediately fired. He unironically tweeted, "I've just been fired from Deadspin for not sticking to sports." [506]

Members of the staff then quit en masse to show solidarity with the editor, and to also protest the new "stick to sports" policy. [507] Yes, people who worked for a sports website quit when management told them to write about sports!

Sports are supposed to be an outlet for people to get away from the stress and responsibilities we face during the work week. And the last thing most sports fans want is to have politics brought up when they're trying to enjoy their favorite game, but unfortunately "stick to sports" is no longer the motto for most sports entertainment outlets.

While playing sports is a great way for kids and adults to stay physically fit and learn about working together with others, the artificial importance placed on professional sports entertainment largely serves as a type of bread and circus distraction, diverting people's attention and energy away from important problems in society.

Instead, the focus is put on concerns about whose team is going to win, and which players are injured or may get traded, and other trivial and meaningless controversies which, when you boil them down, do nothing other than serve to keep people pacified with things that lack any real importance whatsoever.

George Orwell summed this phenomenon up in his prophetic novel Nineteen Eighty-Four when he wrote, “films, football, beer, and above all, gambling filled up the horizon of [people’s] minds. To keep them in control was not difficult.” [508]

Almost all of the one-star reviews on Amazon for my last three books "The Liberal Media Industrial Complex," "The True Story of Fake News," and "Liberalism: Find a Cure" are from NON-verified purchases which shows the "reviewers" probably didn't even read them, and just hate me.

So if you could help me offset their fake one-star reviews by leaving a real one yourself since you actually read the book, that would help a lot!

Late-Night Comedy Shows For decades the late-night talk shows were something Americans could watch at the end of the day to get a few laughs about current events, celebrity stupidity, or from other theatrics. Viewers couldn’t tell Johnny Carson’s politics because he was an equal opportunity offender. The same was true for Jay Leno and David Letterman who were staples of late-night TV for a generation.

Starting the evening following Donald Trump’s victory over Hillary Clinton in 2016, late night TV stopped being funny. In fact, the hosts were visibly distraught when they took to the air, speaking in a somber tone as if we had just experienced a national tragedy. They tried to pull themselves together over the following days and weeks, but late-night television was never the same.

Today Jimmy Kimmel, Stephen Colbert, and Jimmy Fallon aren't merely "entertainers." They are stealth propagandists; whose political messages go down easier than those from "news" outlets because it's covered in comedy. Their agenda is no longer to make people laugh, it's to get them to cheer on the liberal agenda and mock conservatives.

New York Magazine embraced comedy's new mission and asked, "How Funny Does Comedy Need to Be?" noticing that it wasn't very funny anymore. "Like post-rock, post-comedy uses the elements of comedy (be it stand-up, sitcom, or film) but without the goal of creating the traditional comedic result—laughter—instead focusing on tone, emotional impact, storytelling, and formal experimentation. The goal of being 'funny' is optional for some or for the entirety of the piece." [509] Comedy without comedy? At least they're honest enough to admit the shows aren't funny anymore.

When Supreme Court Justice Anthony Kennedy announced he was retiring, opening the door for President Trump to nominate a second judge to the court, the official Comedy Central Twitter account tweeted sarcastically "Thanks, Justice Kennedy," along with a graphic that read "Supremely Fucked." [510]

Comedy Central's Jim Jefferies went so far as to deceptively edit an interview with a man named Avi Yemini who is opposed to Muslims mass emigrating to European countries, but unbeknown to Comedy Central, Yemini secretly recorded the entire interview and posted it on YouTube to show how manipulated the footage was for the segment when it aired and demonstrated how many of his statements were completely taken out of context. He then sued them for defamation. [511]

Some hosts like HBO's John Oliver are steeped in guilt because they mocked the idea of Donald Trump becoming president. When guest hosting the Daily Show, John Oliver responded to a news clip reporting Trump was considering running in 2016 by saying, "Do it. Do it! I will personally write you a campaign check now!" because he thought it would make for some great material and didn't think for a moment Trump had a chance to actually win. Now John Oliver lives in misery every day of his life.

In an interview five years after he was fired from NBC as host of the Tonight Show, Jay Leno was asked how much different the late-night comedy shows are in the Trump era. "Do you miss being on the show, or is it such a different time that it would be hard to do?" Al Roker asked him.

“No, it’s different. I don’t miss it,” he replied, going on to say during his time hosting he didn’t want people to know his politics, so he tried to hit both sides equally. [512] “Because, you know, the theory when we did the show was you just watch the news, we’ll make fun of the news, and get your mind off the news. Well, now people just want to be on the news all the time. You just have one subject that’s the same topic every night, which makes it—makes it very hard. I mean, all the comics, Jimmy and Colbert and everybody else, it’s tough when that’s the only topic out there.” [513]

Leno noted that the comedy on late-night TV is now “one-sided” and “all very serious” and that “I’d just like to see a bit of civility come back to it, you know?” [514]

Saturday Night Live alumni Rob Schneider noted today, “Much late-night comedy is less about being funny and more about indoctrination by comedic imposition. People aren’t really laughing at it as much as cheering on the rhetoric.” [515]

Jimmy Kimmel Jimmy Kimmel is largely credited with killing the Republicans’ plan to repeal Obamacare after he spent several nights ranting (and crying) about it on his show in 2017, claiming it would prevent poor people from getting healthcare. He even used his newborn son Billy as a prop since he was born with a congenital heart defect and claimed that if Obamacare was repealed then other children with similar life-threatening conditions would die.

But Kimmel wasn’t coming up with his Obamacare material on his own. The Daily Beast admitted, “Kimmel and his team were in touch with health care officials, charities and advocacy groups,” as well as Senator Chuck Schumer who, “provided technical guidance and info about the bill, as well as stats from various think tanks and experts on the effects of [it].” [516]

CNN asked, “Did Jimmy Kimmel kill the health care bill?” after Senator John McCain [who cast the deciding vote] said he wouldn’t support the repeal. “Kimmel’s critique [of the Republican plan] inspired intense coverage and analyses, pundits debated Kimmel's expertise on the subject while others told him to stay in his lane, and the comedian found himself again at the center of the health care fight." [517]

Kimmel's propaganda efforts have extended far beyond healthcare. He has used children in skits about how "disastrous" global warming is. [518] He calls CPAC the largest gathering of "anti-vaxxers" and "very angry White people." [519] And he even called for Supreme Court Justice Brett Kavanaugh to be castrated. [520]

Kimmel says, "It just so happens that almost every talk show host is a liberal and that's because it requires a level of intelligence." [521] He has also admitted that sharing his political views "has cost me commercially" but neither he nor ABC care, because it's "for a good cause." [522]

Stephen Colbert Stephen Colbert took over The Late Show from David Letterman in 2015 and ever since has turned the nightly monologue into an anti-Trump editorial, but his audience enjoys it, even his pathetic Donald Trump impression which should be enough for anyone with any taste in comedy to change the channel.

He plays a big role, however, in politics. Practically all the Democrat candidates running for president in 2020 appeared on his show: Bernie Sanders, Kamala Harris, Julian Castro, Beto O'Rourke, Elizabeth Warren, Corey Booker, etc. CNN admitted that, "Aides for several of the most-talked-about contenders confirmed that they view Colbert as a crucial stop on the presidential roadshow," and one campaign official who spoke off the record said, "We strategize about Stephen a lot." [523]

New York senator Kirsten Gillibrand announced she was running for President in 2020 on his show. [524] She had coordinated with them and then Stephen shamelessly had her on to awkwardly ask if she had anything to announce, and then she revealed the "big" news. Congressman Eric Swalwell also officially announced he was running for president in 2020 on Colbert's show. [525] His campaign soon embarrassingly ended with him begging people on Twitter to donate “just one dollar” in hopes he could stay in a little bit longer.

Jimmy Fallon Poor Jimmy Fallon tried not to become a rabid anti-Trump ranter out of concerns he would ostracize half his viewers, but was reportedly pressured by NBC to stop being so soft on Trump. [526] Industry-wide Fallon was shunned and denounced after his 2016 interview with then-candidate Donald Trump because he didn’t use the opportunity to tear into him, and instead had a fun interview like he does with all of his guests.

Trump even famously let Jimmy mess up his hair to prove it was real, but the liberal media was furious and claimed Fallon had “humanized” him. [527] He was shut out of the Emmys that year in what many speculated was retaliation for “helping” Trump. [528] Fallon later apologized for being too friendly and said that people “have a right to be mad.” [529]

Despite trying to not have a show tainted with an obvious political agenda like Stephen Colbert and Jimmy Kimmel, Fallon soon bent to the will of his producers and started focusing more on the president and other social justice issues.

He even had anti-gun activist David Hogg and his sister on the show to rail against the NRA and Florida Senator Marco Rubio for not supporting radical anti-gun laws. [530] Fallon had the kids recount their experience during the Parkland school shooting, because what could be a more appropriate topic for a late night comedy show than talking about a mass shooting at a school?

Saturday Night Live Once a staple of American comedy, Saturday Night Live has been on a slow and continuous decline, perhaps in part to an increasing number of options for viewers with the growth of cable TV and more recently streaming services and other online entertainment; but the show’s parodies of presidential politics still bring in viewers and the sketches make headlines.

More importantly than that, Saturday Night Live has been responsible for significantly altering how tens of millions of people view certain politicians. One critic noted, “The series has also shown a deft ability to define politicians’ personas—for better or worse.

For some, Chevy Chase’s exaggerated version of President Gerald Ford or Dana Carvey’s over-the-top President George H.W. Bush are more familiar than the politicians’ actual legacies. And sketches spoofing the likes of Michael Dukakis and Sarah Palin have had a much longer shelf life than the real-life versions’ political careers.” [531]

University of Tennessee professor and blogger Glenn Reynolds admitted, “Personally, I think that Chevy Chase cost Ford the 1976 election. Well, part of it, anyway.” [532] Decades later Chase admitted, “[M]y leanings were Democratic and I wanted [Jimmy] Carter in and I wanted [Ford] out, and I figured look, we’re reaching millions of people every weekend, why not do it.” [533]

During the 2000 presidential campaign Darrell Hammond’s character of Al Gore was devastating, accentuating his dull personality to the point that the real Al Gore reminded people of Hammond’s character. SNL’s portrayal of a George W. Bush vs Al Gore debate showed him repeatedly referring to his “lock box” and haunted Gore for the remainder of the campaign. Will Ferrell’s impression of a bumbling George W. Bush is what really launched him to stardom.

In 2008 Tina Fey’s portrayal of Sarah Palin stuck like glue and many political analysts credit SNL with permanently tarnishing her image in the minds of millions of voters. [534] While the show and its cast have always leaned Left, once they came down with Trump Derangement Syndrome their sickness began showing its symptoms in their skits.

In 2018 they sung a special rendition of Mariah Carey’s “All I want for Christmas Is You” conveying their wishes to have Robert Mueller throw President Trump in prison. [535] And their anti-Trump obsession has caused them to sink so low that they actually endorsed assassinating him.

Cast member Michael Ché began, “Maybe I just don’t understand politics well, because when they said Trump was gettin’ impeached, I immediately thought, ‘Great! Trump’s fired! Let’s get drunk!’ But they’re like ‘no, he’s just being impeached, but he ain’t exactly impeached yet, it’s still gonna take another year or so.” [536]

The punchline was, “You know, I’ll bet somebody explained how long impeachment took to John Wilkes Booth, and he was like ‘Okay, well where’s he at right now?’” [537]

Jokes about assassinating a current President, or any President even after they’ve left office, have always been out of bounds, especially for any show on network television, but Saturday Night Live decided to go there.

SNL alumni Norm McDonald has trashed the show’s obsessive anti-Trump agenda, such as framing his 2016 election victory as if it was the end of the world. “I was like, what the fuck are we getting through? That a man was duly elected president? What are you, crazy? …I can get through anything. I got through my own father’s death. You think I can’t get through a man getting elected president of the United States?” [538]

McDonald made it clear that he is certainly no fan of President Trump, but says they’re “playing into Trump’s hands.” [539] He said he doesn’t even do political jokes because he hates politics and mostly just watches sports. Pondering how comedy shows have gotten so partisan these days he said, “I wonder when it happened. Maybe with Jon Stewart. But it happened at some point that talk show hosts had to be political pundits.” [540]

The Good Old Days In a 1984 interview with Barbara Walters, late night legend Johnny Carson was asked if there were things in the world that bothered him and caused him to want to use his platform (then host of The Tonight Show on NBC) to raise awareness for them. He responded, “I think one of the dangers if you are a comedian, which basically I am, is that if you start to take yourself too seriously and start to comment on social issues, your sense of humor suffers somewhere.” [541]

"I've seen other people, whose names I won't mention, who do humor, and then somewhere along the line they start to want to make their views known. I try to do it humorously. Some critics over the years have said that our show doesn't have great sociological value, it's not controversial, it's not deep," defending the show saying it's just to entertain people and make them laugh. [542]

He was asked a few years earlier by Mike Wallace on 60 Minutes about why he never gets political. "Do you get sensitive about that fact that people say 'he'll never take a serious controversy?" [543]

Carson responded, "Well, I have an answer to that. Now tell me that last time that Jack Benny, Red Skelton, any comedian, used his show to do serious issues. That's not what I'm there for. Can't they see that? Why do they think that just because you have a Tonight Show that you should deal in serious issues? That's a danger. That's a real danger. Once you start that, you start to get that self-important feeling that what you say has great import, and strangely enough, you could use that show as a forum, you could sway people, and I don't think you should as an entertainer." [544]

Hate Crime Charges for Jokes?

Although mainstream shows have lost their edge and turned into social justice cesspools, some stand-up comedians are trying to save freedom of speech by carrying on the tradition of George Carlin, Lenny Bruce, and others who stood up for the right to offend people with thin skin, but comedy is under attack by the Thought Police who want people arrested for telling jokes. The London Independent published a piece titled, "As a comedy aficionado, I'm appalled at disgusting 'jokes' creeping back into the industry" where the columnist complained, "Comedians, crying 'free speech' isn't good enough—hate crime laws should apply to all of us." [545]

She complained about what she called "Alt-Right comedy" naming YouTubers PewDiePie and Sargon of Akkod as supposedly having "persuaded some comedians that there is money to be made from belittling social justice." [546]

The writer then whined about Ricky Gervais' Netflix special Humanity where he "deadnamed" Caitlyn Jenner (liberalspeak for calling a transgender person by their legal name or birth name), and complained about Dave Chappelle cracking some jokes about transgender people too, saying, “I would go so far as to argue that some of the jokes I have heard on the comedy circuit of late constitute actual hate speech.” [547]

Chappelle’s 2019 Netflix special Sticks & Stones upset a lot of liberals since they have no sense of humor and he kept the edge he once had for his Comedy Central sketch series in the early 2000s. Vice News told their moronic readers that “You can definitely skip Dave Chappelle’s new Netflix special Sticks & Stones ” because he “doubles down on misogyny and transphobia.” [548] The critics at Rotten Tomatoes, the popular entertainment rating website, gave it an approval rating of just 35% while the average audience rating is at 99%. [549]

Matt Stone, co-creator of South Park, said that the reason so many critics trashed it was because they were afraid to say it was actually funny. “When I read TV reviews or cultural reviews, I think of someone in prison, writing. I think about somebody writing a hostage note. This is not what they think. This is what they have to do to keep their job in a social media world.” [550]

Tim Allen has said that today he couldn’t do his old act from the ‘90s because it would be deemed too “sexist” since much of it was about the dynamics between men and women. [551] His hit show Last Man Standing was canceled by ABC after he appeared on the Jimmy Kimmel show and joked about how being a conservative in Hollywood these days is like being a Jew in 1930s Germany because of the persecution they face. [552]

ABC claimed it was canceled because the show wasn’t performing as well as they wanted, but it was actually the network’s second most watched comedy, and the third most watched show on the entire network. [553] It was later picked up by FOX where it instantly became the highest rated show on its night. [554]

Many European countries have much stricter “hate speech” laws than the United States, and it’s a model the Left wants to implement here, starting by amending or repealing the First Amendment to allow criminal charges for people who say things that hurt others feelings or are “divisive” and “not inclusive.” [555] Scottish comedian “Count Dankula” was famously arrested and convicted for hate speech after he posted a video on YouTube showing that he trained his girlfriend’s dog to do a “Nazi salute” as a joke to upset her. [556]

There is no doubt that Leftists would love to have political commentators like me arrested for jokes (or even sarcastic statements) about Black people, illegal aliens, gays, and transgenders. Comedy, which was once seen as the last bastion of free speech, is increasingly coming under attack by intolerant liberals who aim to use the mechanisms of government to silence people if the social media companies won’t.

Award Shows Award shows aren’t just for awards. They themselves are elaborate propaganda campaigns whose winners are often chosen, not because of their extraordinary talent, but because certain songs, movies, and TV shows promote agendas the social engineers want to encourage. Movies that fail miserably at the box office are still awarded if the Hollywood elite want to highlight their “powerful” message.

In recent years the award shows have veered further left than most people could imagine, and it’s impossible to make it through one now without getting browbeat by nauseating messages about “diversity,” anti-White bigotry, and gender bending. For example, the 2018 Emmys began with Kate McKinnon (a lesbian) and Kenan Thompson (a Black man) saying, “Tonight is the celebration of the hard work and the talent of everyone in this room,” begins Kate. “That’s right,” continues Kenan.

“We’re also celebrating the fact that this year’s Emmy Awards has the most diverse group of nominees in Emmy history.”

It seemed like they may have been setting up a joke for a second, but they were really being serious. A few more celebrities then came out on stage and literally began to sing a song celebrating the “diversity” of the nominees.

Halfway through their little musical number Ricky Martin entered the stage, saying, “You haven’t solved it. This song is way too White!” and then the music changed to salsa music and they all started dancing again. At that point Saturday Night Live’s Andy Sandberg joined the group and sings, “What about me? Is there any room in this song for a straight White guy like me?”

“You can’t be a part of this,” he is told.

“Sounds good, have fun you guys,” he replies, and then walks off stage. White people should be shunned was the message. Get rid of them.

If you took a drink every time someone said “diversity” during the show you would have died of alcohol poisoning. When Jimmy Kimmel took to the stage to present he began, “We are delighted this year to have such a diverse collection of talented supporting actress nominees.” [557]

Another presenter, Emilia Clarke (best known for starring in HBO’s Game of Thrones), also had to make note of the wonderful “diversity,” saying, “Tonight, we are happy to announce that the comedy writing category, once dominated by White male nerds now boasts more female and diverse nerds than ever before.” [558]

But there were still too many White people winning awards despite the “diverse” group of nominees that night, so in protest when James Corden was presenting he told the audience at home to get #EmmysSoWhite trending on Twitter, which they did. [559]

And we can’t have an award show these days without it including a celebration of drag queens, so RuPaul was given the Emmy for his cross-dressing competition, RuPaul’s Drag Race . [560]

The Golden Globes are basically the Oscars and Emmys combined, meaning both movies and television shows are given awards. The event is put on by the Hollywood Foreign Press Association which is an organization consisting of foreign media outlets and reporters who cover American entertainment outside the United States.

It's the typical superficial award show with celebrities who think they can save the world by giving a shout out to various causes, but once Donald Trump became president it was obligatory for at least one of the winners to denounce him while accepting their award. Meryl Streep was the first at the 2017 Golden Globes, held just two months after the 2016 election, where she gave an overly dramatic speech about how he's ruining the country for immigrants. [561]

The following year feminism was the theme of the night with host Seth Meyers beginning the show by saying, "People in this room worked really hard to get here, but it's clearer now than ever before that the women had to work even harder. So thank you for all the amazing work that you've all done, and you continue to do. I look forward to you leading us into whatever comes next. So thank you so much for letting me say that." [562]

His cucking didn't stop there. After his monologue he expressed concerns that the first presenters were going to be two White men. "Now to present our first awards, please don't be two White dudes, please don't be two White dudes. Oh, thank God! It's Gal Gadot and Dwayne Johnson everybody." [563]

The very first award of the night went to a man named Ramy Youssef who won Best Actor in a Comedy Series. As soon as he took the stage he said, "Look, I know you guys haven't seen my show," and then the entire audience laughed. "Everyone's like 'is this an editor?'" he continued. [564] He was only half joking because nobody there, and hardly anyone watching at home, knew who he was.

His show Ramy streamed on Hulu and was a comedy about a Muslim family from Egypt who had just moved to New Jersey. He was given the Golden Globe as a form of affirmative action to demonstrate how "woke" Hollywood is by celebrating a Muslim comedy, not because it was the funniest show, but simply for the sake of "diversity," and he knew it.

When Jessica Chastain announced the winner for Best Actress that year, she began sarcastically, "I'm so happy to announce that the winner of this category will also receive the 23 percent of her salary that went missing in the wage gap." Chris Hemsworth, who stood there alongside her virtue signaling, added, "It's true. That's correct." [565]

When presenting the nominees for Best Actor, Geena Davis also made a sarcastic comment about the supposed wage gap, saying, "These five nominees have agreed to give half of their salary back, so that the women could make more than them." [566] But the White male bashing didn't end there. When Natalie Portman announced the winner for Best Director, she went off script, saying "And here are the all-male nominees," clearly upset that no women were nominated that year because of "sexism." [567]

At the end of the night Oprah Winfrey was given the Cecil B. de Mille Award for her "contributions" to the entertainment industry, where she gave a tearful acceptance speech causing liberals to become ecstatic and filled with hope that she would run for president in 2020 against Donald Trump.

NBC's official Twitter account even tweeted a picture of her and said, "Nothing but respect for OUR future president." [568] The New Yorker ran the headline, "Oprah Leads a Decisive Feminist Takeover." [569]

At the 2020 Golden Globes, Ellen DeGeneres was given an "Award for Excellence" for all she has done to advance the LGBT agenda. [570] The dinner which takes place before the show was an all vegan meal that year to help "raise awareness about climate change." [571] When Joaquin Phoenix won the Best Actor award for his performance in Joker, he began his acceptance speech thanking the Hollywood Foreign Press for "recognizing and acknowledging the link between animal agriculture and climate change." Adding, "It's a very bold move making tonight plant-based and it really sends a powerful message," referencing the vegan dinner. [572]

While Sacha Baron Cohen was presenting he took the opportunity to rip into Mark Zuckerberg for not cracking down on free speech enough on Facebook, sarcastically describing him as a "naive misguided child who spreads Nazi propaganda." [573] Just two months earlier Cohen gave a speech to the Jewish ADL where he aggressively called for the major social media companies to increase censorship, claiming that they're still allowing people to post "hate speech." [574]

Then during her acceptance speech for Best Actress in a Limited Series, Michelle Williams (who was visibly pregnant), admitted she once killed her other baby in an abortion and was glad that she did because if she had the kid it would have prevented her from becoming a successful actress. [575] The audience cheered her "bravery" for admitting what she had done.

The Biggest Night in Hollywood The "biggest night in Hollywood" is the Academy Awards where the Oscars are handed out, and for many years celebrities have spewed political nonsense—often about saving the environment or some issue in a third world country, but in the Trump-era, everything is about Trump.

At the 2017 Oscars, held just one month after President Trump's inauguration, host Jimmy Kimmel called him a racist and insinuated that the entire world now hates America. "I want to say thank you to President Trump," he said sarcastically. "I mean, remember last year when it seemed like the Oscars were racist?" referring to the "Oscars so White" controversy.[576]

In 2018 Call Me by Your Name was nominated for "Best Picture" which is based on the true story of a 24-year-old man seducing a 17-year-old boy. Hollywood calls that a great "love story." [577]

As the Oscars kicked off that year host Jimmy Kimmel gave a shoutout to the actor who played the boy, Timothee Chalamet, saying he is "the star of a small but powerful story, Call Me By Your Name, which did not make a lot of money, in fact, of the nine best picture nominees, only two of them made more than 100 million dollars. But that's not the point. We don't make films like Call Me By Your Name for money. We make them to upset Mike Pence." [578] (Vice President Mike Pence is a devoted Christian who doesn't support same sex "marriage.") Then came more White guilt as Black films, Black actors, and Black writers were touted as being the best. At one point Jimmy Kimmel mentioned that the new Black power film Black Panther wouldn't be included in that year's awards because it just came out, and then expressed his disappointment that there aren't more Black superheroes.

"It's weird that so many superheroes are White because that's what they were in the comics, right? People say, 'Well Superman is White. He's always been White. You know what else Superman has been? Not real!" [579] Apparently it's racist now that Superman is always White in the movies, because he's White in the comics!

Then two Black women (Tiffany Haddish and Maya Rudolph) came out to present and Maya began, "We are so happy to be here, but a little nervous too, because a few years ago people were saying that the Oscars were so White, and since then some real progress has been made." [580]

Tiffany Haddish, who has a voice scratchier than Axl Rose then chimed in, agreeing. "Mmhmm. When we came out together we know some of you were thinking, 'are the Oscars too Black now?'"

Maya Rudolph replies, "Don't worry. There's so many more White people to come tonight."

"Mhhhmmm. So many! We just came from backstage and there are tons of them back there! And not just movie stars. There are White people walking about with headsets. White people with clipboards. I'm personally not a fan of White people with clip boards because I'm always wondering 'what are they writing down about me?'" [581] The message was clear. There were still too many White people around, despite the recent strides in "diversity."

Best documentary that year went to Icarus , a movie about the Russian doping scandal at the Olympics to fan the flames of the hysteria at the time about Russia supposedly helping Donald Trump win the 2016 election. Then there was more pro-immigration propaganda.

Lupita Nyong'o (who is from Kenya) and Kumail Nanjiani (who is from Pakistan) presented an award, but not before saying they're not just actors, they're also immigrants, "and like everyone in this room and everyone watching at home, we are dreamers. We grew up dreaming of one day working in the movies. Dreams are the foundation of Hollywood, and dreams are the foundation of America…To all the Dreamers out there, we stand with you," they said, to a resounding applause, referring to the millions of illegal immigrants Barack Obama granted amnesty to with his "Dream Act" executive order. "Now the nominees for achievement in production design." [582]

Rapper Common and singer Andra Day performed their social justice anthem "Stand Up for Something" with Common beginning, "We put up monuments for the feminists. Tell the NRA they're in God's way… Sentiments of love for the people from Africa, Haiti, and Puerto Rico." [583]

Later while Andra Day sung, Common continued injecting his two cents with statements like, "We stand up for the Dreamers. We stand up for immigrants." The eight-year-old Syrian refugee, Bana al-Abed, who (supposedly) began tweeting photos of civil war-torn Syria in 2016, was brought on stage during their performance. [584] Of course eight-year-olds don't tweet, but the girl was used as a propaganda tool to promote U.S. intervention in the country by making her a symbol of the civil war there, but that's a whole other story. [585]

Planned Parenthood CEO Cecile Richards was also on stage, along with a total of ten social justice activists invited up there during the performance because they all "Stand Up for Something." [586]

Mexican film maker Guillermo del Toro won the Academy Award for Best Picture that year for The Shape of Water , a movie about a woman who falls in love with a fish-man (and literally gets naked and has sex with it). Probably Hollywood's way of taking baby steps on the path to giving an Oscar to a film about bestiality.

Guillermo del Toro also won for Best Director and when he took to the stage he began, "I am an immigrant like, like my compadres, Alfonso and Alejandro, like Gael [García Bernaland] Salma [Hayek], and like many of you. And in the last 25 years, I've been living in a country all of our own. Part of it is here. Part of it is in Europe. Part of it is everywhere, because I think the greatest thing the industry does is erase the line in the sand," [meaning borders]. [587]

The 2019 Oscars were just more of the same. At the beginning of the show Maya Rudolph announced, "Just a quick update for everybody in case you're confused. There is no host tonight. There won't be a popular movie category, and Mexico is not paying for the wall." [588] Kevin Hart had originally been scheduled to host, but he was canceled after snowflakes dug up some of his past jokes and tweets about not wanting his son to be gay, so like many others, he became a victim of the "cancel culture." [589]

Black Panther was nominated for "Best Picture" simply because it was the first Black superhero movie. Spike Lee won the Academy Award that year for Best Adapted Screenplay for BlacKkKlansman , and during his acceptance speech said that the 2020 election is "just around the corner" and told everyone to "mobilize" and "do the right thing" by voting Donald Trump out of office. [590]

Within just a few minutes of the 2020 Academy Awards show starting, Chris Rock was complaining that not enough Black people were nominated, but the show certainly made up for it that year with presenters. At one point a guy came on stage to announce, "The Academy would like to acknowledge that tonight we have gathered on the ancestral lands of the Tongva, the Tataviam and the Chumash" [Native American tribes] to apologize for White people "stealing" their land. [591]

To kick off the show, singer/rapper Janelle Monae changed the lyrics in one line of her song to say "It's time to come alive, cuz the Oscars, it's so White," marking the sixth year in a row the "Oscars so White" complaint was made. [592] No amount of "diversity" could make them happy.

Hair Love won Best Short film for a 7-minute-long animation about a Black father learning to do his daughter's hair. Usually the winner for this category isn't included in the show, but because the film celebrated Black people and their "hair" the producers made a special exception this year.

When accepting the award the director encouraged people to support the Crown Act, which was pending legislation that would ban employers and schools from "discriminating" against people for their hairstyles, for example, if a business didn't want their employees to wear dreadlocks, or have an afro that sticks out two feet. [593]

A Netflix show called American Factory that Barack and Michelle Obama's production company made won the Oscar for best documentary in 2020, and when accepting the award, the director quoted straight from the Communist Manifesto, saying "workers of the world unite." [594]

When Joaquin Phoenix won the Oscar for Best Actor in Joker he rattled off as many social justice buzzwords as he could, saying, "Whether we're talking about gender inequality or racism or queer rights or indigenous rights or animal rights, we're talking about the fight against injustice," and then went on to complain about cow rights and people using milk in our cereal and coffee in the morning. [595]

After the Black Lives Matter riots of 2020 caused a surge of Black supremacist sentiments to spread across the country and endless virtue signaling by corporations and schools about how they were going to work much harder to "support the Black community," the Oscars announced that they were changing the criteria for films to be considered for the awards, adding a "diversity requirement." [596]

So now it doesn't matter how good a film is, if there isn't a Black person, a Latino, or a queer as part of the main plot, then it may get passed over in favor of another film with more "diversity."

The Grammys The Grammys used to be mostly just about the music, but now the event browbeats the audience about how there are too many White people in the United States and endlessly praises LGBT people for being “amazing.” The Grammys have even openly celebrated Satanism.

In 2014, Katy Perry performed her song “Dark Horse” in a ceremony that depicted her as a witch and made headlines across the country from people saying the performance looked like a satanic ritual. [597] She did it as a collaboration with a group called Three Six Mafia—get it—three sixes “666”—the “Satanic Mafia.” A few years earlier in 2012 Nicki Minaj had done a similar “satanic ritual” for her performance of her song “Roman Holiday.” [598] (A “Roman holiday” means to get pleasure from someone else’s pain or misfortune.) The Grammys is supposed to be a celebration of music, but they can’t make it through a show without expressing their love for the LGBT agenda. Katy Perry performed her lesbian-themed single “I Kissed a Girl” in 2009 shortly after she burst onto the music scene thanks to that song. A few years later Lady Gaga performed her “gay rights” anthem “Born This Way” during the show. [599] And now every year there are shout-outs to the “LGBT community” and how “awesome” they are.

In 2014 Macklemore & Ryan Lewis won a Grammy for Best New Artist and Best Rap Album as a reward for producing a “gay rights” anthem called “Same Love” which promoted gay “marriage.” [600] When they performed at the Grammys that year thirty-three gay couples were married on stage as part of the show. [601] At the time, gay “marriage” still wasn’t legal in all fifty states, and the issue was awaiting a ruling by the Supreme Court.

That same year Irish musician Hozier’s debut single “Take Me To Church” was nominated for Song of the Year because it denounced Christianity, particularly the Catholic Church’s views on homosexuality. The music video for the song was a gay anthem depicting two homosexuals being persecuted by an angry mob. It was made for just $500 and posted to YouTube when the band was still virtually unheard of, but music executives in Hollywood discovered the video and turned Hozier into a star that year because they wanted a new “gay rights” anthem to promote.

To kick off the 2017 Grammys, Jennifer Lopez said it was a really tough time in our nation's history since it was just a few weeks after Donald Trump was inaugurated as president. Sounding like she was about to breakdown and cry she said, "It is about the music, the words, and the voices. How they move us and inspire us and touch all of our lives. At this particular point in history our voices are needed more than ever." [602]

There was no question what "point in history" she was talking about. Hollywood and the talking heads in the news media were still in shock that Hillary had lost. James Corden even performed a rap song at the start of the show which included lyrics about his fear of what Donald Trump was going to do to the country. [603]

Busta Rhymes later trashed President Trump on stage, calling him "President Agent Orange." He was joined by another group "A Tribe Called Quest" who made their entrance to the stage by breaking through a wall constructed of foam blocks. At one point Busta said that President Trump was "perpetuating evil" throughout the United States. [604]

The following year the Grammys were hosted by James Corden who began the show saying "This year, we don't just have the most diverse group of nominees in Grammys history, we also have, for the second year in a row, the least diverse host in Grammys history," referring to himself being a straight, White male, with blonde hair and blue eyes. [605]

Then rapper Kendrick Lamar got on stage and performed an anti-cop, pro-Black Lives Matter song. Halfway through his performance the lights dimmed and the camera cut to Dave Chappelle, who said, "I just wanted to remind the audience that the only thing more frightening than watching a Black man being honest in America, is being an honest Black man in America." [606]

Later Hillary Clinton made an appearance via a video which showed her reading the anti-Trump book Fire and Fury that was all the rage at the time. [607] The following year in 2019, they brought Michelle Obama on stage during the opening segment to talk about how much music means to her and how it keeps her going in tough times. [608]

Childish Gambino won the award for Song of the Year and Album of the Year for his racist, anti-White, anti-police diatribe "This is America," marking the first time that a rapper had won both awards. [609] When the nominees were announced a month or so earlier, he and other rappers complained that there weren't enough Black artists being nominated, so it looks like the Recording Academy tried to make it up to him by crowning him the night's big winner.

At the 2020 Grammys, host Alicia Keys started the show playing a piano melody while doing a spoken word performance mentioning the various artists who were nominated and tossed in a line celebrating President Trump getting impeached. [610]

Broadway theater performer Billy Porter then took to the stage (dressed like a woman) and introduced the Jonas Brothers who performed a song, but not without first giving a wink and a nod to the "gender fluid" and "gender non-conforming" people. "Ladies, gentlemen, and those who have yet to make up their minds…" he said, before introducing the group. [611] Singer John Legend also gave a non-verbal shout-out to the gender "non-binary" people by wearing a "dress/suit."

Ellen DeGeneres introduced a performance by "country rapper" Lil Nas X, and after mentioning some of his accolades added, "And he's done it all by being true to himself. Unwavering in the face of prejudice, he told the world that he was gay, and overnight he became an inspiration and a role model for millions of young people around the world." [612]

Michelle Obama was then given a Grammy for "Best Spoken Word Album" for the audio book version of her memoir Becoming . [613] There was also a performance by a Spanish singer who goes by the name of "Rosalia" who sung a few songs in Spanish to pander to the tens of millions of non-assimilating Mexicans and other Latinos who have invaded the United States.

The American Music Awards and the Billboard Music Awards are just more of the same. Taylor Swift even "broke her political silence" at the 2018 AMAs to encourage her fans to vote Democrat in the upcoming midterm elections. [614] For her entire career she stayed out of politics completely, but the pressure was building for her to denounce the Trump administration, so she eventually did.

MTV Awards The most degenerate of award shows can be found on MTV. Their annual Movie Awards and VMAs (Video Music Awards) are geared for kids, which makes them even more disturbing. The only time anyone really tunes in to MTV anymore is for these award shows once a year since music videos are all released on YouTube now, and it’s been a decades-long running joke that MTV (which stands for Music Television) doesn’t play any music anymore because the network mostly consists of teen dramas.

MTV’s VMAs gave birth to Miley Cyrus with her 2013 performance where she introduced “twerking” to the world, a form of “dance” she popularized which simply consists of shaking one’s butt in a rapid motion, although that’s just the beginning of MTV’s degeneracy.

They have unique awards compared to other shows, for things like the Best Villain and Best Fight, and even the Best Kiss. And in 2017, the Best Kiss award went to two men for a “gay coming-of-age” film called Moonlight . [615]

The following year in 2018, it was given to two men again, one of them (Keiynan Lonsdale) identifying as a “pansexual” (meaning someone who will have sex with a person of any gender, including trans people). Their movie was another teenage gay “romantic comedy” called Love, Simon. While accepting his “Best Kiss” award the pansexual told the audience, “You can live your dreams and wear dresses.” [616]

In 2017 the MTV Movie Awards announced it was going to be a “genderless” award ceremony, meaning they weren’t giving different awards for best actor or best actress because that was “sexist” and “divisive.” They boasted that it was the first “gender-neutral” awards show in history. [617] To emphasize their idiotic idea, the first presenter of the evening was a real life “gender non-binary” person named Asia Kate Dillon who nobody has ever heard of. Her “preferred pronouns” are “they” and “them,” and of course she has a shaved head.

The Wikipedia entry for Asia Kate Dillon reads, “Dillon was born in Ithaca, New York. They were assigned female at birth, but identifies as non-binary. Dillon explained around 2015, they began removing gendered pronouns from their biography, and auditioning for the part of Mason helped them understand their gender identity. Dillon identifies as pansexual, stating they are attracted to multiple genders.” [618]

It’s confusing because using the pronoun “they” to refer to one person is usually grammatically incorrect, but even the Merriam Webster dictionary has caved in to the craziness and recently updated the “rules” for grammar to accommodate gender non-binary or non-conforming people and their “preferred pronouns.” [619]

Emma Watson won the first award that night for the live-action remake of Beauty and the Beast and made sure to start off her acceptance speech by praising how great of an idea it was to go “genderless,” saying, “Firstly, I feel I have to say something about the award itself. The first acting award in history that doesn’t separate nominees based on their sex says something about how we perceive the human experience. MTV’s move to create a genderless award for acting will mean something different to everyone, but to me, it indicates that acting is about the ability to put yourself in someone else’s shoes. And that doesn’t need to be separated into two different categories.” [620]

This was all part of the show. She was just reciting the script that MTV’s producers had given her to emphasize the “historic” genderless theme of the night. Everything in Hollywood is fake, even the award shows.

When Vin Diesel was given the Generation Award, he made sure to go along with the social justice agenda and said the only reason that the Fast & Furious series was a success is because the younger generation is accepting of multiculturalism. “Most importantly, I got to thank a generation that was willing to accept this multicultural franchise where it didn’t matter what color your skin was or what country you were from, when you’re family, you’re family.” [621]

Multiculturalism had nothing to do with the franchises’ success. It’s an action movie series about cars , and a lot of people love car movies, and the chase scenes and action sequences are amazing, but the Hollywood elite never miss an opportunity to sing praises of their precious “diversity.”

In 2018, rapper “Logic” wore a t-shirt that said “F*ck the Wall” and dozens of Mexican immigrants were brought out on stage during his performance who had shirts on that read “We Are All Human Beings.” [622] The previous year a “descendent” of Robert E. Lee, the Confederate Army general, was brought on stage to denounce racism. “We have made my ancestor an idol of White supremacy, racism, and hate,” he began. “As a pastor, it is my moral duty to speak out against racism, America’s original sin." [623] The man was the great-great-great-great (four "greats") nephew of Robert E. Lee.

He went on to tell the audience, "Today, I call on all us with privilege and power to answer God's call to confront racism and White supremacy head on. We can find inspiration in the Black Lives Matter movement, the women who marched in the Women's March in January, and especially Heather Heyer, who died fighting for her beliefs in Charlottesville." [624]

Then Heather Heyer's mother was brought on stage, whose daughter was killed during the infamous 2017 Unite the Right rally in Charlottesville, to announce the winner of the "Best Fight Against the System" award. All the nominees had music videos denouncing racism, anti-immigrant sentiments, and promoted "diversity."

While opening the show in 2019, Taylor Swift had the words "Equality Act" projected on the stage in giant letters under a rainbow. [625] The Equality Act is a proposed bill by Democrats that would amend the Civil Rights Act and mandate someone's gender identity be legally recognized no matter which one of the 58 different "genders" they claim to be. [626] It would also severely restrict the religious freedom of individuals and groups who don't accept the positions of LGBT extremists. The following year the Supreme Court ruled on similar legislation, declaring that business owners can't fire employees for being gay or transgender, nor refuse to hire them. [627]

Feminism The Left has a saying that “representation matters,” which means the more on-screen depictions of certain kinds of characters, lifestyles, and behaviors, the more the general public warms up to accepting those kinds of things in real life. And part of paving the path to what they hope will be a woman President of the United States someday involves producing a variety of shows focusing on a female character who holds that position.

In the years preceding Hillary Clinton’s long-expected attempt at a presidential bid there were almost a dozen television shows that had a woman president as the central part of the plot. Geena Davis starred in Commander in Chief , a short-lived series from 2005 to 2006 where she was originally the Vice President, but then had to takeover after the president died of a brain aneurysm. In FOX’s thriller 24, the show had a female president for two seasons in 2008-2010. Julia Louis-Dreyfus ascended to the presidency in her series Veep after the president resigned, leaving her in charge. And that was just the beginning.

State of Affairs, which aired for just one season on NBC, depicted a Black woman as the president, and CBS's political drama Madam Secretary revolved around a female Secretary of State (obviously modeled after Hillary Clinton), and at the end of the fifth season the character decided to run for President and won. The following season (which was its last) the series focused on the new female president but kept the name Madam Secretary .

But Hollywood's feminist propaganda goes far beyond hoping to normalize the idea of a woman president. Liberals are obsessed with uprooting the traditional gender roles of men as providers and protectors, and women as nurturers and caretakers. They are determined to "empower women" at any cost and embrace the disastrous effects on family dynamics and society as a whole that their radical agenda is causing.

"The future is female" is their mantra, showing they have no concern for equality, but instead have a thirst for power and want to dominate instead of cooperate. They despise traditional families and gender roles, and are on a mission to undermine the very foundational relationships of human society.

To feminists, being a stay at home mom is slavery. Women cooking for their family is "oppression" under the Patriarchy, and men are all scumbags; but having unprotected sex with an endless line of them while avoiding any committed long-term relationships is the ideal life. That's what Hollywood wants women to believe.

Their latest plan to promote "women empowerment" is hijacking popular franchises and then completely changing the major characters and turning good old-fashioned action films into social justice warrior propaganda. Not just swapping male characters for females, or adding strong female leads, but by also portraying men as inept and incompetent losers who always need to be rescued from their own stupidity.

When the Star Wars series was revised in 2015 with The Force Awakens , it diverted from the usual storyline featuring male leads (Luke Skywalker in the original trilogy and Anakin Skywalker in the prequels) to a totally new character invented by JJ. Abrams named Rey, a female loner.

A female Yoda-type of creature named Maz first starts teaching Rey about the force once she happens to discover Luke Skywalker's old lightsaber lying around. And throughout the film Rey keeps proving to everyone that a girl can do amazing things like pilot a ship, and even fix one with her ingenuity, saving the Millennium Falcon from exploding. After there was an electrical overload and Han Solo didn't know what to do, Rey saved the day. For extra diversity the new Star Wars teased a possible interracial romance between Rey and Finn (the Black former stormtrooper). [628]

In the next film, Star Wars: The Last Jedi (2017), all women are in charge of the Resistance (the good guys), giving the orders to subservient and bumbling men. The tension keeps building between Poe Dameron and Vice Admiral Holdo (his superior) with them butting heads numerous times and Poe facing repeated snarky comments from her. The Last Jedi was hailed as "the most triumphantly feminist Star Wars movie yet," because of this odd storyline. [629] And critics hailed it for "awakening the feminist force in little girls everywhere." [630]

At one point Poe and the other men take over the ship at gunpoint, tired of the perceived inability of the women to lead the mission. They committed mutiny only to later learn that Vice Admiral Holdo had a great plan but they just didn't know it, and now Poe had put everyone at risk. The women save everyone though, and he's sorry for ever doubting them.

Even the Star Wars spinoff Rogue One starred a woman. NBC News noted that, "Not only is Rogue One continuing The Force Awakens trend of putting a young woman in the center of the action, but it appears to provide prominent roles for African-American, Latino and Asian actors as well—a relatively new development in the Star Wars universe." [631] They loved the "diversity."

George Lucas, the creator of Star Wars , sold the rights to Disney in 2012 and later said he felt "betrayed" after the entertainment giant decided to "go in another direction" from his original ideas. [632] He once referred to the films as his "kids" and said that he regretfully sold them into slavery. [633]

In 2015, a new installment of Mad Max was released titled Mad Max: Fury Road , but instead of starring Mad Max it starred Charlize Therone's character "Imerator Furiosa." It was declared the "feminist picture of the year." [634] And instead of Max being a hero like the previous films, he was depicted as an idiot who had to be repeatedly rescued by women.

In Disney-Pixar's animated Incredibles 2 , a "superhero mom" named Elastigirl (Mrs. Incredible) is chosen for a secret mission over her husband, who led the superhero family in the first film, because he has the tendency to cause unnecessary "collateral damage" and the superhero organization felt they needed to change the image of superheroes in the public's mind. She then leaves her husband at home to watch the kids while she takes off on her mission. When she calls to check on how things are going, the husband is depicted as being in over his head and not able to handle taking care of the kids and running the house.

The London Guardian called the film a "feminist triumph." [635] Bustle , an online women's magazine, wrote, "In a time when conversations about representation are more prevalent than ever, showing the diversification of familial roles is definitely fitting. Though not entirely out of the ordinary, seeing a father—especially one as domineering as Mr. Incredible—taking on more of a domestic role will definitely serve as a comedic relief for some, but will also, hopefully, contribute to larger conversations surrounding familial structures and their many forms." [636]

Their glowing review continued, "The responsibilities of family life should be divvied up amongst its members, and gender shouldn't play a determining factor in who takes on whichever task. In this way, The Incredibles 2 is adding some much-needed perspective to conversations surrounding family dynamics and female empowerment. But, though extremely relevant and important to discuss today, true progressiveness will be measured once conversations about strong female leads and diverse familial structures are no longer needed." [637]

Birds of Prey is a spin-off from Suicide Squad , a film based on DC Comics' characters, focusing on Harley Quinn (played by Margot Robbie) who just broke up with her boyfriend the Joker and must survive as a supervillain in Gotham City with no man to protect her.

Some critics called the character's portrayal in Suicide Squad sexist and misogynistic, so for the spin-off producers decided to atone for their "sins" by making Birds of Prey a hyper-feminist film where all of the bad guys aren't just criminal masterminds, but misogynists who treat women poorly and deserve to be punished. [638]

Ewan McGregor, who plays the crime lord Black Mask, said, "What interested me with Birds of Prey is that it's a feminist film. It is very finely written. There is in the script a real look on misogyny, and I think we need that. We need to be more aware of how we behave with the opposite sex. We need to be taught to change. Misogynists in movies are often extreme: they rape, they beat women ... and it is legitimate to represent people like that, because they exist and they are obviously the worst. But in the Birds of Prey dialogues, there is always a hint of everyday misogyny, of those things you say as a man you do not even realize, mansplaining ... and it's in the script in a very subtle way. I found that brilliant." [639]

Salon.com raved, "Harley Quinn is back to take down the patriarchy, and this revolution brings scrunchies." [640] Another critic loved that it was about "women's emancipation," because the character proved she could be a supervillain on her own without a boyfriend. [641]

Like most "woke" movies, the film bombed its opening weekend, so the producers changed the title to Harley Quinn: Birds of Prey , hoping to spark people's interest because the character had become a breakout star from Suicide Squad. The film was still a huge loss for the studio, but Hollywood can't take a hint. They'll keep making feminist propaganda pieces and have their favorite critics try to sell them to viewers no matter how much they suck and how poor they perform at the box office.

Gender Swaps In 2016 a new Ghostbusters film was released, but instead of starring Bill Murray and the gang it featured four women as the Ghostbusters. At the end of the movie the girls shoot the giant evil ghost in the crotch with their proton packs to finally destroy him. Actress Leslie Jones, who was one of the Ghostbusters, quit Twitter and said she cried because she was getting "harassed" by people who hated the film. [642] It completely bombed at the box office and cost the studio an estimated $125 million dollars in losses. [643]

A few years later when it was announced that a new Ghostbusters was in the works that would continue the original series and "hand the movie back to the fans," the director Jason Reitman was called a "sexist" because that meant it wouldn't be another feminist empowerment film. [644]

In the 2019 film Terminator: Dark Fate , John Connor, the future leader of the "Resistance" against the machines, is killed in the first few minutes, making all of the previous films completely pointless since the primary mission was to ensure that he lives so he can grow up to lead the war against the machines. Then Sarah Connor, along with the help of another "good" time-traveling Terminator (who is an "enhanced" cyborg woman) help another girl evade a new advanced "bad" Terminator which is on a mission to kill her before she becomes a threat to the machines in the future.

"If you're at all enlightened, she'll play like gangbusters," director Tim Miller said, speaking of the "good" female cyborg. "If you're a closet misogynist, she'll scare the fuck out of you, because she's tough and strong but very feminine. We did not trade certain gender traits for others; she's just very strong, and that frightens some dudes. You can see online the responses to some of the early shit that's out there, trolls on the internet. I don't give a fuck." [645] The film bombed, reportedly losing 100 million dollars, [646] and the Hollywood Reporter said the studio had no future plans for any other Terminator movies. [647]

Ocean's Eleven was a popular heist film that originally starred the Rat Pack in 1960 and was remade in 2001 featuring an ensemble cast led by George Clooney. The reboot, which did very well, was followed up with two sequels, (Ocean's Twelve , and Ocean's Thirteen) but then in 2018 the gender swap mania infected the franchise and Ocean's 8 was released, re-envisioning the professional burglars as a group of all women, led by Sandra Bullock.

As I'm sure you expected, the film bombed, and the actresses blamed bad reviews on men of course, saying they were due to a "lack of diversity" among the critics. [648]

In 2019, a crime drama called The Kitchen was released as an all-woman gangster film starring Melissa McCarthy because someone thought it would be a good idea to make such a ridiculous movie. It wasn't even a comedy, which made it even more absurd. The title refers to Hell's Kitchen, a neighborhood on the West Side of Midtown Manhattan where the women "gangsters" live. The plot revolves around them collecting protection money from local businesses and running the neighborhood as part of the Irish mafia. It was a complete bomb and lost the studio tens of millions of dollars which should come as no surprise. [649]

Disney announced they were going to reboot the 1990s Doogie Howser M.D. series about a teenage genius who becomes a doctor which originally starred Neil Patrick Harris, but the remake will star a 16-year-old girl as the child doctor. [650] Disney is also producing an all-female version of Pirates of the Caribbean that will star Margot Robbie. [651]

Steven Spielberg said that his iconic character Indiana Jones should take “a different form” and be played by a woman named “Indiana Joan.” [652] Vin Diesel even said that an all-female version of Fast & Furious was in the works. [653]

In 2017 when the film Dunkirk was released, which depicts the historic Dunkirk evacuation during World War II when Allied soldiers pulled out of the Dunkirk harbor in France, liberals were upset that the film didn’t gender-swap some characters to make it more “diverse.” [654] Of course that wouldn’t have been historically accurate, or made any sense because women were not on the battlefield, but that didn’t stop the snowflakes from complaining about the soldiers being all men.

The Institute on Gender in Media In 2004 actress Geena Davis started a non-profit research organization to study “gender representation” in media. The “Institute” on Gender in Media is obsessed with monitoring the number of women vs men in TV shows and movies and tracking what percentage of them have speaking roles and how many of them have power.

Their website says, “we’re the only organization working collaboratively within the entertainment industry to engage, educate and influence the creation of gender balanced onscreen portrayals, reducing harmful stereotypes and creating an abundance of unique and intersectional female characters in entertainment targeting children 11 and under.” [655]

Another pointless project the “Institute on Gender in Media” has been working on is a computer program that checks scripts for “gender bias” language to make sure they’re “inclusive.” Not only does the software scan scripts for words and phrases like fireman , postman , and mankind ; but it also produces a report on the percentage of characters who are “people of color” and even LGBTQ so the writers and producers can make sure their projects are “diverse” enough. [656]

Television Commercials Turn Feminist For many years feminists have been upset about the way cleaning products are marketed, so recently there are an increasing number of commercials for laundry detergent, vacuums, and mops depicting men using the products. Creating “gender equality” in commercials for cleaning products has even been called “the final feminist frontier.” [657]

Some companies are even promoting feminism in their commercials even when their products have nothing to do with gender at all. For example, some morons in the marketing department at Anheuser-Busch thought it would be a good idea for Bud Light to promote the supposed “wage gap” in an incredibly unfunny ad featuring Amy Schumer and Seth Rogan. It begins with Schumer saying, “Bud Light party here, to discuss equal pay.”

Seth Rogen goes on to complain that “Women don’t get paid as much as men and that is wrong!”

The two banter back and forth about women supposedly having to pay more for cars, dry cleaning and shampoo, but “Bud Light proudly supports equal pay. That’s why Bud Light costs the same, no matter if you’re a dude or a lady,” explains Schumer.

Forbes magazine called the commercial “unusual” and the writer wondered, “So why did Bud Light choose to make what might be the first civil-rights-inflected beer ad…Are they targeting Hillary voters? Are they simultaneously making fun of ‘equal pay’ claims by subverting the meaning of the term to be about a non-problem—what men and women pay for beer? Or are they trying to thread the needle with comedy to speak to both audiences?” [658]

Their beer sales soon declined, and they pulled the ad. [659] When journalists started inquiring about the company’s own business practices regarding “equal pay” they declined to reveal how many women work for the company or how their salaries compare to those of their male counterparts. [660] Bud Light even took the video off YouTube trying to distance themselves from the mess they created.

In 2018 Burger King launched an ad campaign to “raise awareness” about “gender inequality.” Using a hidden camera in one of their restaurants they served what they called “Chick Fries” (which were just thin chicken strips or “chicken fries”) to customers, but when women ordered them, they were served the chicken strips in a pink box and were told they had been charged a few dollars more than men “for the pink box.” [661]

When some of them got upset and started arguing with the cashier (who was an actor) about how they shouldn’t have to pay more just because the box is pink for women, the cashier began lecturing them about how women’s razors supposedly cost more than men’s “just because they’re pink” and asked them why they didn’t complain about that too. Why not just promote their chicken fries and say they taste great and are on sale you may be wondering? That’s what a normal person would do, but we’re talking about people who have become infected with the liberal pathogen.

The Audi car company aired a Super Bowl commercial showing a group of kids racing in a pine box derby, while focusing on the only girl in the group. As the race begins her dad is the narrator, musing aloud wondering how he was going to teach her about sexism. “What do I tell my daughter? Do I tell her grandpa is worth more than her grandma? That her dad is worth more than her mom? Do I tell her that despite her education, her drive, her skills, her intelligence, she will automatically be valued as less than every man she meets?” [662]

She then wins the race, beating the boys, and it concludes with him saying, “Or maybe I’ll be able to tell her something different,” and then the words “Audi of America is committed to equal pay for equal work,” and “Progress is for everyone,” are shown on the screen. [663]

The “Secret” women’s deodorant brand aired a Super Bowl-themed commercial showing a kicker kick the winning field goal at the end of a game and then when “he” takes off “his” helmet the crowd realizes it was a woman and goes silent, but after a moment of surprise they begin cheering even more and then the catchphrase “Let’s Kick Inequality” is shown on the screen. [664]

Companies often use their big Super Bowl commercials to really promote the liberal agenda instead of their product. The “Unstereotype Alliance" campaign launched by the United Nations notes, "Advertising is a particularly powerful driver to change perceptions and impact social norms," and says they are "excited to partner with the foremost industry shapers in this Alliance to challenge and advance the ways women are represented in this field." [665] It's impossible to escape liberal propaganda, even when viewing commercials for cars and deodorant!

Jared jewelers even released a commercial encouraging women to propose to their boyfriends with the tagline "Dare to ask him." [666] One ad shows a woman drop down on one knee holding the ring, and then as she slides the ring on his finger the camera cuts to their friends seated at a nearby dinner table all celebrating his acceptance, having witnessed her pop the question.

Fat is "Beautiful"

No fat jokes (or "fat shaming" as they're called now) are allowed anymore, because they're considered "bullying" and "hate speech" so liberals have been promoting "body positivity" which is a more politically correct term for the "fat acceptance movement" in which morbidly obese women are said to be "beautiful" by those who pity them.

Despite becoming obese later in her career, Amy Schumer was reportedly in talks to play Barbie in a live-action film based on the doll—in what some people thought was a joke, but it turned out to be true. [667] She was then pulled from the project, probably due to the ridicule she was receiving or after producers realized the movie would be a complete flop because of their idiotic idea. [668]

Lena Dunham is another token fat ugly girl in Hollywood who is always promoted as a feminist icon. [669] Dunham has posted pictures on her Instagram over the years celebrating her weight gain, once posting a before-and-after photo showing her of average weight in the past next to a current photo of her 24-pounds heavier (weighing in at 162 pounds). [670] The post got almost 500,000 likes from people who were proud of her for being happy that she was obese. A year later she posted a picture of her lying in bed wearing lingerie, noting that "I weigh the most I ever have," and saying she's the "happiest I've ever been." [671]

By accepting obesity as “normal” and banning criticism of obesity as “fat shaming” people are only contributing to the problem. It would be like claiming you were “bullying” people by declaring opioid use is dangerous and something that should be shunned and avoided.

Singer Lizzo, best known for being the 300 pound Black girl who likes bouncing around on stage during her performances, was hailed as “brave” and “beautiful” after she posted a semi-nude photo of herself on Instagram.[672] During the coronavirus pandemic of 2020 she posted a picture of herself wearing a face mask and matching bikini, and one tabloid reported that it was a balance of “safety with sex appeal.” [673]

Hollywood’s new affinity for fat women is causing some older TV shows and movies to come under scrutiny. As part of the storyline in Friends , Monica (Courtney Cox) was depicted as severely obese when she was younger, but then ended up losing a bunch of weight and became hot. In flashbacks, Courtney would wear a fat suit and a prosthetic chin playing her old self, but now Entertainment Weekly calls “Fat Monica” the “ghost that continues to haunt Friends 25 years later,” and complains that the show used her to get “cheap laughs in the laziest ways possible.” [674]

Shallow Hal and The Nutty Professor have since been deemed the most “fat-phobic” movies of all time for their use of fat suits. [675] It probably won’t be long now until the practice of actors wearing fat suits for comedic effect will be banned industry wide, and the those kinds of characters will be deemed just as offensive as someone wearing “blackface” which used to be a staple of comedy with people like Jimmy Kimmel, Jimmy Fallon, Howard Stern, Dan Aykroyd, Robert Downey Jr. and many others once doing skits as a Black person.

Most have recently apologized for what were actually hilarious characters after old clips circulated on Twitter with people denouncing them for being “racist.”

Feminists even got upset when Pixar’s Wall-E came out, which depicts a dystopian future where the earth is evacuated because it has turned into a trash heap from all the garbage humans were creating. The online outlet Slate was upset that the movie “goes out of its way to equate obesity with environmental collapse.” [676] They complained, “It plays off the easy analogy between obesity and ecological catastrophe, pushing the notion that Western culture has sickened both our bodies and our planet with the same disease of affluence. According to this lazy logic, a fat body stands in for a distended culture: We gain weight and the Earth suffers.” [677]

The London Telegraph noted that fat pride groups, “believe the film propagates anti-obesity hysteria comparable with the quest for the perfect body by the eugenics movement in Nazi Germany.” [678] Yep, Wall-E is Nazi propaganda to these lunatics!

Since the Left is so concerned with “global warming” and people’s “carbon footprint,” you’d think they would start calling out fat people for using triple or quadruple the natural resources as the average person, but that would hurt people’s feelings—so instead they’re trying to convince trendy social justice warriors to eat bugs because the cow farts from beef-producing cattle are supposedly destroying the planet. [679]

In 2019, Victoria’s Secret hired a plus-size model named Ali Tate-Cutler in order to be “more inclusive.” [680] And what a surprise—later that year they canceled their annual fashion show, citing declining sales and ratings! That same year they had also celebrated hiring their first transgender model in the name of “diversity” so it’s no wonder the Victoria’s Secret brand had become less appealing to so many people. [681]

The move came after lunatics on Twitter kept complaining they were “discriminating” against transgender people by having only (actual) women as models. [682]

Abercrombie & Fitch also decided to be “more inclusive” by distancing themselves from their well-established brand of flawless models in their catalogs and have now embraced the “body positivity” movement by using “plus-sized” (fat) models and LGBTQ people in their ads. [683]

The Sports Illustrated Swimsuit Edition has also featured a “plus size” (fat) model on the cover recently, but she doesn’t attribute her success to the fat acceptance movement. She believes it’s because of White privilege! “I know I’m on this pedestal because of White privilege,” she says. “To not see Black or Latina women as famous in my industry [meaning the plus size model industry] is crazy! I have to talk about it. I want to give those women kudos because they are the ones who paved the way for me,” she said. [684]

The glass is always half empty with social justice warriors. Even when things are good, they’re not good enough, and when a fat woman has a successful modeling career she can’t be happy about that either, because she’s worried that her success is due to “White privilege.”

There are also calls for the NFL to start using plus-sized cheerleaders, and the league is under fire from feminists because the cheerleaders must abide by various strict rules, including maintaining their “ideal weight.” There are even calls to ban cheerleaders altogether because it’s “demeaning to women.” [685]

In 2016 toy maker Mattel released a “curvy” Barbie to celebrate “body diversity.” An executive at the company said, “These new dolls (are) more reflective of the world girls see around them—the variety in body type, skin tones and style allows girls to find a doll that speaks to them.” [686]

Sofie Hagen, a fat “comedian” who got triggered by billboards warning about the link between obesity and cancer, is also hoping Disney will soon feature a princess in one of their cartoons who is fat. She tweeted, “I cannot stress how much we need a fat Disney princess. We need it now. Shut up. We fucking do.” [687] (No, she’s not joking, and on a side note, she blocked me on Twitter for laughing at her).

Feminists are often fat, ugly, angry women, as you know, so the AMC television network aired a dark comedy series called Dietland where a morbidly obese woman fed up with “society’s beauty standards” decides to start killing men who contribute to the “objectification of women,” like fashion photographers. It was basically a fat chick revenge fantasy. Only in Hollywood would someone come up with the idea of the protagonist being a fat woman who kills people who hurt her feelings!

The Four Waves Feminism is like an old tool that has outlived its usefulness, but instead of discarding it and appreciating what it accomplished during the time it was needed, feminists have continued trying to “advance” the movement in our modern era.

Feminism has gone through four different phases, or waves as they’re called, since its first incarnation in the early 1900s when women banded together to demand the right to vote (women’s suffrage). In the 1960s and 70s the second wave rose up to fight against the lack of women in political positions, and they were very successful in popularizing birth control pills and legalizing abortion, but for some power-hungry feminists there was more work to be done to dismantle “the Patriarchy.”

They continued pushing forward in the 1990s (the third wave) where they worked to get more women into leadership positions in the government and corporations, often simultaneously complaining about men continuing to “objectify women” while doing everything they could to artificially boost their sex appeal and use it to their advantage in every possible situation.

Then came the fourth wave of feminism which is completely unrecognizable from the first two waves which actually had a legitimate purpose and goals. Around 2012, not coincidentally coinciding with social media becoming a fixture of most peoples’ lives, the fourth wave of feminism hit the Internet like a tsunami of insanity. Through social media, crazies from across the country were able to connect with each other and affirm one another’s bizarre ideas about their abnormal lifestyles and celebrate their mental illnesses. They now come up with new “causes” to fight for online like “free-bleeding” (not wearing tampons or pads during their period) in order to “raise awareness” for periods (as if we’re not already painfully aware of them), and “smashing the scale” (celebrating obesity).

The most radical feminists (the ones with blue or purple hair) eventually turn into cat ladies. Single, childless, alone, and filled with regret and hate. As their looks fade, so does their ability to attract new mates, thus leading them to the inevitable downward spiral of despair which is then used as fuel to reaffirm their beliefs that men have ruined the world and their lives.

The LGBT Agenda Gays are only approximately one or maybe one and a half percent of the population.[688] But because of the bombardment of LGBT propaganda, many Americans falsely believe ten or even twenty percent of people are homosexual.[689] And liberals want everyone to think that there is no more of a difference between someone who is straight or gay than there is between someone who is left-handed or right-handed.

Homosexuality used to be officially classified as a mental illness by the American Psychiatric Association until 1973 when they gave in to intense pressure by LGBT groups and had it removed from their Diagnostic and Statistical Manual (DSM). [690] Now they just call it a "sexual orientation."

Gays used to deny there was a "gay agenda" and claimed that they weren't promoting homosexuality; all they wanted was to not be "attacked" or "discriminated against"—but those claims, like almost everything that comes out of liberals' mouths, turned out to be a massive lie.

Today it's not even about LGBT "rights" to them, it's about LGBT privilege . They get extra rights. They're special . And any criticism about their behavior or lifestyle is deemed "hate speech" and "harassment" no matter how mild or reasonable. These days anyone who doesn't celebrate them is considered an enemy. You must put them on a pedestal and marvel at their "awesome" sexuality, or you're a Nazi!

The reason gays and transgenders went from being widely viewed as strange, to being "privileged" and "special" people over the course of a single generation is the result of a massive propaganda campaign the likes of which the world had never seen.

In 1987 Gay Community News , a popular LGBT publication at the time, admitted the "gay revolution" would require the use of entertainment in order to be achieved, saying, "We shall sodomize your songs, emblems of your feeble masculinity, of your shallow dreams and vulgar lies. We shall seduce them [children] in your schools…in your youth groups, in your movie theater bathrooms…wherever men are men together. Your sons will become our minions and do our bidding. They will be recast in our image. They will come to crave and adore us." [691]

In 1989 two gay activists published a book titled After the Ball: How America Will Conquer its Fear and Hatred of Gays in the 90s which detailed their goals to have Hollywood produce propaganda that portrayed gays as "victims of circumstance and oppression, not as aggressive challengers." Their idea was that, "Gays must be portrayed as victims in need of protection so that straights will be inclined by reflex, to assume the role of protector." [692]

Their plan worked perfectly, as Joe Biden admitted when giving a speech for Jewish American Heritage Month, where he said, "It wasn't anything we legislatively did. It was 'Will and Grace,' it was the social media. Literally. That's what changed peoples' attitudes. That's why I was so certain that the vast majority of people would embrace and rapidly embrace [gay marriage]. Think behind all that, I bet you 85 percent of those changes, whether it's in Hollywood or social media are a consequence of Jewish leaders in the industry. The influence is immense, the influence is immense." [693]

All gays wanted was to be able to get "married" they said, but within just a few short years after the Supreme Court ruling made it legal nationwide (in 2015) we saw the proliferation of dozens of different "genders," pre-teen child drag queens and "Drag Queen Story Hour" events popping up at public libraries across the country. In numerous cases the drag queens who were reading books to children at the events have been found to be convicted pedophiles. [694] What a surprise!

An LGBT website called Pink News ran a headline titled, "Republican Lawmakers Want to Make Child Drag Shows Illegal," expressing their anger that a U.S. Representative proposed a bill that would prohibit anyone under the age of eighteen from participating in drag shows. [695]

And now LGBT activists harass Christian owned businesses like Chick-Fil-A for not supporting gay "marriage." [696] I put gay "marriage" in quotes when referring to gay "marriage" because a marriage is between a man and a woman—I don't care what the Supreme Court says, and I refuse to acknowledge it. Chick-Fil-A restaurants have been banned from opening in airports and on college campuses, and new locations often face boycotts wherever they are. How much longer until the LGBT extremists start trying to run churches out of town and harass parishioners as they come to worship on Sundays?

Ellen DeGeneres, the Trailblazer Ellen DeGeneres is considered a pioneer in the television industry for normalizing gay people after her sitcom Ellen decided to depict her character as a lesbian when she came out in real life in 1997. Will and Grace then picked up the baton in 1998 with a sitcom about a woman (Debra Messing) and her gay roommate. "Will and Grace was the first time you saw characters on television that made gay normal, you wanted to be friends with them," said Lance Bass from the boy band NSYNC. [697]

Sean Hayes, the actor who played Will’s boyfriend on Will and Grace, said, “The best feeling I get is when people come up and say thank you for all you do for the gay community and thank you for playing that part and that show and you feel so fortunate to have been part of something so great.” [698]

Since then, the world has been flooded with countless shows and movies where homosexuality is at the center of the plot. Films like Brokeback Mountain (2005) about two gay cowboys; Milk (2008) about Harvey Milk, the first openly gay politician to be elected to public office; Call Me by Your Name (2017) about an adult male who falls in “love” with a teenage boy; and many others which have been made for the sole purpose of promoting “gay rights” no matter how little success they’ll have commercially.

But that’s not enough. They want gays and transgenders in every TV show and movie. In 2018, a transgender “woman” was included in the Miss Universe Pageant, a move, as you expect by now, was praised as a “historic first.” [699] Two years later Sports Illustrated included a transgender “woman” in their famous swimsuit edition. [700] And throughout this chapter you’ll see they’re trying to “gay up” everything from Star Wars to Sesame Street.

When producers of the HBO vampire series True Blood decided they wanted to depict a character as bisexual and have him do soft-core porn sex scenes with other men (since it’s HBO and shows regularly include nudity), the actor Luke Grimes, who played the character, quit the show. [701] He was immediately denounced by the media and his castmates as “homophobic.” [702]

NBC launched a sitcom in the Spring of 2019 called Abby’ s about a bisexual woman who runs a bar—a move that was celebrated as the first sitcom on network television to feature a bisexual as the lead character. For extra diversity she is also a Cuban-American, and the show was promoted as a “multicultural comedy.” [703] It was canceled after just one season.

Congresswoman Alexandria Ocasio-Cortez was recently a guest host on RuPaul’s Drag Race , a reality show where drag queens compete to see who is the “best.” When the drag queens thanked her for being so “brave” for standing up against Republicans, she responded by lavishing praise on them for being on the forefront of changing the culture and the laws. “People think Congress and government is all about leading people, but ultimately, a lot of our politics is about following the public will. And the people who change the way people think are artists and drag queens.”[704] She went on to call the contestants “patriots” and gushed about how proud she was of them.

Gay Superheroes In 2011 Marvel released Captain America: The First Avenger which was a huge success, and when a sequel was released in 2014 (Captain America: Winter Soldier), many liberals were upset that Captain America and his best friend Bucky weren’t in a gay relationship together. Vanity Fair gave the film great reviews, but said it had one “flaw,” writing, “So while Marvel was likely never going to make the homoerotic subtext of Cap and Bucky into text, would it really have hurt to keep their relationship more ambiguous?”[705]

It went on, “As if to put the nail in the coffin of speculation, Bucky and Cap paused for a moment in the middle of snowy Siberia to reminisce about their days chasing skirts in pre-War Brooklyn. It’s a sweet, human bonding moment but one that also bristles with heterosexual virility. If Disney isn’t inclined to give audiences a gay superhero, couldn’t they have at least left us the dream of Bucky and Cap?”[706]

The critic was literally upset they reminisced about chasing women in the previous film, which normal guys do, but LGBT extremists were projecting their own thoughts onto the characters and hoping that they would be just like them. When the much-anticipated Black Panther film came out in 2018, the first superhero film starring a Black man, some people were upset because it didn’t include any gay characters.[707]

GLAAD, the gay lobbying organization, was upset after the first Wonder Woman film was released because there weren’t any gay or lesbian characters, saying “On screen, record-breaking films like Black Panther and Wonder Woman prove that not only does inclusion make for great stories—inclusion is good for the bottom line. It is time for lesbian, gay, bisexual, transgender, and queer (LGBTQ) stories to be included in this conversation and this movement.”[708]

Wonder Woman was turned into a bisexual later in the comics, and the LGBT extremists clamored for her to be explicitly bisexual in Wonder Woman 1984 , the sequel to the 2017 film. When the trailer was released, Gal Gadot (Wonder Woman), teased that it may involve a potential romance between her and the villain, “The Cheetah” played by Barbara Ann Minerva. [709] The Eternals includes a gay superhero named Phastos and is Marvel’s first film to feature an on-screen gay kiss which takes place between him and his “husband.” [710] As soon as the new year rang in for 2020, the president of Marvel Studios announced that the franchise would also be introducing a transgender character. [711]

Marvel’s Thor: Love and Thunder (scheduled to be released in February 2022) will feature a lesbian superhero called Valkyrie. [712] And the trend continues. The CW television network’s Batwoman series depicts the superhero as a lesbian. [713] In the first season she was played by actress Ruby Rose, who is herself a lesbian in real life, and throughout much of the series “Kate Kane” (the character whose alter ego is Batwoman) makes it abundantly clear she’s “very gay.”

In one episode after a college student tearfully tells Batwoman that her parents hate her because they found out she’s gay, Batwoman “outs” herself and is then shown on the cover of CatCo (a fictional magazine in the DC Comics universe) with the headline “Batwoman Reveals Herself as a Lesbian.” [714] It was hailed as a “historic reveal” and celebrated that the character is now an “openly gay superhero.” [715]

Even back in the late 1990s, director Joel Schumacher (who is gay) tried to depict Batman and Robin as gay. When asked about the seemingly gay innuendo between Batman (played by George Clooney) and Robin (played by Chris O’Donnell) in the 1997 Batman & Robin , O’Donnell admitted, “going back and looking and seeing some of the pictures, it was very unusual.” [716] George Clooney later said he played a “gay” Batman. [717] In 2012, DC Comics relaunched the Green Lantern as a gay man. [718] A few years after that they also decided to turn Catwoman into a bisexual. [719]

There are growing calls to depict Spider-Man as gay now too. The character has been played by numerous actors over the years in various incarnations, and now one of them (Tom Holland) who currently portrays the character, is lobbying Marvel Studios to depict Spider-Man as gay or bisexual. [720]

Sources close to the franchise say the character will be depicted as bisexual or have a boyfriend in a future film. [721] Andrew Garfield, who played the character in The Amazing Spider-Man (2012), said, “Why can’t we discover that Peter is exploring his sexuality? It’s hardly even groundbreaking!…So why can’t he be gay? Why can’t he be into boys?” [722]

Star Wars Isn’t Gay Enough When the new Star Wars film The Force Awakens was about to be released in 2015, activists said they wanted Luke Skywalker to be gay. Mark Hamill who plays the character said fans kept asking him, “Could Luke be gay?” and instead of telling them they’re insane, he gave them hope, saying, “If you think Luke is gay, of course he is. You should not be ashamed of it.” [723]

If you’re a fan of the franchise you may recall that before Luke learned of his true identity (and that of his twin sister) both he and Han Solo had a crush on Princess Leia.

After Star Wars: The Last Jedi was released in 2017, LGBT extremists were upset that characters Finn and Poe weren’t in a gay relationship. BuzzFeed wasn’t happy either because they hoped the two men might have a “romance” as part of the plot. [724]

Oscar Issac who plays Poe Dameron, “expressed regret that the ‘natural chemistry’ between Poe and Finn in The Force Awakens was not explored in an overtly romantic way in ‘Star Wars: The Last Jedi’—and wouldn’t be in ‘The Rise of Skywalker.’” [725]

“Personally,” he said, “I kind of hoped and wished that maybe that would’ve been taken further in the other films, but I don’t have control. It seemed like a natural progression, but sadly enough it’s a time when people are too afraid, I think, of… I don’t know what.” [726]

John Boyega, who plays Finn (the Black former Stormtrooper), agreed, saying, “They’ve always had a quite loving and open relationship in which it wouldn’t be too weird if it went beyond it.” [727] LGBT websites seized the news with one declaring, “Oscar Isaac wishes Star Wars’ Poe and Finn were in a gay relationship but ‘people are too afraid.’” [728]

Trying to appease the criticism, director J.J. Abrams included a scene showing two lesbians kissing at the end when everyone was celebrating that the First Order had been defeated. It was hailed as “making history” for the first same-sex kiss in a Star Wars movie, but that wasn’t good enough—nothing ever is. [729]

Just a few years ago all they wanted was for gay “marriage” to be legal, they said. And now they’re furious that leading male characters in Star Wars aren’t having sex with each other. They just want to be “accepted” for who they are, they said, and then once they were, they began demanding everyone embrace them and celebrate them. But it’s not just gays and lesbians. Now it’s transgenders too, and the “gender non-conforming” people, and even child drag queens.

Disney Goes Gay Even what was once the most family friendly entertainment brand in the world has gone gay, and is adding an increasing number of LGBT characters and storylines. In 2014 the Disney Channel’s most popular comedy at the time, Good Luck Charlie, included a lesbian couple in the show. [730] They tried to make it funny by depicting two parents confused about the name of the mother of their daughter’s friend.

Each one of them had met the “mom,” but one thought her name was Susan, and the other swore it was Cheryl. Then there’s a knock on the door and they open it to reveal their daughter’s friend has two “moms.” The media celebrated Disney for being “brave” and said it was “about time,” and once the LGBT foot was in the door activists started pressuring the network to include a gay teenager in one of their shows. [731]

The following year on the Disney-Owned ABC Family Channel [which has since been renamed “Freeform”] they included a gay kiss in a show called The Fosters between two thirteen-year-old boys. [732] The executive producer Peter Paige (who is a homosexual) was proud to have depicted the “youngest same-sex kiss in US television history.” [733]

When Disney’s Beauty and the Beast was made into a live-action film in 2017, it included a brief scene of a same-sex couple dancing, which was hailed as the "first exclusively gay moment" in a Disney movie. [734] That same year they included a "male princess" in their animated series Star vs. The Forces of Evil . [735]

The Huffington Post called it a "beautiful message" for kids. [736] The show also depicted Disney's "first same-sex cartoon kiss," another move which thrilled the liberal media. [737]

Toy Story 4 (2019) had a brief scene where a child is dropped off at school by "two moms," something that LGBT activists were happy about. "It's a small scene, sure, and it's certainly not the major representation that queer people have been waiting for, but it's still important," wrote the Gay Times . [738]

In Disney's The Jungle Cruise (2020) starring Dwayne Johnson, one of the characters (played by Jack Whitehall) comes out as gay, which is the first-ever openly gay character to have a role in a Disney movie. [739]

Disney then announced that a character in an upcoming animated movie called Onward would be a lesbian. "It's been a long wait, but a Disney heroine finally has a girlfriend," gloated Yahoo News when it was revealed that Officer Specter, which is voiced by a lesbian actress named Lena Waithe, would also be a lesbian in the movie. [740]

The idea was praised as "making history" for being the first LGBTQ character in a Disney animation film, but as expected, critics complained that the character only appears in one scene.

Then a few months later Disney released an animated film on their streaming service Disney+ called Out about a kid who was nervous about moving in with his boyfriend because he hasn't told his parents that he's gay. The parents then come to find that his roommate is actually his boyfriend, but instead of being horrified, to his surprise, they're happy for him. It was hailed as Disney/Pixar's "first gay main character." [741] Then they introduced their first bisexual character who stars in another animated series on Disney+ called The Owl House . [742] The character, a 14-year-old girl, had previously been interested in boys, but after the show's creator, Dana Terrace (who is bisexual herself), lobbied the network to turn the character bisexual just like her, they complied. [743] Soon they'll probably make Mickey Mouse or Donald Duck gay.

More Gay Characters for Kids Ever since 2017, Sesame Street's official social media accounts have been posting annual "Happy Pride Month" messages along with pictures of rainbows and various characters from the show celebrating it. [744] In 2018 a former writer for Sesame Street claimed that Bert and Ernie are gay. [745] That man himself is a homosexual (what a surprise) and really just wished they were gay.

The next day the show's producer issued a statement rebuking the former writer's claim, saying, "As we have always said, Bert and Ernie are best friends. They were created to teach preschoolers that people can be good friends with those who are very different from themselves. Even though they are identified as male characters and possess many human traits and characteristics (as most Sesame Street Muppets do), they remain puppets, and do not have a sexual orientation." [746] But PBS would soon cave in to the gay agenda completely.

The following year (in 2019) their cartoon Arthur included a gay "wedding" in the season premiere where they revealed that one of the teachers in the show, Mr. Ratburn, is gay. The episode is titled "Mr. Ratburn and the Special Someone" and his students all attend the wedding expecting he's going to marry another character in the show, Patty, but it's revealed that she's actually his sister, and then his new "husband" is introduced to everyone. [747]

The year after that (in 2020) PBS included a lesbian couple in their animated series Clifford the Big Red Dog , based on the popular children's book series that follows the adventures of an 8-year-old and her dog. [748]

The official Twitter account for Nickelodeon and the Cartoon Network now post messages celebrating "Pride Month," as well as "International Transgender Visibility Day," which is another made-up "holiday" by the Left used to promote transgenderism. [749]

Old Comedies "Transphobic"

Mrs. Doubtfire , a 1993 comedy starring Robin Williams, has come under attack recently for being "transphobic" after it was revealed that a musical adaptation would hit the stage at a theater in Seattle, and then later on Broadway. In the film, Robin Williams loses custody of his kids after a divorce and in order to remain in their lives poses as an elderly woman who successfully applies for a job working as the kids' nanny.

It was well-received at the time, but the culture has shifted so far Left that when word of the musical was announced, activists started a petition on Change.org calling for it to be canceled because the plot uses "tired, transphobic tropes" and "strengthens the assumptions and misjudgments that continue to harm trans women in implicit, pervasive ways." [750]

Jim Carrey's 1994 comedy Ace Ventura: Pet Detective has now been deemed "transphobic" because the pet thief who kidnapped the Miami Dolphins' mascot is found to be a transsexual, now living as a woman. When Jim Carrey realizes this, he runs to the bathroom and starts vomiting, burns his clothes, and jumps in the shower, because earlier in the film "she" came onto him and they made out. [751]

Silence of the Lambs (1991) is also now considered "transphobic" since the serial killer Jodie Foster is trying to hunt down (Buffalo Bill) has gender dysphoria. As part of the plot he murders women so he can make a "woman suit" out of their skin to complete his "transformation." Variety magazine recently denounced the film for "depicting the criminal's transgender identification as part of his mental illness." [752] GLAAD complained that the killer is "a walking, talking gay stereotype." [753]

What's next? Older classics like Some Like it Hot or Tootsie ?, or more modern shows like Tyler Perry's "Madea" character or Martin Lawrence's "Shanaynay?" Jimmy Fallon also used to have a regular segment on the Tonight Show called "Ew" where he would dress up as a woman, but he hasn't done it in quite some time, and it probably won't be much longer until he apologizes for it.

Soon it will probably be considered a slur to call a transgender person "transgender," and making any distinction between them being born the opposite sex from which they currently identify will be considered an invasion of their privacy, much like releasing someone's medical records. To call a transgender "woman" a "transgender woman" will be considered "dehumanizing" and "hateful," and no distinctions will be allowed.

LGBTQ extremists claim people are “assigned” a gender at birth, much like they are given a name—and maintain that the “assignment” of one’s gender is just as arbitrary and is used to confine the “gender expression” of people to correspond with their biological sex. They won’t say that a transgender “woman” was born a male, they say “she” was “assigned” the male gender at birth, as if it was just a coin toss.

The animated comedy series Family Guy announced in early 2019 that they were going to stop making jokes about gay people and transgenders. The series, which has been on air for over 20-years, is known for its no holds barred comedy about typically taboo subjects, but now offending LGBTQ people is too much even for them. The executive producers said, “Some of the things we felt comfortable saying and joking about back then [earlier in the series], we now understand is not acceptable…The climate is different, the culture is different and our views are different.” [754]

Drag Queen Story Hour and “Drag Kids”

One of the three strikes on Alex Jones’ YouTube channel that led to him being banned from the platform was a rant about a local drag queen festival that included children giving dollar bills to the drag queens as they engaged in simulated strip teases. He called it a “freak show” and an “abomination” in a segment for his show and YouTube considered that to be “hate speech.” [755]

In my previous book The Liberal Media Industrial Complex I detail the “unpersoning” of Alex Jones and the censorship of conservatives on social media, which I encourage you to read if you haven’t already so you can grasp just how big the ramifications are for speaking out against this degeneracy.

At one of the Drag Queen Story Hour events in New York, a drag queen asked the children, “Who wants to be a drag queen when they grow up?” [756] At another, one of them taught the children how to “twerk,” asking them, “Does anybody in this room know how to twerk?” Nobody spoke up, and the drag queen continues, “All you need to do is you just need to stand with your feet sort of shoulder-width apart like so…and then you crouch down in this sort of position, so you’re bum’s sticking out. And then you just move your bum up and down like that [as he does it]. And that's twerking."[757]

Equally disturbing is the recent phenomena of young pre-teen boys being dressed in drag by their parents and paraded around at drag queen festivals in hopes they'll become social media stars. One such "drag kid" who goes by the name "Desmond is Amazing" was even featured on Good Morning America .[758]

"Desmond is Amazing" certainly isn't one of a kind. Other child drag queens like "E! the Dragnificent" and "Lactacia" (who started doing drag at eight-years-old) are building up their social media followings, all trying to be the next YouTube or TikTok star.[759]

YouTube even hosts a documentary film called Drag Kids which follows a group of pre-teen kids as they travel around the country participating in child drag shows.[760] The documentary's purpose isn't to raise the alarm about this horrific practice, it's to show how "cool" the kids are.

Netflix has a reality series called AJ and the Queen where a 10-year-old child travels across the country with RuPaul as he performs drag shows in gay bars. The sexual things the drag queens say about the child are too disgusting to include here because they'll make you physically ill as they did me when I first read about it.[761] Another Netflix original series called Dancing Queen follows the life of a drag queen who teaches dance lessons to kids.[762]

In 2015, TLC premiered I Am Jazz , a reality show following the life of Jazz Jennings, a transgender teenager, who at the time was one of the youngest people in the world to identify as transgender. "Jazz Jennings" is a pseudonym, and unlike every other public figure on the planet who uses one, "her" birth name is not allowed to be mentioned on Wikipedia because of the special protections given to transgender people.

Similarly, "Lavern" Cox's birth name (Roderick) is not allowed to be mentioned either. In fact, simply mentioning a transgender person's birth name or legal name is considered a violation of the terms of service on Facebook and Twitter.[763]

TLC was originally called "The Learning Channel" and aired educational programming about science, history, and nature, but slowly morphed into another reality TV network (just like the History Channel has), and now instead of featuring anything remotely educational, TLC is known for mind-numbing trash like Here Comes Honey Boo Boo , and Toddlers & Tiaras .

Celebrities Raising Kids Trans Celebrities love to adopt children from Africa as a novelty and to show how much they “care” about Black people, and since transgenderism has become the coolest new fad in Hollywood, many celebrities seem to be inspired to raise their kids as the opposite gender to defy cultural norms. Charlize Theron adopted two Black kids, one boy and one girl, and then later was spotted around town with the kids both wearing dresses and now insists she has “two beautiful daughters.” [764]

Brad Pitt and Angelina Jolie (who are now divorced) adopted several children, but their first biological child was daughter Shiloh who they started dressing in boy’s clothes, causing many to speculate whether she is a tomboy or actually identifies as a boy. [765]

Megan Fox (now divorced from Brian Austin Green) dresses her six-year-old son in girls’ clothes. “He likes to wear dresses sometimes and I send him to a really liberal, hippy school, but even there—here in California—he still has little boys going, ‘Boys don’t wear dresses’ or ‘Boys don’t wear pink.’ And so, we’re going through that now, where I’m trying to teach him to be confident, no matter what anyone else says.” [766] Megan and her son were once spotted by paparazzi when he was dressed up as Elsa from Disney’s Frozen. [767]

Singer Adele also dresses her son up as Disney princesses, which the liberal media has hailed as “a triumph for us believers in gender-neutral parenting.” [768] Actor Liev Schreiber brought his eight-year-old son to Comic-Con dressed as Harley Quinn, the Joker’s girlfriend from Suicide Squad . [769]

When Mario Lopez appeared on Candace Owen’s podcast and the subject of parents raising their children transgender came up, he said he didn’t think it was right to be deciding that a 3-year-old kid should start being treated as the opposite gender. [770] But he was immediately attacked for being "transphobic" and soon apologized. That wasn't enough, however. The LGBT fascists demanded that he become an "advocate" for transgender kids.

Commercials Go Gay It's not just movies and television shows that have been filled with LGBT people, now even many commercials feature them as well. Homosexual couples are now regularly included in commercials for major brands from IKEA and Chevrolet, to Target and Tide laundry detergent. [771] Each time another one jumps on the bandwagon, their allies in the media always write an article about it celebrating how "great" it is, encouraging more. [772]

For example, Campbell's Soup created a commercial in 2015 showing two gay "dads" feeding "their son" because the company wanted to show the "diverse mix" of American families. The Huffington Post said it, "will melt your heart." [773]

In 2017, the Dove soap company released an ad featuring "real moms" with their babies and praised the "diversity" in how each of them were raising their children, saying there was "no one right way." Included with the "moms" was a transgender woman who is the biological father of one of the babies, along with the actual mother who gave birth to the poor child.

"We are both his biological parents," the transgender says. "You get people that are like, 'What do you mean you're the mom?' We're like, 'Yep! We're both gonna be moms.'" [774]

Gillette razors released a commercial in 2019 featuring a transgender "boy" being taught how to shave by "his" dad for the first time as part of their campaign to "redefine masculinity." [775] Starbucks released a commercial in support of people's "preferred pronouns" showing a teenage girl with a butch haircut named Jemma who appears to be uncomfortable every time someone says her name as she goes about her day until she walks into a Starbucks and is asked what it is so the barista can write it on the cup, which is customary.

She proudly answers “James” and is revealed to be transitioning to a boy. The commercial was part of Starbuck’s announcement that they were partnering with a charity that supports transgender children. [776]

Coca-Cola’s 2018 Super Bowl ad featured a lesbian and a “non-binary” person. [777] In another commercial for Diet Coke released the following year a blue-haired woman drives around in an Uber picking up all kinds of different people while enjoying her Diet Coke all night. At one point her passengers are shown to be two gay men, one White and one Black for extra “diversity,” who are kissing in the back seat. The camera then cuts back to the driver who has a big smile on her face. [778]

Smirnoff vodka now features transgender actress Lavern Cox in their commercials. [779] Other alcohol brands like Absolut, Effen, Bud Light, and Barefoot Wine, all release special edition “Gay Pride” bottles for the month of June every year featuring rainbows on them. [780]

Most major food brands now release special “Pride” themed packages for gay pride month each year, and on social media change their avatars to pictures that include rainbows. All major retailers celebrate it too, from Walmart and Target, to Kohl’s and Old Navy. All tweeting about it and posting on Facebook and Instagram how important LGBT people are to them and issuing press releases alerting the media how they’re going to be “celebrating Pride month.” [781]

Sprite even released a commercial for “Pride” month in 2019 showing a bunch of transgender people transitioning; including a man having makeup put on him by another transgender “woman,” and a girl engaging in “breast binding” with her friend as they joyfully wrap her breasts tightly to her chest so she can “pass” as a male. [782]

Gay Sexual Predators Swept Under the Rug In the “Me Too” era, Harvey Weinstein has become the symbol of sexual degeneracy in Hollywood, but most of the women who accused him of sexual “assault” willingly had sex with him in order to further their own careers, and they weren’t forcibly raped. Years later they just jumped on the bandwagon to cash-in once they saw the opportunity, and in hindsight regretted they had sex with such a pig for a chance to be a star.

That's not to say he didn't make some of them feel extremely uncomfortable by blatantly propositioning them for sex—and he's undoubtedly a sexual predator—but powerful men using the "casting couch" to entice women into having sex with them isn't Hollywood's dirtiest secret.

One of the things nobody wants to talk about (aside from the industry's pedophilia problem which is actually the biggest secret and covered in the next chapter) is the fact that gay men are basically allowed to sexually harass (and assault) other men with impunity because daring to say that a gay man has done anything sexually inappropriate amounts to blasphemy.

Surprisingly, actor Terry Crews developed the courage to come forward in 2017 to admit that he was once sexually assaulted by his agent, who grabbed his genitals while making sexual advances toward him. [783] James Van Der Beek, star of the teen drama Dawson's Creek , later came forward as well to reveal that he was sexually harassed (and groped) by "older, powerful men" in Hollywood. [784]

Others including Brendan Fraser, Bill & Ted's Excellent Adventure star Alex Winter, and Star Trek: Discovery actor Anthony Rapp, have also come forward with allegations of being sexually harassed by gay men in Hollywood. [785] Their stories were just a blip on the radar however, and then the issue was swept under the rug.

Undoubtedly the same thing has happened to many others who are afraid to come forward out of embarrassment or because they don't want to make waves out of fear it may derail their career. In fact, after Terry Crews revealed he was assaulted, others in the entertainment industry including D.L Hughley and 50 Cent mocked him. [786]

During a 2011 interview, Rapper Fat Joe admitted that he believes a "gay mafia" controls the music industry, saying, "The hip hop industry is most likely owned by gays. I happen to think there's a gay mafia in hip hop. Not rappers—the editorial presidents of magazines, the [program directors] at radio stations, the people who give you awards at award shows. This is a fuckin' gay mafia, my man, and they are in power." [787]

It's not just in the entertainment industry that gay sexual predators are mostly ignored. The same thing is happening in the U.S. military, especially after Barack Obama lifted the ban on them enrolling. [788] According to the Department of Defense statistics, more men than women are victims of sexual assault in the military. [789] You won't hear that on the news because it's another uncomfortable fact that shows the liberal agenda is severely flawed.

When gay couples adopt small children and molest them, those stories are just reported in local outlets and never make the national news. [790] Few people want to even comment on such abuse out of concerns they'll be branded "homophobic." Reports of gay couples sexually abusing their adopted or foster children can be found around the world. [791]

In some cases the couples force the children into sex trafficking and sell them to other pedophiles. [792] But just mentioning those cases is enough to anger LGBT activists who may then target you to be "canceled."

Same sex couples adopting children was the real issue at hand regarding legalizing gay "marriage," but very few conservatives or even Christians dared talk about it. When gays are allowed to adopt children it's no longer about what "two consenting adults" are doing "in the privacy of their own bedroom," it's about an innocent third party, and no child should be held prisoner in such an environment.

Like many gay people, CNN's Anderson Cooper became a father (at the age of 52) after he bought an egg from a fertility clinic and then hired a surrogate—and had the egg artificially inseminated with his sperm. [793] The woman carried the child to term and then turned it over to Anderson Cooper to be raised by him and his boyfriend.

The kid will most likely never know his mother due to privacy shields regarding egg donors, nor even have the surrogate in his life either, and instead will be raised by two homosexual men in their fifties, only to someday have to be told the horrible truth about how he came to exist.

What Causes It?

In 2019, a massive study conducted by over 30 organizations including Harvard and Cambridge Universities was released after scientists analyzed the DNA of almost 500,000 people and ruled out any supposed "gay gene" that caused people to be born homosexual. [794] They cited "the environment" for being 75% responsible for people's sexual preference. [795]

“Obviously, there are environmental causes of sexual orientation. We knew that before this study,” said Michael Bailey, a psychologist at Northwestern University who has researched the causes of sexual preferences. [796] The same may be true of transgenderism as well.

In other words, if an infant boy not yet knowing the difference between men and women, sees mommy putting on makeup—and for a moment wants to be like mommy and do what she does—and if the mother doesn’t teach him the distinctions between boys and girls, he’ll obviously grow up extremely confused and have a difficult time knowing which behaviors are normal for a man and which are not. The boy might start “identifying” with the mother if he is not brought up to understand the biological and sociological differences between boys and girls, possibly leading to gender dysphoria and transgenderism later in life.

Some psychologists believe that “Rapid Onset Gender Dysphoria” is a form of social contagion or mass psychosis sparked by teens being bombarded with depictions of transgender people on social media portrayed in a positive light, and as a result see themselves as transgender in order to be a part of this “in” group of “cool” people as a coping mechanism for other underlying psychological disorders. [797]

YouTube as a company promotes and glorifies transgender YouTubers like “Gigi Gorgeous” as well as gender-bending male makeup artists like Jeffrey Star and James Charles who identify as men but wear women’s makeup and clothes, which is fueling this phenomenon. They have created an extremely confusing environment for children, who as you know, are so impressionable they can be convinced that a fat bearded man in a red suit flies around the country every Christmas to bring them presents.

Today, with so many of them being raised by social media personalities instead of their parents they have no idea what kinds of behaviors are conducive or detrimental to a happy, fulfilling life.

Freud believed homosexuality is a mental disorder that develops from a disruption in the Oedipal phase of children’s psychosexual development. [798] It’s possible that it could also be a birth defect resulting in a certain region of the brain being wired backwards, so to speak, during gestation while the fetus is developing. [799] Transgender people could be born with the brain of the opposite sex due to the same reason.

If, as some scientists believe, prenatal abnormalities in the womb due to a hormone imbalance or other external forces are causing these issues, then scientists just admitting that homosexuality and transgenderism are birth defects is considered “hate speech” today. [800] To admit that they have a “defect” would be to admit that they’re not normal—and that’s “hateful.” Searching for a cure that would prevent the prenatal changes to a fetus that cause such things is tantamount to eugenics, and equally opposed by the liberal ideologues.

Another theory is that homosexuality arose as a maladaptive behavior due to a mutation in the gene pool as a result of the decline of the pressures of natural selection, because in our modern age humans don’t have to complete for mates to pass on their genes as if it were a life or death situation for the species since there are already billions of us, often crammed in large cities literally living on top of one another.

Today large groups of “free-riders” exist because of economic abundance, modern conveniences, and social safety nets, so the urge to become financially successful and physically fit in hopes of attracting a beautiful female mate is drastically diminished for many males.

Conversely, because of our economic abundant society, many females don’t feel the need to attract a male to provide protection and resources for them like our ancestors did for tens of thousands of years, since modern society offers those luxuries instead. This would explain the explosion of florescent-haired lesbians and socially dysfunctional people who identify as dozens of different genders whose sole purpose in life seems to be ruining it for everyone else.

Under this school of thought, because the evolutionary pressures for men and women to find mates have been lifted, many are no longer conforming to the social framework and norms our species has known since the beginning of time, and their behaviors are “mutating.” But instead of being content as “free-riders” whose survival is protected through modern-day conveniences and social programs, these changes are causing the rise of what some scientists call “spiteful mutants” who hold hostile views towards those who are normal (i.e. people who continue heterosexual traditions, behaviors, and gender roles; and those who work hard in their careers and take care of their health). [801]

The end result of these “spiteful mutants,” according to the theory, is the collapse of the social structure of the entire group of organisms (humans in this case) because the non-affected group (heterosexual and cis gender people) who do not suffer from the same mutations are still severely impacted due to the disruption of the entire social fabric of the species by those with the mutation. [802]

People who are molested as children tend to later become child molesters themselves. So it appears that pedophilia may in some cases be a psychological condition that is induced from an experience rather than something someone is born with. [803] The same may be true of homosexuality and gender-bending. Is it a birth defect, or a psychological disorder exacerbated by the celebration of sexual deviancy and other abnormal lifestyles in the media and on the Internet? Just asking this question is considered “hate speech,” and few scientists will dare risk their career by publicly doubting the new liberal orthodoxy regarding gender identity and sexuality.

Once a crazy idea takes hold in a culture it becomes reinforced through social policing, and anyone who begins to doubt the practice is ostracized, reprimanded, or in some cases physically punished. Others who may quietly have the same concerns about the current practice are thus afraid to voice those concerns, which helps to maintain the hegemony, no matter how irrational, abusive, or dangerous it is.

Imagine living in Central America and speaking up when your fellow villagers were getting ready to cut out someone’s beating heart to appease the Aztec “gods,” or telling the tribal elders in Africa that slicing your bottom lip and stretching it out by sticking a large plate in there is ridiculous. It’s extremely difficult to break cultural traditions once they have taken root.

“Homophobia” is a Hoax Anyone who doesn’t celebrate this onslaught of homosexuality, bisexuality, and gender-bending is branded “homophobic,” “transphobic,” or a basic “hateful bigot,” but those are just more lies from the Left. A phobia is an irrational fear of something. [804] People who are sick of seeing drag queens and homosexuals celebrated in the media aren’t afraid of them, they’re repulsed by them. The same way normal people are when they hear their parents or grandparents talking about having sex with each other. What they do behind closed doors in the privacy of their own home is their business, but the rest of us don’t want to hear about it, much less see depictions of it.

Unfortunately, today you can’t avoid having gender benders and other LGBT people shoved in your face every time your turn on the TV or scroll through a news feed on social media. And you must not criticize them. You must celebrate them, or you are a “Nazi!” A few years before this cultural Marxism infected the country, comedian Adam Carolla joked that he believed in the future, kids would get bullied for not being gay. [805] It’s sad how right he was.

Sexual Deviants In the 1950s sitcom I Love Lucy, the couple Ricky and Lucy had to each sleep in their own twin bed for a few seasons because the network was concerned about the show being "too sexual" if they were seen lying in the same bed together. Back then it was considered too suggestive to depict a couple in bed on network television even if they were married. [806] The Brady Bunch (1969-1974) didn't even have a toilet in the bathroom of their house because executives thought it would be too disgusting to show one on TV during scenes when the cast was brushing their teeth or doing their hair. [807]

Fast forward a few decades and Charlie Sheen would become Hollywood's darling and the highest paid sitcom actor in history. [808] An HIV-infected scumbag who smoked crack and regularly used hookers became the industry's favorite star! Hollywood once celebrated wholesome characters and families but now embraces the biggest degenerates as creative "geniuses" who can't help being a little "eccentric."

The media raved over Fifty Shades of Grey , the sadomasochistic film series based on the bestselling novel, and "The Weeknd" performed a song from the soundtrack at the 2016 Grammys as they attempted to mainstream this once-fringe lifestyle. Target even sold 50 Shades of Grey sex toys. [809]

Skip Chasey, the vice president of Endeavor (formerly known as the William Morris Endeavor) one of the largest management firms in Hollywood, accidentally killed a man in his sex dungeon in 2017, but no charges were filed, not even for negligent homicide. [810] He also kept his job at the agency. [811]

Lady Gaga tried to revive R. Kelly's career at the 2014 American Music Awards by doing a live performance with him, despite the allegations of him being a child predator making headlines for well over a decade at the time. [812] She also put him in her video "Do What You Want" which was directed by the infamous Terry Richardson, who has been accused of sexually exploiting models for years. [813]

Then a couple years later at the 2016 Grammys, she performed her song "Till It Happens To You" and was hailed as a hero for "raising awareness" about sexual assault and everyone forgot that just a few years earlier she single-handedly put R. Kelly back in the spotlight. [814]

Ellen DeGeneres once introduced two little girls aged six and eight to rapper Nicki Minaj because she was their favorite pop star. [815] Ellen had Nicki surprise them on stage live on her show and the audience couldn't have been any happier. No adult should be letting their children listen to

Nicki Minaj's music because it's filled with sexually explicit and vulgar lyrics, but that didn't stop Ellen DeGeneres from introducing the adult entertainer to the little girls.

Perversion apparently runs in Nicki Minaj's family because her 25-year-old brother was convicted of raping an 11-year-old and sentenced to 25 years in prison. [816]

Hulk Hogan's infamous sex tape was the result of him sleeping with his best friend's wife (with his permission) as he hung out in another room of the house after inviting Hulk over to have his way with her. At one point during the escapade the husband even came into the bedroom to see how they were doing. [817]

Celebrities often have dysfunctional lifestyles, becoming jaded and numb from overindulgence due to an endless supply of money and an inner circle of yes men who will never doubt their desires out of fear that they may be cut off from the cash cow they have attached themselves to. Their carnal appetite can never be satisfied, causing them to obsessively try to fill the emptiness in their souls with worldly pleasures. Instead of the media acknowledging these kinds of decisions lead to a disastrous downward spiral, they are celebrated and encouraged.

HGTV's popular series House Hunters follows a couple around town as they search for a new home, and they make sure to regularly include LGBT couples in the show for "diversity," but that wasn't enough so they recently included a "throuple," a group of three people in a polyamorous relationship.

"The past four years, I have been living in Lori and Brian's house, so buying a house together as a 'throuple' will signify our next big step as a family of five rather than all four of them plus me," said one of the three. [818] The "throuple" is also raising two children because for some reason child protective services doesn't think the kids are in a toxic and abusive household. Imagine trying to explain to the children who the third person is that's living with them.

Democrat Congresswoman Katie Hill was also in such a relationship before she resigned when it was revealed the third wheel was one of her staffers. [819]

In ABC's sitcom Single Parents they introduced a "throuple" that consists of two men and a woman, one of whom is a public school teacher. [820] When they explain their "relationship" to their friends, instead of being taken aback by the weirdness, one of them gets excited and pulls out her phone to download the same app the “throuple” used to find each other.

We’re even seeing incest promoted on network television and in films. [821] Nick Cassavetes, the director of The Notebook, endorsed incest while promoting his film Yellow (2012) which features the main character having an incestious relationship with her brother, saying, “If you’re not having kids—who gives a damn? Love who you want. Isn’t that what we say? Gay marriage—love who you want?…you’re not hurting anybody, except every single person who freaks out because you’re in love with one another.” [822]

Other films like Close My Eyes (1991), The Cement Garden (1993), Lovers of the Arctic Circle (1998), Delta (2008), Beautiful Kate (2009), and Illegitimate (2016) all have incest as the central plot. Some websites have even compiled lists of what they call the “20 Best Incest Movies of All Time,” [823] and the “13 Steamiest Incestuous Relationships In Film.” [824]

Actress Mackenzie Phillips, best known for her role in American Graffiti and more recently working on the Disney Channel’s So Weird, wrote in her memoir that when she was 19-years-old she began having sex with her biological father and continued the incestuous relationship for ten years until she was almost thirty! She described the relationship as “consensual” and once had an abortion after becoming pregnant because she figured he was the father. [825]

In recent years we have been seeing more stories approving of people engaging in incest. [826] Cosmopolitan magazine published a story about how “great” it was with the headline, “Girl describes what it was like to have sex with her dad.” In the article the woman is quoted as saying, “The sexual intensity was nothing like I’d ever felt before. It was like being loved by a parent you never had, and the partner you always wanted, at once.” [827] They did a similar article about a brother and sister who were separated at birth but entered into a sexual relationship with each other when they were reunited as adults. [828]

Scientists believe that when parents are reunited with their adult children after giving them up for adoption when they were born, they sometimes develop a strong sexual attraction for each other, called GSA (Genetic Sexual Attraction). [829] The same phenomena can happen to adult siblings when they meet for the first time. [830]

Soon liberals will likely welcome incest into the LGBT community and declare it no more abnormal than homosexuality. In fact, there are already a growing number of blogs, Tumblr accounts, and YouTube videos dedicated to legalizing "consensual incest." [831]

As everyone knows, it's common for Hollywood-types to date people a decade or two younger than them, but some in the industry like partners so young it's utterly disgusting, and in some cases illegal. Billionaire music mogul David Geffen has a well-known reputation of dating men who are over 40 years younger than him. [832] When he was in his seventies he was "dating" a 20-year-old former college football player. [833]

The famous pianist Liberace had a 16-year-old boyfriend when he was fifty-seven years old. [834] 75-year-old actress Holland Taylor, who played Charlie Sheen's mother on Two and a Half Men, has a 35-year old girlfriend. [835] David Bowie is alleged to have had sex with a 14-year-old groupie at the height of his career. [836] Jerry Seinfeld dated a 17-year-old when he was thirty-nine years old. [837] And these are just a few of the most well-known instances.

Writer, director, and actor Woody Allen is considered a "treasure of the cinema" (having won four Academy Awards and nominated 24 times), but nobody in the industry seems to care that he began a sexual relationship with his girlfriend Mia Farrow's adopted 21-year-old daughter when he was fifty-six. [838]

Such people would be shunned in most professions, but for decades Hollywood has welcomed those who engage in the most bizarre behaviors and nothing is too taboo. The "MeToo" movement really originated in Hollywood from actresses who finally grew tired of the predatory environment that was pervasive in the industry. A long list of big-named actors have been accused of sexual harassment and other predatory behavior as the "MeToo" movement gained momentum in 2017.

But it seems everyone in the industry was very well aware of what was happening and who the perpetrators were. It took the fall of Harvey Weinstein to finally open the floodgates and admit the entertainment industry had a massive sexual predator problem. But sleazebags in Hollywood who prey on young actresses are just the tip of the deviance iceberg that runs rampant in the industry. And even worse, what they're doing is being exported to the rest of society.

Celebrity Selfies Selfies are a symptom of our narcissistic culture, with people obsessing over posting pretty pictures of themselves on social media in order to feel validated. It’s a sickness that has infected large portions of our society and celebrities like Rihanna, Miley Cyrus, and Kim Kardashian have normalized posting nude pictures online, something that just a few years ago would have been unthinkable for most girls. [839]

Some experts have even said that celebrities like Kim Kardashian are making children vulnerable to predators online because so many of them mimic their scantily clad selfies in hopes of attracting the attention of complete strangers who “like” and comment on their posts. [840] Kim even had her 4-year-old daughter (at the time) take a topless photo of her and posted it on Instagram. [841]

You could see little North (her daughter) in a mirror holding the phone, taking the picture. Kim Kardashian even captioned it “By North.” Teaching 4-year-old girls to take topless photos and post them online—that’s Hollywood today.

Kim Kardashian, perhaps more than any other celebrity has normalized sex tapes. Without hers being “leaked” in 2007 showing her with her then-boyfriend pop singer Ray J, she would be just another spoiled rich girl in Los Angeles, but her sex tape made her a star. The same thing with Paris Hilton’s.

When her sex tape was leaked in 2003 she became a star overnight only to be later overshadowed by Kim Kardashian as the “queen” of pop culture. Some wannabe reality stars have even leaked their own sex tapes hoping to follow in these footsteps thinking they too will become famous.

Mainstreaming of Porn People who regularly watch porn have their brains physically altered through the creation of new neural pathways, causing them to become less aroused by actual women during real sexual encounters over time. [842]

These neurological changes are similar to the tolerance level of drug addicts which cause them to need more of the drug to achieve the same high they once got the longer they use it.

People who develop porn habits often find themselves in need of more hardcore porn to get aroused, even leading them to watch bizarre fetish videos hoping to get off since they don't experience enough gratification from "regular" porn, let alone actual sexual partners. [843]

The Internet has mainstreamed porn since people had to once drive to seedy adult video stores to get VHS tapes of it, but now millions of videos are just a few clicks away. Twitter even allows porn stars (and aspiring porn "actresses") to have accounts where they can post sexually explicit content in their feed which can easily be accessed by children. [844]

A site called PornHub is basically YouTube for porn, where anyone can upload hardcore pornographic videos and they are then instantly published for the world to see. Due to the lack of oversight that traditional pornography producers follow, like verifying the identity, age, and consent of the parties involved, PornHub has hosted numerous videos of underage girls and even rape videos, including one of a 14-year-old girl from Ohio who was kidnapped and gang raped while being recorded by the assailants. [845]

The video was uploaded to PornHub several times with titles like "Teen Crying and Getting Slapped Around," "Teen Getting Destroyed," and "Passed out Teen." One upload had over 400,000 views. [846] The victim later emailed the website, explaining she was raped (which was clear by the video and the titles) but the video remained online.

A 30-year-old man in Florida uploaded over 50 different videos of him sexually abusing a 15-year-old girl after she went missing before he was finally arrested. [847] Breitbart pointed out, "Pornhub apparently has no idea whatsoever who is uploading content. Pornhub also has no idea and apparently doesn't bother to verify the age of the performers in the videos, or if they consented to have sex, to be filmed, or to have the video commercialized and made public." [848]

There's now a social media company called OnlyFans that caters to girls who want to start selling their own amateur nude photos and porn videos. OnlyFans is basically like Instagram, but people have to pay a monthly fee to see what others are posting, and the website has no rules about nudity other than the users have to supposedly be 18 years old.

When unemployment levels skyrocketed because of the stay-at-home orders during the Coronavirus Pandemic of 2020, many young girls flocked to OnlyFans hoping to make some easy money. Once they're signed up they use Instagram and Twitter to promote their accounts by leaving the link to their OnlyFans page in their bio and then post content using trending hashtags hoping to get guys' attention and drive traffic there.

Previously if a girl wanted to get into porn she would have to go to work for a company that had the infrastructure to host the videos and charge customers' credit cards, but now OnlyFans has given the ability to anyone to become a "porn star" within just a few minutes. It's well known that many aspiring actresses who move to Los Angeles hoping to become stars end up working in porn out of desperation to pay their bills (or to afford their drug habits). Some even resort to prostitution.

Teen Vogue magazine even published an article in 2019 titled "Sex Work is Real Work," encouraging girls to become prostitutes and demanding that it become legalized around the world. [849]

Many psychologists are warning that porn and video game addiction is actually causing a masculinity crisis among young men. A study by researchers at Stanford University looked into how excessive gaming and use of pornography is causing many young men to be extremely isolated and preventing them from developing the social skills needed to form relationships with girls, which only fuels more isolation. [850]

Pedophiles in Hollywood Sexual harassment and pornography aren't Hollywood's worst problems however, as child actor Corey Feldman said, "the number one problem in Hollywood was, is, and always will be, pedophilia. That's the biggest problem for children in this industry…It's the big secret." [851] He made the claim in 2011 on ABC's Nightlight, but his concerns largely fell on deaf ears.

A few years later in 2013 when he was a guest on The View the topic came up again. “I’m saying there are people that were the people that did this to both me and Corey [Haim] that are still working, they’re still out there, and that are some of the richest most powerful people in this business. And they do not want me saying what I am saying right now,” he told the hosts. [852]

Barbara Walters responded, “Are you saying that they are pedophiles and that they are still in this business?”

“Yes,” Corey replied, going on to warn parents who are thinking about getting their children involved in acting.

“You’re damaging an entire industry,” Barbara responds, looking disappointed in him.

Feldman said that his best friend Corey Haim, who he costarred with in numerous movies, told him that Charlie Sheen raped Haim in 1986 on the set of a movie (Lucas) they were filming together. [853] Sheen allegedly told Haim, “it was perfectly normal for older men and younger boys in the business” and “it was what all the guys do.” [854] Sheen denies the allegation.

“It’s all connected to a bigger, darker power,” Feldman later said. “I don’t know how high up the chain that power goes, but I know that it probably is outside of the film industry too. It’s probably in government; it’s probably throughout the world in different dark aspects.” [855]

Elijah Wood, who was a child actor in various films before hitting it big by playing Frodo in the Lord of the Rings trilogy, once made some comments during an interview about the issue, saying, “Clearly something major was going on in Hollywood. It was all organized. There are a lot of vipers in this industry, people who only have their own interests in mind. There is darkness in the underbelly. What bums me about these situations is that the victims can’t speak as loudly as the people in power. That’s the tragedy of attempting to reveal what is happening to innocent people: they can be squashed, but their lives have been irreparably damaged.” [856]

He later “clarified” his statements, claiming that his interview was supposed to be about his latest film but “became about something else entirely” and said he had “no first-hand experience or observation of the topic” and that he just heard about such things from a documentary he had seen (most likely An Open Secret , which had come out a year earlier). [857]

An Open Secret In 2014, a film maker named Amy Berg investigated Corey Feldman's claims of pedophiles in Hollywood in a documentary titled An Open Secret . Previously she had been nominated for an Oscar for another documentary she made called Deliver Us From Evil about sexual abuse in the Catholic Church, so it was a subject she was quite familiar with.

An Open Secret alleges that pedophile producers have held parties where they enticed young child actors with drugs and alcohol in order to take advantage of them. [858] It details the alleged activities surrounding an Internet media company called Digital Entertainment Network that was founded in the late-1990s by Marc Collins-Rector [a convicted sex offender], and his boyfriend Chad Shackley. [859] The company is alleged to have held pool parties at their 12,000-square foot mansion that were used to entice underage teenage boys into having sex with adult men. [860]

Leonardo DiCaprio's former talent agent was convicted of molesting a 13-year-old boy in 2005 and sentenced to eight years in prison. [861] The Los Angeles county deputy district attorney said, "People like this are predators who prey on little kids who want to be the next Justin Bieber—and they're told, 'That's what's done, this is all normal in the industry.'" [862] The Los Angeles Times noted that, "At least a dozen child molestation and child pornography prosecutions since [the year] 2000 have involved actors, managers, production assistants and others in the entertainment industry." [863]

One of those was a talent agent named Martin Weiss who managed kids that had roles on Nickelodeon, the Disney Channel, and in numerous films like Parenthood and The Muppets Movie. He was charged with several counts of child molestation and faced up to 80-years in prison, but was given just one. [864]

Director Bryan Singer, whose credits include X-Men, Superman Returns, Valkyrie , and many others, has been accused by numerous men who say he made sexual advances towards them when they were boys. [865] Singer, who denies the allegations, has also claimed journalists who were investigating him were just "homophobic." [866]

Singer is also alleged to have been in attendance at some of the parties held by the Digital Entertainment Network, and is well known in Hollywood for hosting his own pool parties filled with what many have described as "kids." [867] He has been followed by sexual predator accusations for decades. As far back as 1997 several child actors accused him of asking them to film a nude scene when they were working on one of his movies, yet his career has continued almost unscathed. [868]

Infamous pedophile Jeffrey Epstein also had numerous ties with Hollywood A-listers, some of which had flown on his private jet to his island in the Caribbean, dubbed "Pedo Island." [869] Epstein operated with impunity for years and is believed by many to have worked as an intelligence operative for Mossad (Israel's CIA) to get dirt on powerful people, including many politicians, so they could be blackmailed. [870]

For decades Hollywood hasn't seemed to care about child abuse, and in fact many defend it and give awards to the abusers. Director Roman Polanski fled the United States in the 1970s after he was convicted of drugging and raping a 13-year-old girl, but continued to make films in Europe where he could avoid being extradited by U.S. authorities. [871] Not only did he continue to make films, but Hollywood continued to give him awards.

In 2002 he was given the Oscar for Best Director for his film The Pianist. When he was announced as the winner, the audience gave him a roaring applause and a standing ovation by many, including Martin Scorsese and Meryl Streep. [872] Harrison Ford, who was presenting the winner that year, looked out at the crowd astonished, knowing very well why Polanski wasn't there to accept his award. After the applause died down he said, "The Academy congratulates Roman Polanski, and accepts this award on his behalf." [873]

Not only did his peers give him a standing ovation at the Oscars, but many in Hollywood defend Polanski, still to this day. Whoopi Goldberg said that things were "different" in the 1970s, and it wasn't "rape-rape" and thinks Polanski should be left alone and not extradited to the United States to serve the prison time he has been avoiding for over 40 years. [874]

In an interview on the Howard Stern Show director Quentin Tarantino defended Polanski. Howard interrupted him, saying, "Wait a minute. If you have sex with a 13-year-old girl and you're a grown man, you know that that's wrong." [875]

Howard's cohost Robin Quivers was stunned and pointed out that Polanski had also given her alcohol and Quaaludes to which Tarantino responded, "She wanted to have it…And by the way, we're talking about America's morals, not talking about the morals in Europe and everything… Look, she was down with this." [876]

In 2009, Harvey Weinstein wrote an op-ed in The Independent titled "Polanski has served his time and must be freed." [877] Over one hundred Hollywood celebrities and directors including Natalie Portman, Penelope Cruz, David Lynch, and Martin Scorsese, signed a petition that year to show their support for Polanski, demanding his release after he was taken into custody in Switzerland since he was facing extradition back to the U.S. [878]

Switzerland later decided against extraditing him and let him go free. Virtually an entire industry rallied behind a man who drugged and raped a 13-year-old girl and then fled the country to avoid going to prison. That's Hollywood!

After a documentary called Leaving Neverland investigated some of the allegations surrounding Michael Jackson, singer Barbra Streisand said she believed boys were molested by Jackson, but, "they were thrilled to be there" and "his sexual needs were his sexual needs," adding, "They [the alleged victims] both married and they both have children, so it didn't kill them." [879]

In 2017, Stephen King's It was remade into a feature film due to the wildly popular TV miniseries in 1990, but what people who hadn't read the 1987 novel don't know is that Stephen King depicted the kids all having an orgy after they finally defeated the "It" creature in the sewer. Out of the blue Beverly Marsh, the only girl in the group, tells the boys "I have an idea," and then they all got naked and she has sex with all six of them. [880]

In the book she's depicted as eleven-years-old (and twelve in the 1990 TV miniseries). Once the boys are all done having sex with her, they magically remember which way to go in order to get out of the sewer and finally escape. Stephen King literally wrote an entire scene about an eleven-year-old girl getting gang banged and nobody seems to care. [881]

Actress Annette O'Toole, who played Beverly Marsh in the 1990 television version, was upset that the orgy scene wasn't allowed in the film. "This was their greatest attachment to one another—she thought they were all going to die, and this was a gift she was giving to each one of them, and I thought it was the most beautiful, generous love-filled gift, and it tied them all together in such an amazing way.” [882]

In 2017 after Kevin Spacey was accused of trying to engage in a sexual relationship with a 14-year-old child actor back in 1986, he announced for the first time that he was gay. That deflected much of the media criticism away from the allegations and he was celebrated for his “emotional” admission.

ABC News ran a story with the headline, “‘I choose now to live as a gay man,’ Kevin Spacey comes out in emotional tweet,” but later changed it due to the backlash from people who on social media were shocked ABC sanitized the story with such a pleasant headline. [883]

The CEO of entertainment giant Allied Artists, Kim Richards, said of Spacey, “If true, acting on impulse while inebriated speaks to over-indulgence, not predatory behavior. You’re good & decent, deserving forgiveness.” [884]

Years earlier Seth McFarlane’s Family Guy animated comedy series included a brief scene of a character (Stewie) running naked through a shopping mall screaming “Help! I’ve escaped from Kevin Spacey’s basement!” [885] McFarlane had previously called out Harvey Weinstein in 2013, years before the MeToo movement and the widespread reports about Weinstein. When he read off the names of the nominees for Best Supporting Actress for the Oscars, he followed up by saying, “Congratulations, you five ladies no longer have to pretend to be attracted to Harvey Weinstein.” [886]

McFarlane knew of the rumors about Weinstein but at the time outsiders just though it was a joke. Many wondered if he also heard rumors about Kevin Spacey’s secrets as well, resulting in him adding the bizarre scene in Family Guy . Others came forward with similar allegations as well. Spacey was soon fired from his Netflix series House of Cards , and went into hiding.

But on Christmas Eve of 2019 he posted a bizarre video on YouTube speaking in the tone of his evil House of Cards character Frank Underwood while sitting in front of a fireplace. “You didn’t really think I was going to miss the opportunity to wish you a Merry Christmas, did you?” he began. “I know what you’re thinking, ‘Can he be serious?’ I’m dead serious. The next time someone does something you don’t like, you can go on the attack. But you can also hold your fire and do the unexpected. You can…kill them with kindness.” [887] He smiled menacingly at the camera and the video ends.

Even more disturbing is that one of his accusers had died just a few months earlier. [888] He seemed to be alluding that he had killed him. The very next day, on Christmas, another one of his accusers died from a purported suicide. [889] That person’s estate then dropped the lawsuit against Spacey which had been pending.

Crimes Inspired by Hollywood

While it’s not entirely accurate to say that violence depicted in movies causes real world violence, it can be said that sometimes it’s a catalyst, and in numerous cases mass murderers, bombings, bank robberies, and other crimes have been inspired by popular movies. Extensive news coverage of mass shootings is actually correlated with more mass shootings because it seems to plant the seeds in other lunatics’ minds. [890] The same is true of news reports about suicide, a phenomenon called suicide contagion. [891]

The FBI and Department of Homeland Security were concerned that Joker (2019) may inspire mass shootings at theaters, so police presence was increased during the film's opening weekend and some even inserted undercover agents inside as a precaution. [892] The fears arose from a lunatic dressed as the Joker opening fire inside a theater during a showing of The Dark Knight Rises in 2012, killing a dozen people and injuring many more.

The New York Post reported that, "It's reasonable to ask if 'Joker' will inspire would-be killers." [893] Some of the victims' families of The Dark Knight Rises shooting wrote a letter to Warner Brothers, the studio that produced Joker , expressing their concern that the movie gave the character a "sympathetic origin story." [894] It's not a typical superhero film, nor is it cartoonish in any way like many of the previous Batman movies. Instead, Joker is a depressing "character study" showing a man descend into madness and morph into a mass murderer, but because a portion of the population are severely mentally ill, many saw the Joker as a hero.

The 1976 film Taxi Driver starring Robert De Niro (which was largely the inspiration for Joker) is said to have triggered John Hinckley Jr.'s murderous fantasy that resulted in him attempting to assassinate President Ronald Reagan in 1981. In Taxi Driver, Robert De Niro's character plots the assassination of a presidential candidate he becomes fixated on, which gave John Hinkley Jr. the idea to do the same thing to Ronald Reagan. He later shot Reagan outside the Washington Hilton Hotel. [895]

In the 1995 film Basketball Diaries starring Leonardo DiCaprio, his character has a dream sequence where he walks into his high school wearing a black trench coat and starts blowing away his fellow classmates with a shotgun. Three years later in 1998, two students in Colorado carried out the infamous Columbine High School shooting, causing the very name "Columbine" to become synonymous with a school shooting.

The killers wore black trench coats on the day of the massacre just like Leonardo DiCaprio. Some parents of the victims filed lawsuits against the producers of The Basketball Diaries for inspiring the attack. The Columbine massacre itself has inspired dozens of copycats from more unhinged high school students who see the killers as heroes. [896]

Oliver Stone's 1994 black comedy Natural Born Killers is believed to have inspired over a dozen copycat murders and mass shootings by teenagers in the 1990s and early 2000s. [897] In the film, a murderous couple (Mickey and Mallory) go on a drug-fueled killing spree and become television news sensations. Oliver Stone says he meant the film to be a critique of how the media sensationalizes violence and murders, but some unhinged viewers actually saw Mickey and Mallory as true heroes and wanted to become famous mass murderers just like them.

After actor Robin Williams committed suicide in 2014, researchers believed it caused suicide rates to spike almost 10% from copycats. "Although we cannot determine with certainty that these deaths are attributable to the death of Robin Williams, we found both a rapid increase in suicides in August 2014, and specifically suffocation suicides, that paralleled the time and method of Williams' death," said a report compiled by researchers at Columbia University. [898] NBC News admitted, "It has been known for decades that media reports about suicides, especially celebrity suicides, lead to an increase of suicide deaths." [899]

The Netflix teen drama 13 Reasons Why is about a girl who commits suicide after being bullied and gossiped about at her high school. She left behind a box of cassette tapes where she recorded the "13 reasons why" she killed herself, which forms the basis of the show, and many researchers believe that the series actually increased the rate of teenage suicide. [900] Studies show that suicide is "contagious" and the more widely it is portrayed in the media, the more people get inspired to follow the same path in hopes of putting an end to their own personal struggles. [901]

At the University of Illinois, a student was arrested for sexually assaulting a woman he tied up in his dorm room in order to re-create a scene from Fifty Shades of Grey , the popular sadomasochism film based on the bestselling novel. [902] The lead actor in the film, Jamie Dornan, later admitted that he feared a crazy obsessed fan would actually murder him like John Lennon. [903]

Ben Affleck's 2010 film The Town was the admitted inspiration behind a pair of Brooklyn crooks who, like the characters in the film, dressed up as cops to rob a local check-cashing business. [904] Another robbery at a bank in Chicago is also believed to have been inspired by The Town , where the perpetrators copied a different scene from the film in which the characters dressed as nuns for their disguise when they robbed one of the banks. [905]

A teenager in New York City was inspired by Fight Club to bomb a Starbucks which thankfully didn't cause any injuries because it was closed. [906] In the 1999 film, the underground fight club started by Brad Pitt and Edward Norton escalates into a terrorist organization with the launch of "Project Mayhem," beginning with a series of attacks on symbols of corporate America. One of those attacks was on a "corporate piece of art" consisting of a gigantic metal ball which is knocked off its foundation and rolls into a nearby coffee shop, clearly designed to look like a Starbucks, destroying it.

There is also speculation that a serial bomber in Austin, Texas who ultimately blew himself up after being pulled over by police may have been inspired by a recent television series about Ted Kaczynski, the "Unabomber." [907] The perpetrator had sent five package bombs in the Austin area, killing two people and injuring five others during a three week period in March 2018.

On Halloween night in 2018 police in France arrested over 100 masked people for rioting and threatening locals after word spread through social media calling for a "Purge," referring to the 2013 horror film of the same name which depicts the American government allowing all crimes, including murder, to be perfectly legal for one night a year. [908]

Similar "Purge" threats have gone viral through social media in the United States claiming such uprisings would occur in various communities on specific dates, thankfully turning out to be hoaxes posted by troublesome teenagers. [909] But the inspiration for the threats of indiscriminate killing for "fun" were obviously inspired by the film.

Following the 1996 release of Scream there were also numerous murders and attempted murders by people inspired by the teen slasher film, several of which actually involved the famous Ghostface mask that the killer used in the movie. [910] Two days after watching Interview with the Vampire when it first came out in 1994, a man told his girlfriend "I'm going to kill you and drink your blood," and proceeded to stab her seven times and did indeed drink her blood. She miraculously survived, and when he was arrested the “vampire” admitted to police he was inspired by the film starring Tom Cruise and Brad Pitt. [911]

Rap Videos Nothing promotes violence and crime more than rap music. Listeners internalize the lyrics which are presented from a first-person perspective, putting them in the proverbial driver’s seat of countless drive-by shootings and other mayhem which is portrayed as exciting and fun.

It would be impossible to know how many seeds have been planted in the minds of thugs who become accustomed to crime and whose music choices reflect back to them a distorted world where they are a hero for the lifestyle they chose. Many former gang members have admitted that the music helped to “brainwash” them. [912] And numerous studies have connected rap music to real world violence. [913]

It’s common for rappers to include a line in their songs about doing a “187 on a cop,” which is a police code for murder. Countless rappers from Snoop Dogg and NWA, to Eminem and Tekashi 6ix9ine have entire songs about murdering people. Just two weeks after the Sandy Hook Elementary School massacre, where twenty children and six adults were gunned down by 20-year-old lunatic Adam Lanza, stunning the entire country, a popular rapper who goes by “The Game” released a song titled “Dead People” which is about him stalking and murdering people for fun. [914]

A 17-year-old acting out the music video “Bustin’ At ‘Em” from rapper Waka Flocka Flame accidentally shot and killed his friend while he was waving a gun around. [915] The lyrics go “Shoot first ask questions last. That’s how these so called gangstas last. Bitch I’m bustin’ at ‘em (shooting). Ain’t no talkin’ homie I’m just bustin’ at ‘em. Bitch I’m bustin’ at ‘em.” In the music video Waka Flocka Flame and his thug friends are waving guns around shooting them in all directions the entire time.

After a man in Hawaii shot and killed his landlord, he claimed he was possessed by rapper Jay Z and said that he should be the one who goes to prison. [916] In a certain sense the man was possessed by Jay Z, since the rapper’s murderous lyrics filled his head. In his mind he just did what he thought Jay Z would have done. Jay Z has called for George Zimmerman, the man who shot Trayvon Martin in self-defense, to be killed, and has numerous songs about murdering people. [917]

Thousands of years ago philosophers like Plato, Aristotle, and Socrates understood the influence that music has on its listeners. Aristotle recognized that music can even shape people’s character, saying, “Music directly represents the passions of the soul. If one listens to the wrong kind of music, he will become the wrong kind of person.” [918]

Bobo Doll Experiment A famous study conducted in the early 1960s known as the Bobo Doll Experiment demonstrated how children often mimic violent behaviors they see others engaging in. Researchers monitored the children in a playroom filled with a variety of toys including a bobo doll, a sort of inflatable punching bag with a weighted bottom that stands on the ground—and when punched, returns to its upright position.

Even though the bobo doll was in the room and available for the children to play with, they mostly ignored it at first, but after witnessing an adult punching the toy, they began doing the same thing, imitating their actions shortly after they had left the room. [919] The experiment clearly demonstrates the fundamentals of social learning theory and observational learning because the children’s behavior immediately changed from simply witnessing the adults interact with the doll in a “violent” manner, or as the saying goes—monkey see, monkey do.

And just like children mimicked the actions they saw against the bobo doll, they also mimic behaviors they see in the media. A Senate Committee was formed in 1999 to investigate the influence of media violence on children and concluded that one of the primary catalysts of youth violence is media violence. [920]

The word cause may be too strong of a word, and to more accurately describe the relationship between viewing violence and engaging in violent acts, media effects researchers often use the word prime , instead—meaning viewing violence primes people to potentially act out similar behaviors. [921]

One popular textbook, The Fundamentals of Media Effects , explains, “Media message content triggers concepts, thoughts, learning, or knowledge acquired in the past that are related to the message content. In this way, message content is connected, associated, or reinforced by related thoughts and concepts that it brings to mind.” [922]

There are numerous variables that function as catalysts for priming aggressive or violent behaviors in viewers, such as the extent they identify with a character engaging in violence, the consequences the character faces for such behavior, and the perceived justification for it, or meaning of the violence. [923]

Media mogul Ted Turner knew this, as do most people with common sense. Best known for founding CNN in 1980, he once noted, “You know that everything we’re exposed to, influences us…those violent films influence us, and the TV programs we see influence us. The weaker your family is, the more they influence you. The problems with families in our societies are catastrophic, but when you put violent programs before people who haven’t had a lot of love in their lives, who are angry anyway, it is like pouring gasoline on the fire.” [924]

Author's Note: Once you finish this book, please take a moment to rate and review it on Amazon.com, or wherever you purchased it from if you're reading the e-book, to let others know what you think. This also helps to offset the trolls who keep giving my books fake one-star reviews when they haven't even read them.

Trolls often target books on Amazon written by people they don't like and flood them with fake one-star reviews in order to tank the ratings and hope to dissuade people from reading them. It's a dirty tactic they've used on my other books. If you look close, you can see that practically none of the one-star reviews are from actual verified purchases which is a clear indication they are fraudulent.

Also, please spread the word about this book by posting a link to the Amazon listing on your social media accounts, or order a few extra copies for family and friends. I don't have a large publisher behind me to promote the book since I self published it; all I have is word of mouth, social media, and you.

Thank you!

Conclusion There’s a famous quote attributed to Eleanor Roosevelt that says, “Great minds discuss ideas; average minds discuss events; small minds discuss people.” The moronic masses are concerned about who their favorite celebrities are dating, which rappers are having a new beef, or the latest actor found to have said something “racist” years (or decades) ago, while life is passing them by. It’s a circus, and as media analyst Neil Postman noted, people are amusing themselves to death.

Everything is backwards and upside down in Los Angeles, even the city's name. "Los Angeles" is Spanish for the City of Angels, when it's really a city of demons. Hollywood is the "city of dreams" they say, but it's really the city of broken dreams. Cute girls from across the country move to LA thinking they're going to be the next Kim Kardashian or Jennifer Lawrence only to realize that they're just one of tens of thousands of other girls equally as beautiful who are all competing for the same prize.

After a string of dead end auditions or maybe landing a few bit parts in b-movies that are never released in theaters, most girls eventually give up or turn to drugs hoping to numb the increasing depression they feel from not seeing their dreams materialize as they are faced with the harsh reality of the entertainment industry.

The supposed sunny blue skies of Los Angeles are filled with toxic smog from the overcrowded freeways. Many of the people driving fancy cars and renting nice houses are often living paycheck to paycheck and have no money saved for retirement and spend most of what they earn trying to portray an image of a person they're not, living further beyond their means every day.

Almost everything is fake in Los Angeles. The LA River is made of concrete. The city's basketball team is called the Lakers, but most of the lakes are man-made. Most people think the Hollywood Walk of Fame is a beautiful place symbolic of the glitz and glam they see on the award shows, but in reality it's a dirty street filled with homeless people and beggars.

Los Angeles is widely considered to be one of the loneliest cities in America because so many people living there have few (or no) close friends they can confide in or trust. Many residents don't even make eye contact with their neighbors when out to check the mail, they just ignore them and pretend they don't exist. It's a strange and sad city.

Unfortunately, much of our country is now afflicted with the same kinds of sentiments. The American empire will most likely collapse someday just as ancient Rome did. The United States has too much debt, there is no sense of community throughout much of the country anymore, national pride has been undermined by floods of immigrants who won't assimilate and are openly hostile to our culture, customs, and history—and now even many millions of native-born Americans hate our country as a result of the Marxist indoctrination they've been inundated with.

Open hatred of America by enemies within has never been more widespread, and they are determined to overthrow our Republic and put an end to our Constitutionally protected freedoms.

Child drag queens are being celebrated by major media outlets, celebrities are bragging about their abortions, work ethic is dwindling, calls for socialism are spreading, and people can't decide which one of the fifty-eight different "genders" they are. The angry and ignorant masses want to seize financial assets through force from those who have worked hard and saved their money for decades instead of steadily pissing it away on things they don't need.

But we do need entertainment (in moderation). It's important to relax your mind at the end of the day or get a little distracted after a long week, so what should we do? What can you show your kids without having them indoctrinated with the idiocy and enemy propaganda that surrounds us? Fortunately, there are limitless choices of quality entertainment if you just take the time to look.

There are science shows, cooking shows, how-to videos, and plenty of family friendly entertainment available—not to mention good old-fashioned books like the one in your hands. Aside from quality non-fiction books that can educate while they entertain, there are also countless literarily classics that will take your mind on a journey to faraway lands, all from the comfort of your own home.

But it's critical to do a regular digital detox, especially on the weekends, and tune out the endless distractions competing for your attention on television and smartphones. Spend time with family and friends, having face to face interactions, not artificial ones by "liking" their Facebook posts or communicating through social media.

It's important to limit social media consumption because by design it's addictive due to the endless feedback and dopamine boosts people get from "likes" retweets, comments, and follows. Stories on social media are hard to resist because they personalize incidents that happen across the country in cities and states you'll never step foot in, but the viral videos and photos open a window to an artificial world you have no business being in.

It's also dangerous because lies spread through social media at the speed of light, racking up tens of thousands of retweets and "shares" within minutes. By censoring opposing voices, manipulating trending topics, and major celebrities constantly jumping on the bandwagon for liberal causes, the Big Tech companies create the false appearance of a consensus around issues. Many are afraid to stand up against it out of concern they may catch the attention of the angry online mobs who will harass them, dox them, and do everything in their power to destroy them.

All of this leads many to wonder—what is wrong with liberals? Why do they always seem like they have no sense of right and wrong, almost like they have no soul? Researchers at Virginia Tech discovered that people can be identified as either liberal or conservative by a simple fMRI (Functional MRI) scan of their brain.

They found that when they show people images of disgusting things like a dead animal or food covered with maggots, they could predict with a 95% accuracy rate whether the person was a liberal or a conservative based solely on brain scans which showed how people's brain activity reacted to seeing such things. [926]

How is this possible? What they found was that the brains of liberals don't show the same signals of being disgusted when shown the disgusting images. It was a discovery made by accident, but it has an enormous significance. What it means is, the further Left someone is on the political spectrum, the higher their tolerance is for abnormal (and horrifying) things. It makes perfect sense when put into perspective.

They're the ones who accept and embrace the most bizarre, unhealthy, and disgusting behaviors and lifestyles. So when shown images of disgusting things, their brain scans show little reaction, when a normal person should be repulsed. The researchers who conducted the experiments appear to be afraid to explain why liberals aren't disgusted by disgusting things, but the answer is clear. The Bible calls this the reprobate mind. [927]

The Bible also predicted, "There will be terrible times in the last days. People will be lovers of themselves, lovers of money, boastful, proud, abusive, disobedient to their parents, ungrateful, unholy, without love, unforgiving, slanderous, without self-control, brutal, not lovers of the good, treacherous, rash, conceited, lovers of pleasure rather than lovers of God—having a form of godliness but denying its power. Have nothing to do with such people." [928]

The fact that you read this book shows where your heart and mind is, and while we may be a minority, there are many millions of us who see the principalities and powers that oppose us and refuse to go along with their agenda or submit to their demands. We know the truth, and the truth has set us free!

Introduction

Today, “media” doesn’t just mean television, radio, newspapers, and magazines; since all of those industries have been swallowed up by the Internet (convergence as it’s technically called). As you know, people now get most of their news and entertainment online where there is an endless supply of things to click on, scroll through, and stream. People carry TVs in their pockets and wear them on their wrists like the old science fiction films predicted. With the push of a button anyone can watch almost any show, access any newspaper or magazine article, and even send instant feedback about what they think. Everywhere you go people are constantly glued to their device, consuming an endless stream of “media.” It’s like a madhouse that’s almost impossible to escape.

In our current mobile age, trying to keep up with the news is like running on a treadmill that’s getting faster and faster. The longer you’re on it, the more exhausting it gets, leading many to become so fatigued they decide to jump off and quit paying attention altogether. Many have become so stressed out, disgusted, and tired of the “news,” that they basically boycott it and only follow sports or other forms of entertainment, but even there they can’t escape being bombarded by political messages and cries for “social justice.”

Those who wish to push political agendas know that movies, music, and TV shows are convenient vehicles to deliver their propaganda to millions under the cloak of “entertainment.” Even some sports coverage on ESPN has become political in recent years, amplifying the messages of athletes involved in fringe causes or ones based on half-truths and out-right lies. [1]

Music, movies, and television shows are not just “entertainment.” They shape and influence the culture by manufacturing iconic characters whose beliefs and behaviors are mimicked by millions. While art imitates life, life also imitates art, as President Obama admitted during an appearance via video at the 2015 Grammies where he told the audience, “Tonight, we celebrate artists whose music and message helps shape our culture…Artists have a unique power to change minds and attitudes and get us thinking and talking about what matters.” [2] Celebrities have largely taken over the role that families, the Church, and national traditions used to play in molding and monitoring a society’s attitudes and actions.

As Andrew Breitbart pointed out in his book Righteous Indignation , "Hollywood is more important than Washington. It can't be overstated how important this message is: pop culture matters. What happens in front of the cameras on a soundstage at the Warner Bros. lot often makes more difference to the fate of America than what happens in the back rooms of the Rayburn House Office Building on Capitol Hill." [3]

He continues, "As it stands, the Frankfurt School-taught Left is fighting the political battle on both the political and the cultural battlefields. Conservatives are fighting it only on the political battlefield. That means that art, humor, song, theater, television, film, dance, are all devices used every day in order to influence the hearts and minds of the American people." [4]

He's talking about Cultural Marxism, which is the practice of waging a psychological war against America and all of Western civilization by relentlessly attacking every aspect of our culture, symbols, and institutions; hoping to gradually weaken society by subverting its foundations to the point where it becomes so dysfunctional it can be overthrown and replaced by a Marxist State.

To accomplish this, the supposed "news" media regularly engages in what's called Agenda Setting by hyping up certain stories and covering them ad nauseam to create the false impression that those stories are actually important because they're "what people are talking about." This provides a false justification for the extensive coverage, creating an artificial feedback loop where they hype up a story as if it's the talk of the town, and then everyone starts talking about it because they're inundated by reports about it, so the media keeps reporting on it, claiming that it's a relevant story because so many people are talking about it.

They carefully choose stories, oftentimes of rare and isolated incidences, and then amplify them hoping to give the impression that there's an epidemic and use the cherry-picked examples to promote or reinforce liberal ideologies. At the same time they act as gatekeepers, purposefully omitting other (actually important) stories and events which show a side of an issue they're hoping people don't hear about, or are trying to downplay the significance of.

The Liberal Media Industrial Complex uses their technology to influence rather than inform; to attack instead of educate; to promote certain events while pretending others don't exist. They always amplify salacious allegations that feed into the one-sided narratives they're pushing, and then completely ignore the facts when they later come out if they prove the initial reports to be false. They just carry on as if nothing happened and keep repeating the same pattern like clockwork — amplifying the allegation, and then ignoring the outcome.

The election of President Trump has resulted in the American mainstream media throwing all objectivity out the window and dedicating their existence to painting him as a mentally deranged dictator who needs to be impeached and imprisoned. They've gotten so bold in their attempts to overthrow our Republic that they now regularly engage in gaslighting and continue to repeat easily debunked falsehoods as if they are true, hoping to get people to start doubting their own memory, reasoning, and perception about what is actually going on. This is what gaslighting is.

By repeatedly lying with confidence, using misdirection and discounting contrary information, the media causes some people to begin questioning their own version of reality. The term gaslighting originates from an old 1938 play (later made into a movie in 1944) where a central theme of the plot involves a woman's husband who subjects her to all kinds of mind games trying to drive her insane, including dimming the gas lamps in their home while convincing her that she's just imagining it's getting darker.

The media insists that the name George Soros is a code word for anti-Semitism, as are "globalists" and "Hollywood liberals." [5] The constant assertions that anyone who supports building a wall at the US-Mexico border is racist, and anyone who supports President Trump is a white supremacist are ridiculous, but are believed by gullible people who are susceptible to propaganda. Television "news" anchors lie with such assurance and being accompanied by symbols of authority like their fancy studios and graphics, on the surface it appears as if they're legitimate news broadcasts.

The 2016 presidential election proved that the balance of power had shifted from the tight-knit group of mainstream media companies into the hands of everyday Americans who used Facebook, Twitter, and YouTube to spread their messages to others, whether it was a few hundred of their Facebook friends, or an audience of millions if their posts went viral.

So in order to regain control of the flow of information, the legacy media conglomerates began working closely with the Silicon Valley titans to rewrite the algorithms so these popular platforms would favor their content above that posted by ordinary people or popular social media personalities. It's an understatement to say that what's happening is a conspiracy between various sectors of the media industry which are working together to give traditional outlets the loudest voices online.

Mix in Google and YouTube manipulating search results, Wikipedia being the number one source of "encyclopedia" articles, and social media companies systematically censoring prominent conservative accounts under the disguise of combating "hate speech," and you have a recipe for total information control. There is a reason that dictators throughout history have aimed to seize their country's media as one of their top priorities so they can use it to not only further their own aims, but prevent their opposition from using it for theirs.

Just two weeks after the shocking loss of Hillary Clinton to Donald Trump in the 2016 election, the war on "fake news" was launched as a smokescreen to suppress the reach of regular users' social media posts and artificially boost messages from the mainstream media. The Democrats became frantic about supposed "fake news" being shared on Facebook that they claimed had cast Hillary in a false light, and that was the reason they said, why so many people didn't trust her; and hence, didn't vote for her. [6]

While there were a few viral fake news stories smearing her, all the studies show they had no influence on people's votes and just reinforced beliefs they already held about her. [7] There were also fake stories about Donald Trump that went viral during the heat of the campaign, but that fact is ignored and the "fake news" problem was framed as an issue that's only one-sided.

In reality, the fake news scare was just an elaborate ruse to drastically alter the way social media functions by pressuring Big Tech companies to emphasize mainstream media outlets in people's feeds instead of showing organically what should be there based on who they were following and what was being posted. [8]

Barack Obama was the first "social media president," getting elected in 2008 when Facebook was first becoming a central hub in people's lives. He was the first president to have a Facebook page and a Twitter account, and his senior advisor David Axelrod admitted, "If not for social media, Barack Obama would never have been elected president [because] it gave us the ability to connect to a new generation of voters." [9]

At the time, social media was still kind of a novelty, but a few years later it would permeate most people's lives when everyone had to have an iPhone and the social media companies released mobile apps so people could "stay connected" wherever they were instead of having to wait until they got home from work or school to open up their laptop to see what's happening online.

But today, getting news online isn't just a novelty, it's the norm. A report from the Pew Research Center in 2018 showed that more Americans get their news from posts on social media than from newspapers.[10] Social media now starts revolutions, and overnight a single video clip can turn most of the world against a nation's leader, or galvanize members of an entire political party to rally behind a cause.

Since the barriers to entry are now so low today with anyone being able to start a YouTube channel or create a Facebook page, we are seeing the legacy media frantically trying to stop their industry (and their influence) from slipping through their fingers. Liberals' favorite tactic today is silencing their opposition under the disguise of combating "hate speech" or stopping "right-wing extremists," and the ability to censor and manipulate information online rests in the hands of just a few gigantic corporations whose values are completely opposed to middle America and traditional family values.

Because of the emergence of social media, billions of people around the world communicate through Facebook, Twitter, and other online platforms which have largely taken the place of sending emails and talking on the phone. As you know, these social media apps can allow anyone's message to be spread just as far as something broadcast on the national news, or printed on the front page of the New York Times , but because of this massive redistribution of power, the Liberal Media Industrial Complex is scrambling to put the genie back in the bottle.

One doesn't even have to be a "social media star" to be a victim of the Left's censorship because average users have their Facebook posts, tweets, Instagram pics, and YouTube videos removed all the time for "violating community standards."

Big Tech's increasingly sophisticated artificial intelligence systems automatically scan every post for key words they have identified as sexist, racist, homophobic, transphobic, Islamophobic, anti-Semitic, or just generically "hateful" or "offensive;" and has them removed once discovered. Just a handful of these "violations" and your entire account is shut down for good and everything you've ever posted there deleted. Nothing is out of the reach of their AI, and anything can be deleted at any moment by the nameless and faceless moderators, leaving the victims with no recourse or appeal.

Total control of information is what they want, and they have hijacked the technology we all use to communicate in our modern age, but thankfully you were able to get this powerful tool into your hands before they could stop it — an old fashioned book! I commend you for picking one up and tuning out the noise relentlessly trying to make its way to your ears, and turning away from the millions of tweets, Facebook posts, and video clips all competing for your attention.

In the coming pages we'll do a deep dive into each of the major social media platforms and I'll detail their algorithm manipulation, double standards, liberal bias, and censorship. We'll also dissect the media's war on President Trump, their mission to destroy our culture by undermining traditional family values, and we'll look at the future of fake news.

While scrolling through tweets and Facebook posts is often like junk food for the brain, reading a book is a healthy and nourishing four-course meal in comparison. Sure, junk food is fine in moderation, but if it's all you eat then you're going to be very unhealthy. And the difference between reading through social media feeds (or watching the news) and reading a book is about the same as the difference between a good steak and eating a burger at McDonalds. One is quick, cheap, and poor quality; while the other is expensive, time consuming to make, and healthy to eat. And since we're dealing with a very important subject, it's best to do this right. So let's begin by taking a look behind the curtain of the monolithic Liberal Media Industrial Complex and start dismantling it piece by piece.

Censorship

There are several classic books that highlight the dangers of censorship and depict tyrannical governments that use their endless power to snuff out any opposition in hopes of maintaining their control over society. George Orwell's Nineteen Eighty-Four , which was first published in 1949, and Fahrenheit 451 , published in 1953, are two of the most popular examples and weren't just written for entertainment. They were meant to serve as a warning of what giant bureaucracies could do if their growing power goes unchecked.

But today in America, it's not the government censoring what newspapers print or what airs on the evening news. It's the Silicon Valley titans — it's Mark Zuckerberg, Jack Dorsey, and Susan Wojcicki. In the marketplace of ideas they are losing, and so these industry leaders are silencing influential opponents who speak out against the Left's attempted revolution.

They're also trying to create a chilling effect by scaring people into not speaking out about certain issues or make us think twice before sharing certain information on social media out of fear we will be socially ostracized, or even fired from our job; so many people are self-censoring themselves in what's been called the "Spiral of Silence." [11] The fewer people who speak out about an issue due to fear of repercussions causes others who feel they should say something to be more apprehensive about doing so because nobody else seems to be doing it, which in turn causes even more people to stay silent, causing the false impression that no one seems to be opposed to what's happening.

Thankfully, in the United States (at least today) the First Amendment is still intact, but in places like Canada, [12] Germany, [13] England, [14] Scotland, [15] and other supposedly "free" countries, people are being arrested and charged with "hate speech" crimes for posting things on their social media accounts that are critical of the "Islamization of Europe" from the mass influx of Muslim refugees and for voicing opposition to the LGBT agenda. [16]

But while Americans are still technically free to say these things without getting arrested, there are other serious consequences since we're living in an online world where most people rely on a handful of apps to communicate with others. Back in 1997, Harvard Law professor Larry Lessig wrote an article for Wired magazine titled "Tyranny in the Infrastructure" warning that, "Laws affect the pace of technological change, but the structures of software can do even more to curtail freedom. In the long run the shackles built by programmers could well constrain us more." [17]

In his book Cyber Ethics: Morality and Law in Cyberspace , Richard A. Spinello expanded on this concern saying, "This notion that private code can be a more potent constraining force than public law has significant implications. The use of code as a surrogate for law may mean that certain public goods or moral values once protected by law will now be ignored or compromised by those who develop or utilize this code.” [18]

We’re seeing the very principle of free speech under attack like never before, with the Liberal Media Industrial Complex even claiming that freedom of speech is “dangerous” and saying that conservatives have “weaponized” the First Amendment. [19] There have always been restrictions on the First Amendment, for example you can’t yell fire in a crowded theater, and you can’t threaten to murder someone or encourage acts of terrorism; but today just insulting a person who believes there are 58 different gender identities or pointing out certain facts and statistics is considered “hateful” and “dangerous.”

Democrat Congressman Ted Lieu from California says he’s frustrated by the fact that the First Amendment is preventing him from silencing conservatives for Thought Crimes, so he’s calling on the Big Tech companies to do it on the government’s behalf. [20] Meanwhile Jerry Nadler, a Democrat Congressman from New York, says it’s just a “conspiracy theory” that the Big Tech companies have a liberal bias and, “The notion that social media companies are filtering out conservative voices is a hoax, a tired narrative of imagined victimhood.” [21] Other Democrat members of Congress, like Jamie Raskin from Maryland, insist that it is an “entirely imaginary narrative that social media companies are biased against conservatives.” [22]

Of course CNN repeatedly denies conservatives are being censored and claims that pushback from President Trump is, “exacerbating a longstanding paranoia from conservatives who have for years erroneously accused social media companies of bias and censorship.” [23] It’s just paranoia that conservatives are being censored, guys! Nothing to worry about!

CNN claims, “For years, the conservative media machine has pushed the flimsy narrative that conservatives are unfairly treated by social media companies, which they accuse of bias and censorship. When the claims often fall apart under a light touch of scrutiny, right-wing media outlets continue to advance the narrative, irrespective of the facts.” [24]

After years of mounting evidence, Twitter CEO Jack Dorsey finally admitted that even conservatives who work at Twitter, “don’t feel safe to express their opinions at the company” and that “They do feel silenced by just the general swirl of what they perceive to be the broader percentage of leanings within the company.” [25]

With each new purge of conservative voices from the social media platforms, more and more people are seeing just how big of a threat these tech giants are to the principles of free speech and the massive implications of their monopoly on communication tools.

Donald Trump Jr., who obviously has the president’s ear, has also been very vocal about the increasing censorship on social media, even writing an op-ed about it in The Hill , saying, “Our right to freely engage in public discourse through speech is under sustained attack, necessitating a vigorous defense against the major social media and internet platforms.” [26]

In May 2019, the White House set up a new tool on WhiteHouse.gov for people to report instances of social media bias and censorship so the Trump administration could put together more thorough reports of what conservatives are facing online. [27] The page includes a form for users to submit details about which post was taken down, what it said, and which platform removed it. “Social media platforms should advance freedom of speech. Yet too many Americans have seen their accounts suspended, banned, or fraudulently reported for unclear ‘violations’ of user policies,” the website reads. [28]

In subsequent chapters I’ll detail what’s been happening on each of the major social media platforms, but rampant censorship isn’t limited to just Facebook, Twitter, and YouTube.

Music Streaming Services

While politicians and news commentators have always had to watch what they say about certain subjects so they don’t get fired, artists have always been seen as the bastions of free speech, and censoring art—no matter how provocative or offensive it is to some people—was always seen as something only a tyrannical government would do. Major music labels and movie studios always stood by their artists and vigorously resisted calls for censorship, championing the freedom of expression whether it was NWA’s “Fuck the Police” or blasphemous anti-Christian films like The Da Vinci Code or Martin Scorsese’s The Last Temptation of Christ.

But in August 2017 Spotify, the popular music streaming service, announced they would start censoring songs from “hate bands” including songs they claim “incite violence against race, religion, [or] sexuality.” [29] How will they determine which bands and songs to censor? Whatever the Southern Poverty Law Center tells them to. [30] Not surprising, the SPLC got their tentacles wrapped around Spotify and other streaming services to “help” them keep a lookout for “hateful” content. [31]

Other streaming services like Apple and Pandora followed suit, banning supposed “white power” music, while allowing rap music that blatantly calls for the murder of police officers from people like Ice-T, NWA, and Snoop Dogg, who recently depicted himself murdering President Trump in one of his music videos. [32] As you know, it’s common for rappers to diss “crackers” and “white boys” in their music, but that’s just fine. Hating white people isn’t considered to be racist to the Left. And Jay Z’s albums are okay, despite calling women “bitches” in (literally) 50% of his songs. [33]

About a year later Spotify announced another new policy, saying they were going to start banning songs from artists who have engaged in “harmful or hateful conduct” in their personal lives, like domestic violence or sexual abuse. That put songs by R. Kelly and Michael Jackson at risk of not being available anymore. But then just three weeks later they reversed their decision and apologized, saying they don’t want to be the “moral police,” but affirmed that they were still going to be censoring “hate speech.” [34]

Guns ‘N Roses song “One in a Million,” which was released on their 1988 album G N’ R Lies, includes a line about “immigrants and faggots” but when the studio released the Guns ’N Roses box set in 2018 they didn’t include that song on the album because it’s been deemed “racist” and “homophobic.” [35]

It’s probably only a matter of time before other songs like Aerosmith’s “Dude Looks Like a Lady” will be banned for being “transphobic” as well. Once you give liberals an inch, they demand a mile, and since they smell blood in the water they will continue their quest to eliminate everything they find offensive.

Netflix and Prime Video

Even movie streaming services like Netflix and Amazon’s Prime Video are showing signs of liberal bias and censoring “controversial content” that had once been available on the platforms for years. Netflix won’t allow The Red Pill , a popular documentary about the Men’s Rights Movement produced by Cassie Jaye, to be streamed. Through the course of producing the film she found that claims about the "patriarchy" and supposed "male power" were extremely warped and that many of the burdens men typically bear in society are overlooked and often discounted by feminists. [36]

Cassie Jaye herself was a feminist when she started making the film and expected to find the Men's Rights Movement would be full of misogynists and losers who had no luck with women, but learned they have very legitimate points about gender roles and unfair treatment in child custody cases, and by the end of the film she admitted they weren't a bunch of women-haters as she had previously thought, and decided that she could no longer call herself a feminist because "feminism is not the road to gender equality." [37]

When the trailer was released on YouTube it reached over a million views in 24 hours and was the number one purchased movie on YouTube (which streams movies on-demand for 4 or 5 dollars) beating Guardians of the Galaxy and Rogue One: A Star Wars Story. [38] But Netflix wouldn't allow the film to be streamed on their platform because when it was released in selected theaters it had generated some negative publicity from feminists protesting it, calling it "misogynistic propaganda." [39]

In March 2019 Democrat Congressman Adam Schiff sent a letter to Amazon CEO Jeff Bezos pressuring him to censor "anti-vaccination" documentaries from Amazon Prime after seeing a report on CNN claiming that "Anti-vaccination conspiracy theories thrive on Amazon." [40] Within hours of Schiff sending his letter, the streaming service pulled at least five documentaries including the popular Vaxxed: From Cover-Up to Catastrophe , [41] which had been promoted by Robert De Niro when it first came out because one of his children is autistic which he suspects may have been caused by the MMR vaccines. [42]

Others included: We Don't Vaccinate!;" Shoot 'Em Up: The Truth About Vaccines , The Greater Good ; and Man Made Epidemic , which investigated the alleged connections between the autism epidemic and the preservative Thimerosal used in vaccines. Many have long suspected a link between Thimerosal and autism, including Robert F. Kennedy Jr., who has tried to bring awareness to the dangers of vaccines for years. [43]

CNN then celebrated the censorship with a follow-up story touting, "Anti-vaccine movies disappear from Amazon after CNN Business report." [44] During a segment on CNN in 2009 Dr. Oz was talking with host Campbell Brown about the H1N1 (swine flu) vaccines, encouraging people to get them, but was put on the spot by the host about her concerns that they may not be safe. He responded, "I'm going to get it, if that helps at all, but I'll tell you my wife is not going to immunize our kids. Cuz I've got four of them and when I go home I'm not Dr. Oz, I'm Mr. Oz." [45]

So he went on television encouraging people to take the vaccine and give it to their children, but admitted that he's not going to give it to his own children because his wife didn't think it was safe; and despite him being a famous doctor, he couldn't convince her otherwise and allowed his children to go unvaccinated.

Netflix also censored an episode of comedian Hasan Minhaj's show, blocking it for customers in Saudi Arabia at the request of the government there because in it he talked about Saudi Arabia's role in the 9/11 attacks and the murder of Washington Post columnist Jamal Khashoggi at the hands of Saudis. [46]

Netflix will not stream the 1980s classic Dukes of Hazzard because that's too "racist" today. Reruns of the show were pulled from TV Land and other cable networks in 2015 after growing sentiment that the Confederate Flag is a "white supremacist" symbol, and since the Duke boys' car (The General Lee) has one painted on the roof, networks now deem the TV show too offensive to air. [47] Other classic TV shows and movies will likely slowly and quietly disappear from the streaming services and cable TV because they're deemed too "insensitive" for our modern age. Owning DVDs may be the only way to ever see them again.

A growing number of activists are upset about Ace Ventura: Pet Detective for what they call its "contempt" for LGBT people because the main suspect in the movie later started living as a woman and after catching him and realizing this, Jim Carrey goes into convulsions vomiting while having flashbacks to when "she" had kissed him earlier in the film. Or other comedies like Mrs. Doubtfire or Tyler Perry's "Medea" character may be banned for being "transphobic" as well. Or films like Idiocracy , The Breakfast Club , or Bill and Ted's Excellent Adventure because characters call people fags. Or maybe even The Sand Lot since one boy tells another that he plays baseball like a girl. That's sexist!

In 2018, Barack and Michelle Obama signed a deal with Netflix to produce several documentaries, scripted series, and full-length feature films through a production company they started called Higher Ground. [48] "Touching on issues of race and class, democracy and civil rights, and much more, we believe each of these productions won't just entertain, but will educate, connect and inspire us all," said Barack. [49]

The couple's debut documentary American Factory was hailed as their "first big anti-Trump statement of 2020" by Politico, although it didn't mention him by name "it's message is clear." [50] Others called it "lefty propaganda" and an attack on Trump. [51]

Netflix has also produced various liberal "comedy" shows called Netflix Originals which have included hosts like skank Chelsea Handler, Michelle Wolf, and other insufferable and non-funny Leftists. Similarly, Hulu produced a show hosted by Sarah Silverman called “I Love You America” which got canceled after two seasons, calling into question the streaming services ability to tap into the late-night talk show genre. [52] They also produced a documentary following the Congressional campaign of Alexandria Ocasio-Cortez.

After Georgia’s controversial “heartbeat” abortion bill was signed by the governor in May 2019 which bans abortions after six weeks into the pregnancy, Netflix announced they may quit using the state as a production location because several of their shows like “Stranger Things” and “Ozark” are shot there. They even vowed to help fight the bill in court. [53] It certainly is strange for a major corporation to take a stance on abortion, but that’s where we’re at.

Amazon Banning Books

Banning books was once seen as the ultimate sin, and something only the Nazis would do, but today we’re seeing a growing number of books disappearing down the memory hole in the name of political correctness and stopping “hate speech.” 65% of all books are sold through Amazon and they have a virtual monopoly over the entire industry. [54] They are the reason Borders, Walden Books, and B. Dalton went out of business. Amazon advertises themselves as the world’s largest bookstore where you can find practically any book, new or used, since if they don’t stock it, they (supposedly) allow anyone to list used copies for sale themselves.

For over twenty years since Amazon was launched in 1995 they would sell any book new or used, but recently that all changed. In July 2018 a children’s book titled No Dress for Timmy was banned for being “transphobic.” It was written by Shefflorn Ballantyne and is described as, “A story of a little boy who found himself in a perplexing situation where he was forced to choose between speaking the truth and cheering on a friend who thinks of himself as a girl." [55] The young protagonist basically wouldn't support a transgender classmate.

After an LGBT advocacy organization called Family Rhetoric discovered it when searching for LGBT-themed children books, they launched a campaign to pressure Amazon to ban the book, which they did. The group later celebrated on their Facebook page saying, "We did it. You did it friends! The link to No Dress for Timmy is not working. Amazon took down the book. It's gone!" [56] And indeed it is.

Amazon banned almost all of pickup artist Roosh V's books just days after his latest one was released, titled Game: How to Meet, Attract, and Date Attractive Women. [57] They wouldn't even give him a reason, just that they "violated" their policy and "can't offer any additional insight or action on this matter." [58] Roosh had come to the attention of various radical feminist groups who see him as a huge "misogynist" for his views on women and feminism, and they most likely lobbied Amazon to pull his books.

Juanita Broaddrick's book about Bill Clinton allegedly raping her was removed in June 2018, and then later restored. [59] It appears that Amazon keeps testing how far they can push the envelope by gauging the backlash, but not everyone is so lucky to have their books re-listed after media reports denounce the censorship.

In August 2018 Amazon banned a book that contained plans to build a 3D printed gun called The Liberator Code Book: An Exercise in Freedom of Speech , which had been listed by the publisher just a few weeks earlier. An Amazon spokesperson said it violated their guidelines. [60] Yet they sell the Anarchist's Cookbook and other bomb-making manuals (at least at the time this book was first published in November 2019). The Anarchist's

Cookbook author William Powell later denounced his terrorist manual which he wrote in 1971 when he was just nineteen-years-old. [61] But he does not own the rights to the book; the publisher does (now Ozark Press), which keeps it in print, and which Amazon still sells. [62]

The Columbine school shooters, who planted bombs in the school aside from shooting and killing twelve students and one teacher, owned a copy of the Anarchist's Cookbook and used it to manufacture their bombs. [63] When members of the Black Liberation Army were arrested in the 1970s for murdering several police officers, they had a copy in their possession and are believed to have planted a bomb in a San Francisco church during the funeral of a police officer who died in the line of duty. [64]

Thomas Eugene Spinks, who bombed ten abortion clinics in the 1980s, used the Anarchist Cookbook to build his bombs. [65] Many others have used it as well, including Timothy McVeigh, who carried out the 1995 Oklahoma City bombing, and the radical Islamic terrorists who committed the July 2005 bombings on the London public transportation system used the book as their instruction manual too. So No Dress for Timmy is too "transphobic" to be sold, but a literal bomb-making manual used by terrorists in numerous high-profile bombings is okay.

Jared Taylor, a leader in the white identitarian [pro-white] community, had several of his books censored from Amazon in February 2019, including White Identity , despite having been sold on the site since 2011. [66] The following month Tommy Robinson's book Mohammed's Koran was banned from Amazon just days after Facebook and Instagram banned him (in response to Tommy posting a documentary critical of the BBC on his YouTube channel). [67] His book was deemed "Islamophobic." [68]

Then in March 2019 they banned David Duke's autobiography My Awakening and another one of his books titled Jewish Supremacism where he details what he believes is a Jewish supremacist belief system within Judaism. [69] The books had been available on Amazon since they first came out, one in 1998, and the other in 2004, but were removed shortly after a no-name freelance writer "inquired" about why Amazon was selling books written by a "white supremacist." [70] They're not just shown as out of stock or unavailable; the entire listings for the books have been deleted, and it appears Amazon is also prohibiting any 3rd party sellers from listing used copies as well.

They also banned several books published by the Nation of Islam which were critical of Jews, [71] as well as a few written by Christian pastor Texe Marrs, including Holy Serpent of the Jews , for being "anti-semitic." [72] This is especially interesting because Amazon still sells Adolf Hitler's Mein Kampf (for now). [73]

After CNN successfully pressured Amazon to censor various popular documentary films from their Prime Video streaming service in March 2019 that question the safety of some vaccines, they went on to lament that Amazon still sold "anti-vaccine" books, saying, "while some anti-vaccine videos are gone from the Prime streaming service, a number of anti-vaccine books were still available for purchase on Amazon.com when CNN Business reviewed search results on Friday afternoon, and some were still being offered for free to Kindle Unlimited subscribers." [74] Amazon soon banned several "anti-vax" books for promoting what they called "vaccine misinformation." [75]

In July 2019 they banned books by Dr. Joseph Nicolosi, who is best known for advocating conversion therapy for homosexuals. Two of his most popular books on the subject, Healing Homosexuality and A Parent's Guide to Preventing Homosexuality were taken down after sustained pressure from LGBT activists. [76] Perhaps Amazon will ban some of Sigmund

Freud's books next because he believed that homosexuality was caused by a disruption in a child's development due to a dysfunctional relationship with their parents in terms of the role those parents fill in their lives. [77]

For several years now Amazon has banned sales of all Confederate flags because they're considered to be symbols of "white supremacy" these days. [78] They have also banned the sale of various Halloween costumes liberals consider to be offensive, like the "Tranny Granny" costume that's "transphobic," [79] a Chinese dress for being "cultural appropriation," and a "sexy burka" costume for being disrespectful to Islam. In January 2019 Amazon removed dozens of other products that were said to be offensive to Muslims as well. [80]

Meanwhile, an album by a band called Marduk titled "Fuck Me Jesus" is allowed, which shows a naked woman using a crucifix as a dildo on the cover. [81] Amazon also sells a song titled "Fuck White People" which has a noose on the album cover. [82] They also stock various black supremacist books that promote hate groups like the Black Hebrew Israelites.

Twitch.TV

Twitch.TV (which is owned by Amazon) is a website where people livestream themselves playing video games (I know this seems strange to anyone over 40) and they can have a large number of viewers who enjoy watching them play. Like YouTube livestreams, there is a chat box on Twitch where viewers can post comments and even tip the player.

While it's mostly for video games, sometimes the gamers will talk politics during their streams, and the Thought Police are watching in case they say something "racist," "sexist," "homophobic," etc., etc. One gamer was recently banned from Twitch for simply saying there are only two genders. [83] The email informing her of the ban read, "Your recent behavior has proven your lack of understanding of what hateful speech is and how it may affect your community on your channel…Several of your statements have been found offensive towards the transgender community, and we don't tolerate this kind of behavior." [84]

In a YouTube video discussing the ban she said, "I specifically said, it's okay if a man wants to be a woman, and a woman wants to be a man, you cannot be anything in between," referring to the odd "gender fluid," "pan gender," and the dozens of other "genders" liberals have invented.

A popular DJ named Deadmouse (stylized Deadmau5), who also streamed on Twitch for fun was banned for "hate speech" after he called another streamer a dreaded "homophobic slur." He issued a statement saying, "It was intended to insult a fuckin asshat who was being a fucking asshat…it wasn't 'directed at an entire group of people who have a sexual orientation that differs from my own.' Fuck off with that shit. I know who I am, and I don't have to fucking sit here and cry and defend my fucking self with the obligatory 'I'M NOT THAT PERSON, I AM SORRY" reflex… The sane people who knew what it was in the heat of the moment knew the purpose of the statement, and the people that think otherwise, I'm better off not even fucking knowing and they can just keep the fuck clear of me." [85]

It was great to see someone of his celebrity push back against this PC nonsense, but he soon backtracked and issued an apology, along with apologizing for his previous "non-apology" in response to the ban, saying, "I know what I said was wrong, and my hastily composed non-apology was an insult to injury." [86]

Many other Twitch streamers have had their accounts suspended and banned for just uttering what moderators thought were "slurs" out loud in a fit of anger when something went wrong on the game they're playing when they actually said something that just sounded similar to one. [87] So even while players are virtually “mass murdering” people in a video game, the Thought Police are carefully monitoring them to make sure their off-the-cuff commentary doesn’t happen to offend someone in the LGBTQ community or other “protected group.” One streamer was even given a 30-day suspension for calling another player a “mongoloid,” because Twitch considers that “hate speech” too. [88]

Like YouTube and Facebook Live, Twitch uses real-time voice recognition systems to analyze what people are saying in order to lookout for any words that are flagged as being inappropriate. Monitoring livestreams using AI is one of the top priorities of the tech companies due to the bad press they get when someone livestreams something completely ridiculous (or criminal) so they are putting enormous resources into being able to detect what is being said in real-time, and even what is being shown so they can take down a stream if their algorithm deems the broadcast includes anything “inappropriate.” Twitch, however, like all the other major platforms turns a blind eye when liberals flagrantly violate their rules.

A popular streamer who goes by “Destiny” (real name Steven Kenneth Bonnell II) has explicitly called for violence against conservatives on at least one occasion. When he was asked during a stream, “You genuinely do hate conservatives, don’t you?” he answered, “Very much so. I’ve moved full-on to the political violence level or the real violence level when it comes to conservative people. I feel like they need to be fucking excised from my fucking country. I think they’re demonstrably evil people.” [89] He remains on the platform and his channel is still monetized.

Alex Jones “Unpersoned”

One of the scariest aspects of censorship isn’t a few songs, movies, or books disappearing from the Internet, but a person being deleted. An “Unperson” is a term from George Orwell’s Nineteen Eighty-Four that describes someone whose very existence has been erased from society, and this basically happened to radio talk show host Alex Jones in August 2018.

Within the course of just a few days he was banned from YouTube, Facebook, iTunes, the TuneIn radio app, Spotify, Stitcher, Pinterest, and even LinkedIn! Years of archived shows and interviews just disappeared. PayPal also closed his account, preventing his website Infowars.com from accepting payments through the service, [90] and numerous credit card processors also refused to allow him to have an account, making it difficult to accept debit and credit cards for the products he sells.

Liberals were thrilled with the actions, including Democrat Senator Chris Murphy from Connecticut who said, “Infowars is the tip of a giant iceberg of hate and lies that uses sites like Facebook and YouTube to tear our nation apart. These companies must do more than take down one website. The survival of our democracy depends on it.” [91]

Many conservatives, even those who think Alex Jones is a raving lunatic, were quite concerned about his sudden “disappearance” from the Internet. Even Senator Ted Cruz defended Alex, tweeting, “Am no fan of Jones — among other things he has a habit of repeatedly slandering my Dad by falsely and absurdly accusing him of killing JFK — but who the hell made Facebook the arbiter of political speech? Free speech includes views you disagree with.” [92]

Others came to his defense as well, including Bill Maher who said despite Jones telling “lies” about him, “if you’re a liberal, you’re supposed to be for free speech. That’s free speech for the speech you hate. That’s what free speech means. We’re losing the thread of the concepts that are important to this country. You care about the real American shit or you don’t. And if you do, it goes for every side. I don’t like Alex Jones, but Alex Jones gets to speak. Everybody gets to speak.” [93]

The ACLU [American Civil Liberties Union] even warned his ban could set a dangerous precedent and expressed concerns that the pendulum could swing the other way some day, and groups like Black Lives Matter could be shut down under the same pretense. [94]

President Trump appeared to reference the unpersoning of Alex Jones which had made national headlines, saying, “I won’t mention any names but when they take certain people off of Twitter or Facebook and they’re making that decision, that is really a dangerous thing because that could be you tomorrow.” [95]

Alex Jones Was Just the Beginning

Many people who were quite concerned about Alex Jones getting unpersoned overnight were afraid to speak out against it because they didn’t want to appear as if they supported Jones because of some of the outlandish things he has said over the years, but Big Tech coordinating with each other to ban him was just a test case and the beginning of what was to come.

The editor in chief of The Verge , one of Vox Media’s online properties, started calling for Fox News to be taken off the air next, saying, “I feel like we should be just as comfortable asking Comcast and Verizon and Charter why they continue to offer Fox News on their networks as we are about Facebook and Alex Jones.” [96]

Immediately after Jones was universally deplatformed PBS did a report about it and in that report complained that he had inspired countless “imitators” who “sell merchandise” and then showed a clip of me from one of my YouTube videos promoting my popular t-shirts.

Apple CEO Tim Cook then said it's a "sin" for social media platforms not to ban people the Left deems "hateful" and "divisive." He was given the first "Courage Against Hate Award" from the Jewish ADL, and during his acceptance speech said, "We only have one message for those who seek to push hate, division, and violence: You have no place on our platforms. You have no home here." [97] He went on to say, "and as we showed this year, we won't give a platform to violent conspiracy theorists on the app store," referring to banning Alex Jones. "Why? Because it's the right thing to do," Cook concluded. [98]

Even conservative darling Ben Shapiro is technically in violation of their terms of service for "hate speech" by saying transgenderism is a mental illness. [99] They could drop the hammer on anyone at anytime for things they've said years ago, and even "off platform," meaning things said in interviews or speeches that didn't even directly involve social media.

Just voting for Donald Trump is considered "hate speech" by the Silicon Valley titans, and it won't be long now before they include negative tone of voice, contorted facial expressions or even supposed "code words" and "dog whistles" into their terms of service as things that are not allowed.

For example, if someone is reporting on a new television commercial featuring two gay men who are raising a child they adopted and react with a disgusted look on their face, or a sarcastic, "I'm sure the child will grow up to be totally normal." That will likely be a violation of their policies. George Orwell even warned about such things in his classic novel Nineteen Eighty-Four , saying, "to wear an improper expression on your face (to look incredulous when a victory was announced, for example) was itself a punishable offense. There was even a word for it in Newspeak: facecrime, it was called." [100]

They’ll start claiming that certain words or phrases are “code words” for something else just like they’ve done with the “okay” hand sign, and soon nobody will be safe from being smeared as a “white supremacist,” “Islamophobe,” “homophobe,” “xenophobe,” etc.

The Left are now engaged in a Maoist-style attempted overthrow of our culture and our country, and are systematically purging influential dissenting voices from social media. Get ready, because this is just the beginning. They don’t just want prominent vocal opponents of the liberal agenda silenced; they want our lives destroyed.

Some people believe censorship amplifies extremism by forcing people to descend into the dark corners of the Internet where their ideas aren’t challenged or debunked by onlookers who disagree with them, and so they fester in an echo chamber that fuels and radicalizes them. Censoring someone who’s not calling for violence can also be seen as confirmation that they are being persecuted and cultivate a sense that they feel justified fighting back in a more extreme way. By having their voice taken away for what was perfectly legal speech, they may be compelled to act out in other ways in order to “be heard.”

The liberal Establishment is working tirelessly to take down any independent social media personalities who organically gain sizable followings, and if they’re truly independent, meaning not working for a major media outlet then they are extremely vulnerable because they don’t have a legal department behind them that can push back on their behalf. They have developed a formula to take us down. First, a few unscrupulous liberal online outlets like the Huffington Post, BuzzFeed, and Vox label certain conservatives “Alt-Right” or “right-wing extremists” and then the editors at Wikipedia update those people’s pages to claim they are a white nationalists or neo-Nazis and use those dubious reports as “sources” to solidify the smear.

And since Wikipedia is the go-to place for information for most people and one of the top search results on Google, anyone looking those people up from that point on will be presented with information claiming they’re a racist or far-right extremist. Then, even more outlets repeat the false claims, thus generating even more news articles from mainstream sources parroting the smear which are then used to add even more citations to the Wikipedia articles to reinforce their false narrative.

These liberal outlets know that most people don’t have the vast resources necessary to sue for defamation, and so they are forever branded a “racist.” Then the self-referencing Wikipedia page is used as the justification to demonetize their YouTube channels and suspend their PayPal accounts to cutoff their revenue streams in order to crush them into silence. In our current political climate, especially as the 2020 election is approaching, I wake up every morning wondering if today will be the day that it happens to me.

What’s Next?

How far will this fascism go? Will Visa, MasterCard, or American Express deactivate certain accounts because the banks don’t like what some people say or believe? Will Bank of America and Wells Fargo start closing people’s checking accounts because they don’t like their politics? Some banks are already doing just that. Chase Bank issued a letter to Proud Boys (a pro-Trump men’s fraternity) leader Enrique Tarrio that they would be closing his account and he had until the end of the month to move all his money somewhere else. [101] Then Joe Biggs, a former reporter for Infowars who banks at Chase, got the same notification. Others did as well, including

Martina Markota who works for the conservative news site Rebel Media. [102]

After word spread of the shocking move, outraging many veterans groups because Joe Biggs is an Iraq vet, Chase re-activated his account, but wouldn't give him a reason as to why they had initially banned him. [103] PayPal has already banned Alex Jones, Laura Loomer, Milo Yiannopoulous, Lauren Southern, Tommy Robinson, Gavin McInnes, Roosh V, Faith Goldy, as well as Twitter alternative Gab, and YouTube alternative BitChute because they support free speech and won't ban users for posting things that hurt others feelings. [104]

A senior software engineer at Google recommended the company delete Donald Trump's G-mail account, and that of everyone working in his administration. He even suggested they "brick" Donald Trump's cell phone. [105] A "bricked" phone, if you're not familiar with the term, means one that is completely deactivated and won't even turn on. So the engineer was literally recommending Google remotely disable Donald Trump's phone, since they are the owners of the Android operating system which it uses.

We only know about this because the proposal was included in a series of documents obtained as part of a lawsuit filed by former Google employee James Damore who was fired after circulating a memo explaining how the company's obsession with "diversity" is misguided.

While the company didn't authorize those radical actions, who's to say in the future they (or Apple) won't ban certain people from using their phones? When you activate a smartphone you "agree" to the terms and conditions, even though hardly anyone actually reads them. Those terms also say the manufacturer can change the terms at any time, so what's to stop them from adding a clause that says they reserve the right to brick your phone (or computer) if they feel you're engaging in certain kinds of behavior or speech that they find objectionable? Perhaps Google didn't want the publicity and the backlash of sabotaging the President of the United States' cellphone, but what's to stop them from doing it to people who aren't as powerful or well known?

How far will the Silicon Valley titans go to stamp out vocal critics of the radical Leftists' agenda? Will video editing software companies deactivate their software on people's computers if they don't like the content people are creating? Will Photoshop not sell their software to artists who are making the "wrong" kind of memes? Or will Microsoft and Apple refuse to license their operating systems on the computers (or smartphones) of political activists, social media personalities, or authors they consider racist, sexist, homophobic, transphobic, Islamophobic, etc.?

Or maybe their local ISP [Internet Service Provider] won't even allow them to have an Internet connection or will start blocking certain websites.[106] What if Priceline or Orbitz decides not to sell you a plane ticket because they refuse to do business with "hateful" people? Or if Enterprise decides they won't rent you a car. Or a popular gas station chain won't sell you gas? What if a major grocery store chain decides they won't sell you any food? If Visa or Mastercard blacklist you, then you won't even be able to have a debit card. If no banks will allow you to have an account, how can you cash your paycheck?

In the Bible, a prophecy in the Book of Revelation says that one day "no man might buy or sell, save he that had the mark, or the name of the beast, or the number of his name," warning that people who don't worship the counterfeit Christ will be completely cut off economically from the modern world. It appears we are beginning to see the justifications for such widespread bans by those who control the backbone of the financial system.

Section 230 of the CDA

Technically, private companies can ban people from their platforms as long as it's not because of their race, sex, sexual orientation, age, disability, country of origin, or other legally "protected" class. But political affiliation is not a protected class, and companies could legally ban all Republicans if they wanted to. Laws and regulations are always many years behind innovation, and the framers of the legislation governing our communication infrastructure could have never imagined the emergence of social media, let alone how instrumental of a role it would come to play in our lives.

The Telecommunications Act of 1996 was passed by Congress and signed into law by President Clinton in order to overhaul the rules and regulations governing communication systems in response to the development of the Internet. Within the Act was a subsection called the Communications Decency Act, and Section 230 of the law granted immunity to Internet Service Providers, Domain Registrars, and website hosting services so if customers use these services in ways that violate copyright laws (or criminal statutes), the companies themselves are not liable for the legal consequences because they are not deemed publishers, but platforms, and are not responsible what their customers are posting.

In other words, if someone posts an episode of The Big Bang Theory television show on their YouTube channel, YouTube is not responsible for that person violating CBS's copyright (as long as YouTube would promptly remove the infringing video if notified by CBS.) Because YouTube provides a service (i.e. the "platform") to the public, they can't necessarily prevent people from using that service to post copyrighted material, so they are given "safe harbor" and are immune from any civil or criminal penalties when their users break the law.

Section 230 of the CDA also granted immunity to Internet Service Providers and interactive websites if third party users post defamatory information about someone, [107] death threats, [108] or even if they sell fake merchandise on eBay, meaning eBay is not responsible, only the person posting the fake listing is.

Today, many Big Tech companies are abusing their immunity granted to them by Section 230 of the Communications Decency Act by censoring certain users and posts and deciding themselves what to delete from their platforms, when that content is not violating any laws. They are now acting as publishers, not platforms, because they are making editorial decisions about what will and will not be allowed. If a person posts something that doesn't violate any laws, then why should the social media companies have the right to take it down if they are in the business of offering a platform for (supposedly) anyone to use?

Currently there is a loophole in section 230 that allows for what it calls "Good Samaritan" blocking and screening of "obscene, lewd, lascivious, filthy, excessively violent, harassing, or otherwise objectionable content." [109] So they interpret "objectionable" content as being facts or opinions that hurt people's feelings or undermine the liberal agenda.

Further evidence that section 230 of the CDA is outdated and unfair can be seen by the fact that a court ruled that President Trump can't block people on Twitter after several trolls who he had blocked found a law firm that sued the President on their behalf. [110] The court ruled that Trump can't block people on social media because it "deprives them of access to official Presidential statements," and his feeds are considered a "public square." This begs the question, why is Facebook, Twitter and YouTube allowed to deprive citizens access to that same public square?

If the President of the United States can't "deprive" someone of access to his statements on social media, why should the tech companies be allowed to do that to ordinary citizens? Facebook and Twitter are basically the modern day equivalent of a telephone, or post office. They've become an intimate and crucial part of billions of people's lives. It's how friends and families communicate with each other, and share photos and videos. It's where they send out party invitations and look up old childhood friends or family members they've lost touch with. It's how they get their news and see what the President is saying.

Imagine the phone company canceling your service because they didn't like what you and your friends talked about. That's essentially what Facebook and other social media platforms are doing today when they suspend people, delete their posts, or ban them completely because of what they say when their statements are not crimes, but just a "controversial," "divisive," or "hateful" point of view.

The power these mega corporations have over how billions of people on the planet communicate with each other is staggering. And the fact that they are working in concert together to enforce their arbitrary and bias "terms of service" to silence certain people and points of view is beyond horrifying. As George Washington said, "If the freedom of speech is taken away then dumb and silent we may be led, like sheep to the slaughter." [111]

Author's Note: Please take a moment to rate and review this book on Amazon.com, or wherever you purchased it from if you're reading the e-book, to let others know what you think. This also helps to offset the trolls who keep giving my books fake one-star reviews when they haven't even read them.

Almost all of the one-star reviews on Amazon for my last two books "The True Story of Fake News" and "Liberalism: Find a Cure" are from NON-verified purchases which is a clear indication they are fraudulent hence me adding this note.

It's just more proof that liberals are losers and can't play fair, so if you could help me combat them as soon as possible since you actually bought this book, that would be great!

Thank you!

The Memory Hole

Censorship encompasses much more than people getting their posts and accounts deleted from social media platforms. It involves the mainstream media self-censoring stories and certain issues as well. They lie by omission and purposefully ignore events and individuals they don't want to give publicity to, even when what's happening fully warrants extensive coverage.

They spent years chasing after "Russian agents" who are supposedly around every corner trying to infiltrate every aspect of America, while ignoring that the National Security Agency actually considers Israel to be the top espionage threat against the United States. [112] While regularly portraying Muslims and Jews as poor minorities who are constantly persecuted by Islamophobes and anti-Semites, the American media never reports that Christians are actually the most persecuted religion in the world, and are being murdered at such a rate in the Middle East that it is considered to be "near genocide levels" according to human rights groups. [113]

When a reporter for Reuters learned that Beto O'Rourke was a member of the infamous Cult of the Dead Cow hacking group when he was a teenager, he promised Beto he wouldn't reveal that information until after the 2018 midterm election when Beto was running against Ted Cruz for his Senate seat. [114] During the campaign Beto was already being haunted by his past for leaving the scene of an accident he caused while driving drunk, and if word got out that he was also committing computer crimes as well, it certainly wouldn't have looked good.

PBS edited out a part of Finding Your Roots , a documentary series that traces celebrities' ancestry, after Ben Affleck discovered that his ancestors owned slaves and then pressured the network to cut that part out of the episode, which they did, so it wouldn't hurt his image. [115] We only know about the censorship because hacked emails from Sony were posted on Wikileaks, including one between Finding Your Roots host Henry Louis Gates Jr. and the CEO of Sony Entertainment discussing Affleck's request. [116]

In our digital world, news outlets can alter an article or a headline after something is published without most people even noticing, covering up falsehoods and mistakes, or even changing the overall message of the story. This often results in an inflammatory article going viral and whipping people into a frenzy, only to later have key points quietly changed in response to the backlash. Sometimes outlets have other reasons for dumping things down the memory hole.

For example, the popular New Zealand news website Stuff.co.nz quietly deleted an article about how a local resident had allegedly been "introduced to radical Islam at the Al-Noor mosque in Christchurch," immediately after a white supremacist walked into the same mosque and livestreamed his mass-murder of 50 Muslims inside. [117] It appears the website was trying to prevent word from getting out that the attacker appeared to have targeted that particular mosque because it had allegedly been linked to Muslim extremists.

Project Censored

Have you heard of Project Censored? Most people have not, which is the ultimate irony because it's an organization that highlights important under-reported or censored stories that mainstream media buries. Each year they publish a list of the top 25 censored or under-reported stories in America hoping to give them the attention they deserve. "Under-reported" meaning that they may have been mentioned in some mainstream outlets, but weren't front page stories or didn't dominate the news cycle for a week as they should have due to their importance.

In our fast paced world, if a story isn't one that happens to get circulated in the news cycle non-stop for a week, it is almost immediately forgotten by most people who are swept up in the next wave of reporting about mass shootings, fires, floods, celebrity gossip, health scares, and political scandals.

Project Censored was founded in 1976 at Sonoma State University by a professor who wanted to expose censorship and propaganda in mainstream media. It has been praised by many media analysts around the world. Whistleblower Daniel Ellsberg, who leaked the Pentagon Papers which showed that the Johnson administration lied to the American people and Congress about the reasons for getting involved in the Vietnam War, said Project Censored, "shines light in the dark places of our government that most need exposure." [118]

Even Walter Cronkite, who anchored the CBS Evening News for almost twenty years and who was considered to be "the most trusted man in America" said, "Project Censored is one of the organizations that we should listen to, to be assured that our newspapers and our broadcasting outlets are practicing thorough and ethical journalism." [119]

The Los Angeles Times once admitted that Project Censored, "offers devastating evidence of the dumbing-down of mainstream news in America" and said their annual book of the top 25 most censored and under-reported stories was, "Required reading for broadcasters, journalists, and well-informed citizens." [120]

New York Times Best Seller List

When the New York Times learned the NSA was illegally spying on tens of millions of Americans they sat on the story for over a year and only published it after the reporter who got his story killed by the editors decided to write a book about the spying since the paper couldn't stop him from publishing that. [121] But that's not the only censorship the New York Times has engaged in. They even censor books from their prestigious "best seller" list.

Ted Cruz's book A Time for Truth was excluded from their list in 2015 when it qualified to be number three on the list. [122] They claimed it was because most of the sales were from bulk orders, which they say was evidence that an author is ordering their own book to artificially inflate the numbers, but the publisher HarperCollins issued a statement saying they investigated the sales patterns and found no evidence of any such bulk orders. [123]

Cruz's campaign tweeted "The New York Times is lying — they should release their evidence or issue a formal apology." [124] A few days later, the book was then finally included on the best seller list. [125]

Bill O'Reilly's book Legends & Lies: The Patriots was included on The New York Times best sellers list when it came out in 2016, but was only ranked number six despite being number one on the Wall Street Journal's best seller list, as well as number one on the Publisher's Weekly list. At the time the Nielsen organization reported Bill O'Reilly's book sold 24,348 copies that week, while the number one book on The New York Times best seller list, The Gene , sold only 9,781 copies. [126]

The New York Times also omitted a bestselling book about the Philadelphia abortionist Dr. Kermit Gosnell who killed babies that were born alive during his attempted abortions and was found to have kept baby body parts in jars around his office. He was later convicted of three counts of murder and one count of involuntary manslaughter but the liberal media paid little attention to the trial because it cast abortion in such a horrific light. [127]

The book's co-author Ann McElhinney said it is "shocking that the cover-up of the Gosnell story is continuing…It's clear that this is a blatant fake list in a fake news newspaper…It's not only an insult to the people who have bought this book, but an insult to the readers of The New York Times who buy the newspaper and think they are getting the truth about book sales across America but instead get false facts disguised as a neutral list." [128]

In October 2018 when Stormy Daniels' book came out detailing her alleged affair with Donald Trump, the New York Times included it on their top 10 best seller list but not Fox News' Jeanine Pirro's book Liars, Leakers, and Liberals , or David Limbaugh's Jesus is Risen , both of which had actually sold more copies than Stormy's. [129]

In June 2019, CNN's Jim Acosta released a book about President Trump titled The Enemy of the People: A Dangerous Time to Tell the Truth

In America that didn't even make it into the top 50 on Amazon's best seller list and completely dropped off the top 100 list after just two days. But the New York Times placed Acosta's book at number ten on their "best seller" list, proving once again it's not an accurate ranking of the week's best-selling books, but really just a favorites list of the editors.

Books are so powerful that today liberals even protest companies which decide to publish certain authors. Simon & Schuster came under tremendous fire when it was revealed they had signed a deal with right-wing provocateur Milo Yiannopolous, causing the publisher to become one of the top trends on Twitter from triggered liberals calling for people to boycott not just Milo's book (which they weren't going to read anyway), but every book Simon and Schuster publishes! [130]

Hollywood producer Judd Apatow tweeted support of the boycott, saying, "I am in! In these times we can not let hatemongers get rich off of their cruelty. Shame on Simon (and) Schuster." [131] Former Governor of Vermont Howard Dean tweeted, "This is an embarrassment for [Simon & Schuster] and their owner CBS which is already on record putting their company ahead of the USA." [132] The publisher eventually canceled their contract with Milo and he later had to self-publish it.

Illegal Immigration

The facts about illegal immigration are rarely allowed into the news cycle because the American people would learn just how big of a crisis it is, and the damage illegal aliens are doing to our country. In 2015 over 50% of legal immigrant households received some form of government welfare—including food stamps, housing assistance, school lunch programs, or Medicaid. [133] A 2018 report by the Center for Immigration Studies found that 63% of non-citizens use at least one form of welfare. [134] While the liberal media loves to report that they’re just coming here to work, the fact is millions of them are sucking off our tax dollars.

Many illegal immigrants come infected with diseases as well, including ones that had been previously eradicated from the United States, like measles—resulting in new “mysterious” outbreaks (at places like Disneyland) because the diseases are imported by illegal aliens and those claiming to seek asylum. [135]

Just in the last few years there have been thousands of murders committed by illegal aliens. [136] Lives stolen and families shattered by people who should have never been in our country in the first place. Every day there are headlines in local papers about violent illegal aliens (“undocumented workers,” as liberals call them) being arrested, and the stories may get a 15-second sound bite on the local news, but that’s it. The number of drunk driving arrests, thefts, burglaries, rapes, and other crimes they commit on a daily basis is staggering. One study shows that illegal aliens commit crimes at double the rate of native-born citizens. [137]

In June 2018 when President Trump met with Angel Families at the White House (people whose family members have been killed by illegal aliens), both MSNBC and CNN abruptly cut their live feed and began talking about how the Trump administration isn’t treating illegal immigrant families who sneak into our country good enough. Ironically, during the meeting a woman who lost her son to an illegal alien drunk driver began telling the president, “The mainstream media does not let you know what is really happening.” [138]

Democrats say the flood of illegals entering our country isn’t a national emergency, as President Trump declared, meanwhile in a recent four-month period Border Patrol agents apprehended 136,000 people crossing from Mexico into the U.S. illegally. [139] In February 2019 alone over 66,400 people were arrested trying to cross the border, the most detained in a single month in over ten years. [140]

During one live feed on MSNBC when their reporter was down at the border talking about the prototypes for Trump's proposed new wall, in the background a group of illegal aliens climbed over the current short and inadequate fence that's only a few feet high, right in the middle of his report. [141]

The Left go so far when denying and defending the crimes of illegal aliens that when Donald Trump called MS-13 gang members "animals" the Democrats and their mouthpieces in the media began claiming that he was referring to immigrants in general! "Trump calls immigrants animals" was their new talking point which was repeated for years as a deceptively edited video of his statement continues to circulate as the "proof." [142] MS-13 is widely considered to be the most sadistic and vicious street gang in the world by law enforcement agencies. [143] Their motto is "rape, control, kill" and they are known for torturing and dismembering people. [144]

Democrats all used to support expanding the border wall and were tough on illegal immigration, until Donald Trump became president. [145] You've probably seen the video compilations of Chuck Schumer, Hillary Clinton, Barack Obama, and other top Democrats all previously supporting the wall and saying we need to stop the influx of illegals crossing the border—but that has changed.

It appears the Democrats don't support the blue collar working class any more. President Trump has won most of them over to his side, so now the Democrats are hoping to build a new base of future voters consisting of Americans who are too lazy to work and want free handouts from a Socialist government, and 20 million illegal aliens who they are hoping to grant citizenship to.

Transgender Crimes

Transgender people have an extremely high rate of mental illness, [146] so it should be expected that they also have a high rate of crime. But because they're part of a legally "protected class" and liberals see them as having achieved the next phase in human evolution, the media always ignores the dangers they pose to society. While their crimes may be reported briefly in local outlets where they occurred, the national conversation regarding transgender people is always framed as if they are amazing and special people who are being treated unfairly by society because they are different.

A 30-year-old transgender "woman" in Wyoming was convicted of raping a ten-year-old girl in a bathroom in 2017 but nobody really heard about this story except for maybe some locals. [147] Another transgender "woman" sexually assaulted a ten-year-old girl in a grocery store bathroom in Scotland but avoided jail and was just given community service. [148]

A 52-year-old transgender "woman" was arrested for raping (an actual) woman in 2016 and then once placed in a female jail "she" sexually assaulted four female prisoners within the first few days. [149] This story spread through social media because people found it so disturbing, but some were in denial and thought it was a hoax, causing Snopes to post an article asking "Did a Male Rapist Who Identifies as Female Transfer to a Women's Jail and Assault Female Inmates?" and rated the claim "True." [150]

In March 2019 a black transgender "woman" in New York was arrested for hate crimes after targeting random white women walking along the sidewalk near subway stations in Harlem and the Upper West Side and spraying them in the face with pepper spray. Police believe 37-year-old

Thomas Herd, a black man who identifies as a woman, was behind almost a dozen other similar attacks in the area. [151]

A transgender "woman" in Sydney, Australia was captured on surveillance cameras inside a 7-Eleven walking into the convenience store in January 2019 with an ax, and then randomly smashing two customers in the face after getting upset about a bad Tinder date. [152]

In 2015, a 30-year-old man dressed as a woman was arrested for secretly videotaping women in a mall's bathroom in Virginia. [153] A 37-year-old man in Toronto was arrested after he claimed to be a transgender "woman" and was allowed inside a women's shelter, where he then assaulted four women. [154] These are just a few of many examples.

Aside from ignoring the transgender Peeping Toms, rapes, and hate crimes that transgender "women" commit, the liberal media also ignores the rapes that gay men commit, and try to portray rape as something that only a man does to a woman, but the reality is that gay men raping other men occurs far more frequently than people know, particularly in the U.S. military since Barack Obama lifted the ban on gays being allowed in. [155]

Black Crime

The liberal media always portrays black people as being "racially profiled" by police and cite figures about black people being arrested at exponentially higher rates than whites as some kind of "proof" that the police are racist, but the reality is that black people per capita commit significantly more violent crimes than whites, so it only makes sense that they would get arrested more!

Since liberals don't know anything about math, when you mention that black men commit murder at approximately ten times the average of whites, they may lookup the statistics and claim that's not true, but they are only comparing the total number of murders committed by whites to the total number committed by blacks, and don't factor in that blacks are only about 14% of the U.S. population. [156]

The figures are per capita , meaning the average per person, and since less than 20% of murders in Chicago are actually solved, [157] the number of murders committed by black people is likely much higher than the FBI and Department of Justice records show, which again, reveal that black people commit murder at close to ten times the average of whites. Not twice as many per capita, or three times as many—ten times , or 1000% more murders per capita!

Unfortunately many black Americans have embraced the identity of a thug, and see gangster rappers as role models, and view going to jail as a badge of honor. Local TV news in Chicago, Detroit, Milwaukee, and Baltimore cover the day's murders, stabbings, and robberies for a few minutes each night, and it's almost the same story the next night, and the night after that, but the black crime problem in America is never addressed as part of our national discussion.

Memorial Day weekend of 2016 in Chicago ended with 69 people shot, every one of them from black on black crime. [158] And while the story may have gotten a fifteen second segment on some of the national broadcast news networks, the horrifying weekend was forgotten by the next day. There was no CNN Town Hall special to discuss the violence problem there. No endless panelists brought on air to discuss it with Anderson Cooper or Don Lemon. It's like it never even happened.

The following year 52 people were shot in Chicago over the same holiday weekend. [159] 36 people were shot the year after that over Memorial Day weekend. [160] All black victims and black perpetrators. Over the Fourth of July holiday and Labor Day weekends the same thing happens every year. It's total carnage in the black communities in Chicago.

It's especially sad that the emergence of the Black Lives Matter movement was built upon a foundation of lies. The list of armed and dangerous perpetrators justly shot and killed by police and then labeled "victims" of "police brutality" is long. In fact, convicted cop killer Assata Shakur, who fled to Cuba which granted her "political asylum," is considered to be an inspiration for starting the Black Lives Matter movement. [161] She was a member of the domestic terrorist organization the Black Liberation Army which stated their goal was to wage war against the United States government, and they carried out a series of bombings and assassinations of police officers in the 1970s. [162]

Many Black Lives Matter supporters carried on the philosophy of the Black Liberation Army and see themselves in a war against police. During their marches they would sometimes chant "What do we want? Dead cops! When do we want them? Now!" [163] In June 2015 two black men were arrested for plotting to blow up a police station in Ferguson, Missouri to get revenge for an officer shooting Michael Brown (after Brown attacked him and tried to take his gun). [164] In July 2016 a black man ambushed a group of police officers during a Black Lives Matter march in Dallas, Texas, killing five of them and injuring nine others. [165]

In 2017 when groups of black youth were robbing people of their cellphones at a train station in San Francisco, police refused to release security footage of the crimes "to avoid racial stereotypes." [166] Debora Allen, who works for the Department of Transportation, gave an interview with the local news and explained the police told her that, "To release these videos would create a high level of racially insensitive commentary toward the district. And in addition it would create a racial bias in the riders against minorities on the trains." [167] Police wouldn't release video footage of the perpetrators because they were concerned it would make black people look bad!

The media regularly tries to ignore or downplay most instances of anti-white hate crimes committed by black people. For example, after a black man walked into a predominately white church in Nashville, Tennessee in 2017 and opened fired, killing one woman and wounding seven others, a judge sealed most of the evidence for almost two years, and then during the trial it was revealed, as many had suspected, that he specifically went there to kill white people. [168]

Meanwhile, if you're concerned about white farmers being murdered in South Africa by the racist mobs of blacks who believe it's their rightful land, you are called a racist conspiracy theorist for promoting what the Liberal Media Industrial Complex calls the "white genocide conspiracy theory." [169]

In recent years, white farmers in South Africa (called the Boers) have been facing persecution by vicious black gangs who raid their homes and slaughter them to get "revenge" against the "imperialists" who benefited from the Apartheid. [170] And God forbid you point out the anti-white hate crimes that occur in the United States at the hands of disgruntled blacks who blame white people for all of their personal and cultural failures. That's a guaranteed way to get labeled a "white supremacist."

Fake Hate Crimes

Since a large part of our culture has come to celebrate victimhood instead of personal achievement, we have seen a staggering increase in the number of hate crime hoaxes where mostly black people, gays, Muslims, and Jews report fake hate crimes to the police after vandalizing their own property with racial slurs, or claim they were physically attacked by some evil white people. The initial reports air on local and national news and go viral on social media, sparking outrage at the "racist" white people and "Trump supporters" who allegedly keep carrying out these attacks.

But oftentimes when police get involved and interview the "victim" and gather evidence, the supposed "hate crime" turns out to be a hoax and it's quietly forgotten about. Just after the 2016 election an 18-year-old Muslim woman in New York claimed that Trump supporters harassed her on the subway, chanting "Trump!" while trying to steal her hijab, but after police launched their investigation she was arrested for making the whole story up in an attempt to distract her father from the fact that she had been out getting drunk with her friends that night. [171]

A Muslim student at the University of Texas-Arlington said she was threatened at gunpoint by a group of white men in a pickup truck only to later admit she fabricated the whole story too. [172]

Hate crime hoaxes are a specialty in LGBT communities and have been used to further their cause and gain sympathy for years, and in some cases defame a neighbor they're feuding with. [173] Since LGBT people are treated like an endangered species by the liberal media, every time a claim is made that one of them has been harassed, assaulted, or had their property vandalized with anti-gay "slurs," the activist media is more than happy to amplify their claims. But when the police discover, as they often do, that the "victim" made the whole thing up, the story is dropped like a hot potato and the media just moves on to cover something else.

For example, after a transgender "man" who was a prominent LGBT "rights" activist in Michigan had "his" home burned down, killing five pets, the FBI investigated it as a hate crime and the incident was used as leverage by the "man" to help pass a local ordinance that prohibited the discrimination of gays, but authorities later arrested “him” for the crime and said the motive was to create publicity to help pass more gay “rights” legislation. [174]

It seems every “protected” group engages in these kinds of false flags. A Jewish freshman at George Washington University reported someone had drawn swastikas on her dorm room door, but a security camera actually captured her doing it. [175] At the same school another student posted a swastika on a community bulletin board that belonged to a Jewish fraternity and it was later discovered that the perpetrator, a Jew, was a member of that same fraternity. [176]

An African American community center in Seattle was vandalized with racist graffiti including “Nigger Babies” and “Vote Trump,” and as you can guess, an African American was arrested for the crime. [177]

A 44-year-old black man in Colorado was arrested after it was discovered he was the one who hung racist flyers outside of a predominantly black church that caused the local community to be understandably outraged. [178]

A black man reported that while his car was parked near Kansas State University it had been vandalized by someone painting “Go home nigger boy” on it. A photo of the damage went viral on social media only to later be exposed as another false flag and the man admitted that he defaced his own car and filed a false police report. [179] The FBI was even brought in to help investigate the case, which turned out to be another hoax.

The following year a black student at the same school posted a photo of a note on his Twitter account that he claimed had been put on the door of his apartment, reading “Beware Niggers Live Here!!!” But when the police got involved he admitted that he made the note and put it there himself. [180]

And of course the most popular hate crime hoax in decades involves actor Jussie Smollett, who claimed that two men wearing MAGA hats attacked him in the streets of Chicago in subzero weather and tied a noose around his neck, poured bleach on him, and yelled "This is MAGA country, nigger." His story was so absurd that many were skeptical from the start, and as the investigation went on, police discovered he staged the whole thing hoping to become a social justice hero. [181]

Aside from a lot of fake hate crimes being fabricated by black people, they also hallucinate that there are hate crimes committed against them. The black mayor of a small South Carolina town called police thinking she was the victim of a hate crime after she found a "yellow, sticky substance" covering her car in March 2019 which was parked in the driveway of her home. She assumed someone had spray-painted it, but police investigated and discovered it was just pollen. [182]

Black college students at the University of Mississippi freaked out when someone saw a banana peel hanging over a tree branch outside a cabin at a fraternity's weekend retreat. It caused such a concern that the retreat was canceled because some black students were afraid it was meant as a warning or to harass them, but it turns out a student who had finished eating the banana hung it on the tree because there were no garbage cans nearby and he didn't want to just throw it on the ground where someone may end up stepping (or slipping) on it. [183]

The list of recent hate crime hoaxes from "protected groups" like gays, lesbians, and black people could fill an entire book. [184] If you want to learn more about the issue there's a whole chapter in my previous book, The True Story of Fake News which details these kinds of incidents.

Good News Ignored

Aside from burying bad news that will cause audiences to question the liberal narrative of how the world works, the Liberal Media Industrial Complex also ignores good news that undermines the agenda they're trying to push. If it's not completely ignored, it might be mentioned for 15 or 30 seconds on the broadcast news or published in newspapers or online articles but won't be included in the lengthy discussions on cable news or the weekend talk shows like Meet the Press (NBC), Face the Nation (CBS), or This Week (ABC).
